THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 123.

sumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. POMEROY to the amendment of the Committee on Finance to the forty-first section of the bill. The amendment of the committee was to strike out the following clause in the forty-first section:

And nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the taxation by States of the capital stock of banks organized under this act, the same as the property of other moneyed corporations for State or municipal purposes; but no State shall impose any tax upon such associations, or their capital, circulation, dividends, or business at a higher rate of taxation than shall be imposed by such State upon the same amount of moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State: Provided, That no State tax shall be imposed on any part of the capital stock of such association invested in the bonds of the United States deposited as security for its circulation.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

And in lieu of all other taxes every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and in case of default in the payment thereof by any association the duties aforesaid may be collected in the manner provided for the collection of United States duties of other corporations, or the Treasurer may reserve the amount of said duties out of the interest as it may become due on the bonds deposited with him by such defaulting association. And it shall be the duty of each association within ten days from the 1st days of January and July of each year to make a return under the oath of its president or cashier to the Treasurer of the United States, in such forms as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its notes in circulation, and of the average amount of its deposits, and of the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds for the six months next preceding said 1st days of January and July, as aforesaid; and in default of such return, and for each default thereof, each defaulting association shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $200, to be collected either out of the interest as it may become due such association on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, or, at his option, in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the laws of the United States; and in case of such default the amount of the duties to be paid by such association shall be assessed upon the amount of notes delivered to such association by the Comptroller of the Currency, and upon the highest amount of its deposits and capital stock, to be ascertained in such other manner as the Treasurer may deem best: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the market value of the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate, from being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of all taxes imposed by or under State authority for State, county, or municipal purposes; but not at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State. And all the remedies provided by State laws for the collection of such taxes shall be applicable thereto: Provided, also, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed.

The amendment of Mr. POMEROY was to strike out the first proviso of this amendment, and in lieu of it to insert:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as exempting the capital stock of an association, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds and deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as part of its capital or as security for its circulating notes, from being subject to the same rate of State and municipal taxation as is imposed upon other personal property in the State, city, or town in which the association is located.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have the vote taken on this amendment. We are still in Committee of the Whole, and we are yet upon the amendments made by the Committee on Finance. This is simply an amendment to the amendment proposed by that committee. I should like to have a vote on this, and then we can proceed with the other amendments moved by the committee; and if this should be voted down we can move it again, I suppose, when we come into the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. CLARK, and others. Withdraw it now and offer it in Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not care to divide the Senate now.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator that he had better perhaps let us act on the committee's amendment, and he can move this amendment when the bill comes in the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I am told it is not within the rules to amend the committee's amendment in the Senate after we have concurred in the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Undoubtedly we can amend it in the Senate, because the question arises there on concurring in the amendment, and it is perfectly proper to concur with an amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. It is entirely immaterial to me where the vote is taken.

Mr. CLARK. There cannot be any question about the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his amendment?

Mr. POMEROY. I am not particular where the vote is taken, whether now or in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we may as well take it now, and settle the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This amendment of the Senator from Kansas settles the question of taxation by the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment, because it involves the whole question. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas involves the question as to whether the right of the States and cities to tax shall be reserved, and I would, therefore, like to have the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. I will only say one word, as I suppose the Senate precisely understands this amendment. It is that municipal taxation shall extend to the entire capital of the bank not invested in Government bonds; that it shall extend to the buildings of the corporation, and to every facility that the corporation affords, except that this amendment makes it in harmony, as I conceive, with the existing law in providing that that portion of capital invested in Government bonds shall not be taxed except by the Government. The bill provides previously that one half of one per cent. every half year on the circulation, and one quarter per cent. semi-annually on the deposits, shall be paid to the General Government. I have no objection, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested, to increase that tax. It is the principle I want to save; that is that that portion of the capital invested in Government bonds shall be taxed only by the Government of the United States, and not by municipal authority. That is precisely this amendment. It has been discussed again and again here, and the Senate must understand it. I shall content myself with letting the vote be taken.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator may be contented with taking the vote, and the Senate may understand it. I have no doubt they do; but I shall content myself if I make a few remarks. I do not suppose by the remark of the Senator from Kansas that he meant to intimate that I or anybody else should not be permitted to speak. I do not understand it in that light.

Mr. POMEROY. I only meant that I thought the Senate was ready to vote.

Mr. CLARK. I am desirous that we shall come to a vote as early as possible, but I want to make a few suggestions to the Senate; they may be of no avail in determining anybody's vote, but I shall have had the satisfaction of stating my views to the Senate.

I have looked at the Senator's amendment, and what is it? The committee propose to allow the States, the counties, the cities, and the towns to tax the shareholders of a bank, not to take and tax the capital stock of the bank to the bank, but to tax the shareholder for as many shares as he may have in the bank. For instance, if my colleague, or one of his friends in Dover, should own a share in a bank in Portsmouth, he would be taxed for that share in Dover, as a shareholder in the bank. I understand this operation to be entirely within the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, and it was decided in that case (which the Senator from Massachusetts said was pure reason, and we will take the decision then as conclusive,) that the shareholder may be taxed. The Senator from Kansas proposes to strike this entirely out, not to allow the States or the county of the town to tax the shareholder, nor the State where the bank is, nor the town where the bank is, to tax any portion of the capital of the bank except that which is invested in other securities besides the national bonds. Now, I want the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts a moment to this very case of the Bank of Commerce, which we propose to admit here as a national bank. That bank has $10,000,000 capital. Suppose it invests every dollar of it in the national securities. It takes therefore $9,000,000 of circulation if it chooses. Suppose it puts that $9,000,000 of circulation into its vaults and does not circulate a dollar.

Mr. COLLAMER. Allow me to say to the Senator that they have $16,000,000 of United States bonds now.

Mr. CLARK. I am aware how much they have. That is another point. They have $16,000,000 of the bonds, but their bank capital is $10,000,000. They take then $10,000,000 of their $16,000,000 of bonds, and put their capital into those bonds. Then their bank capital is all invested in Government stocks, and they cannot, therefore, be taxed on that. They put no bills in circulation, and therefore they pay nothing as a tax on circulation. They cannot be taxed by the State, they cannot be taxed by the city; they pay one half of one per cent. a year to the Government, that is, one fourth of one per cent. every six months, under this bill, on that capital, and that is all they do pay. They have $25,000,000 of surplus, I think. How are you going to reach that surplus? If the amendment of the committee prevails the share of each shareholder, estimated at its market value, can be taxed, and that of course embraces the surplus, because the value of the share is affected by the surplus.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wants an answer, I will give it in figures. The Bank of Commerce, if I understand, under the proposed amendment—because if the amendment of the Senator from Kansas shall be adopted, I shall follow it with an amendment which I have already indicated—will pay one per cent. on $16,000,000 of deposits. Their average of deposits is about sixteen millions. That would be $160,000.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know what percentage the Senator may propose. I am talking of it as it now stands, and I am talking of the rate, not of the amount, and I am talking about the surplus, not about the deposits. The rate here fixed is one half of one per cent. a year upon those deposits; but what would be the tax on its surplus?

Mr. SHERMAN. One per cent.

Mr. CLARK. Where is that provided?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is provided for all excess of capital beyond the bonds. The Senator does not distinguish between investments and capital. The capital is $9,000,000 and the surplus $2,000,000. All in excess of the capital is taxed one per cent.

Mr. CLARK. But this is not surplus capital. It is a surplus in the bank. It is no part of its capital; it is surplus earnings.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is all taxed.

Mr. CLARK. Is there any provision in the bill for taxing it? Will the Senator turn me to it?

Mr. SHERMAN. In this same section.

Mr. CLARK. I have read it very carefully to see whether it is there, and I do not find it. I may be mistaken, however, and I will read it again:

"In lieu of all other taxes, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year, from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation."

That is fixed, but they have no circulation in the case supposed, and of course they do not pay that tax.

"And a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year on the average amount of its deposits."

Of course they will have deposits and pay one half per cent. a year on whatever they are.

"And a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds."

Is that what the Senator means? But its capital is fixed at $10,000,000. By its articles of association it is fixed; it is neither enlarged nor decreased.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the construction put upon it, undoubtedly the accumulated profits will be considered as capital to be taxed under that section; but if there is any doubt about that, it is very easy to make it certain by the change of a few words. I do not think there is any doubt.

Mr. CLARK. I think there is a doubt, because in New Hampshire we have found the necessity of passing a special law for that purpose to meet a case of that kind. The taxing of shareholders and the taxing of the bank did not reach its surplus because it was not a part of its capital, but was a part of its surplus earnings liable to be divided out at any time by a vote. Then if that is the provision which the Senator refers to I will not read the section any further, because I do not understand that provision to be what he supposes it to be.

Now, let me go into another case. Here is a bank of $100,000 capital, say in my own State. It has invested its capital in insurance stock, in other bank stock, all outside of the Government bonds. That bank wants to go into this national system. It takes its $100,000 in Government bonds, and puts them into its capital, and relieves all the other stock which it has. What is the effect of that? It has relieved itself from all taxes, State, county, and municipal. Before it helped us to support our State government; and it held just so many of the bonds of this Government. It helped to support our county expenses, but it has relieved itself of that. It helped to support our town expenses and city expenses, but it has relieved itself of all that just by the operation of turning over its hand and investing its capital in the United States bonds. You have withdrawn all that capital from that taxation.

Now, Mr. President, as I said yesterday, the burdens of taxation upon the country are to be enormous, and they are to be the burdens which will be felt the longest. In this present crisis we think nothing of taxation compared with the loss of life, and it is to be considered as nothing with the loss of life; but years roll by and time heals up the wounds that are made by the loss of friends; they pass away and memory rolls over them; but the burdens of taxation will last from year to year and year to year, and they will be constantly returning upon your people, and your people will be constantly regretting the good Government which they had, and complaining, perhaps, of their burdens. No, I do not know that they will complain, for I think this people will bear almost anything to preserve their Government; but they will be constantly reminded of the taxation. I desire simply to make this taxation equal when you impose it. I will vote for as large taxes as any man, on all sorts of property, for the purpose of maintaining this Government, but I wish that you shall make that taxation equal.

In the State of New Hampshire, in all of the States of this Union, there are large State debts. My State never was in debt before this rebellion. It perhaps had to borrow $20,000 or $25,000 in anticipation of the State tax, but when the year rolled around it was entirely free from debt. Now it is largely in debt. It is willing to be in debt to preserve the Government; but the State does ask, and I ask for it, that when that State has got itself in debt for the purpose of supporting your General Government you shall not take the property from that State which is liable to taxation and give it entirely to the General Government. The people will complain.

I want to say a word here in regard to the argument that was used by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, and that was that it was desirable to make the tax upon the national banks uniform. That might be so if everybody paid a uniform tax, but if people in different localities do not pay a uniform tax I contend that there is no justice in making one species of property pay less or more than another. Let me illustrate. It was said by the Senator from Michigan that property in Detroit, I think, paid three per cent. Did I understand him aright?

Mr. CHANDLER. About that.

Mr. CLARK. About that; I will take it in round numbers. Very well; your taxes in Detroit are, say, three per cent. You establish a national bank there, and by the establishment of the bank you do not pay two per cent. nor one and a half per cent.; what then? The result will have been that you have taken just the amount of capital that you have put into the national bank in Detroit from under that taxation of three per cent., and made the tax on other property just so much the heavier.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The bonds are not taxed now.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that the bonds are not taxed now, except by the income tax; but let the Senator from Kansas bear in mind that when we excused the bonds from taxation we excused them as bonds, but when individuals put them into banking operations and invest them as banking capital, and thereby get the privilege of having ninety per cent. of those in circulation as notes for which they pay no interest, that circulation and the money made upon it and the value of the shares as they stand ought to be taxed. So long as your bonds remain as the bonds of individuals you cannot tax them except by the income tax; but it is their option to put them into a bank and go into the business of banking, which is a very profitable business. Then you propose to excuse them from taxation also. The argument of the Senator from Vermont the other day was a very forcible one, that the people will not bear to see excused the rich men of the country by paying lighter taxes, as in the case in Detroit, if you please, the other citizens in Detroit will not bear to see excused the moneyed men who put their capital into banks and let the taxes fall on somebody else. There is injustice in it, and constant source of complaint, and it will work you more mischief than your national banks, in my judgment, will do you good.

I am willing to assist the Government. I desire to vote for the bill. I desire that such inducements shall be held out, and they are large, to the banks as will induce your State banks to come into this system; but I do not desire to see the people oppressed by the relief of one portion of the capital of the country, and a double imposition on the rest; but it must be so as it stands.

Let me illustrate. In my own city right about me there is $500,000 of bank capital, none of it invested in the bonds of the Government as I understand, but all those banks carrying an amount of the bonds equal to their capital. Under this they can just turn their capital into the bonds of the Government and relieve everything else they have from taxation. What better will the Government be? Not a new bond will be taken.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will they not hold property besides the bonds and be taxed on it?

Mr. CLARK. How can it be taxed under the provision here? It is a national institution. You cannot reach the shareholder. It is no part of its capital. How do you propose to reach it?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. They will withdraw it from the bank.

Mr. CLARK. They will withdraw it from the bank, the Senator says; but if they withdraw it, it is to be taxed; if they keep it in the bank it will not be taxed. Will not that induce them to keep it there?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am desirous to hear the Senator from New Hampshire; and I am going to vote for this bill, if I vote for it, very reluctantly; and I will not consent to vote for it if any portion of the property contained in a bank anywhere is placed in a different position from all the rest of the property in that district.

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to hear the Senator say so. I stand in precisely the same position that he does.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This is what I desire to call out from the Senator from New Hampshire. He says a bank in his town has $100,000 of money, of property, and can relieve that from taxation by having $100,000 of Government bonds. Does he mean to have me understand that they will keep that $100,000 relieved in the bank, producing nothing, or will they withdraw it and invest it otherwise and have it subject to taxation?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator does not understand me fully. I will put the case again. The capital of the bank now is invested in insurance stock and in bank stock outside, which pay dividends. They shift the capital from these bank stocks and insurance stocks into the Government bonds. They relieve them as stocks invested in capital, and hold them in the bank as stocks upon which they get their dividend. It is not money without interest.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Would they not have to give an account of that to the assessor?

Mr. CLARK. Not under this bill.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I suppose that we shall arrange the bill so that they shall be taxed for the property they have.

Mr. CLARK. That is just what we are looking after, and these are the deficiencies I am pointing out in this whole scheme.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope we shall reach that.

Mr. CLARK. I hope so, too; but then beyond this I have an objection to this scheme, and I desire to state it to the Senate; and that is that there must necessarily be an inequality between this bank property and the other property, and that should not be. If a bank exists in my city I contend that that bank should pay an equal share of the taxes of that city, whether they be lower or higher than in another place. If they be lower than elsewhere, you should not make that bank pay any more than is paid there because another bank in another State pays higher; and if they be higher, you should not excuse it from taxation because another bank in another State pays less. It may be that this very bank has grown up by the improvements in that city which have made the taxes high; and shall it therefore be excused from paying them? In my judgment the true way is to leave all the taxes to fall upon property, the whole property; let the national Government come with its collector and its assessor, and assess all the property that it is proper to assess, and assess it equally; then let the States come, each within its own sphere, and assess the property for State purposes; and then let the county assess for its own purposes, and each town and city for itself. Then no property is separated from the rest, each bears its share of the burden, each bears its share of the national burden, each bears its share of the State burden, each bears its share of the county burden, and each of the town burden; and I beg Senators to remember that some of the worst difficulties there ever have been in any nation have grown up because the common people complain that the nobles and the clergy were not taxed as much as the people.

Let your bank bill go into operation in this form and the people will not believe always that it is taxed as much as it is. They are very ready to get up a cry that it is not taxed, and they will become discontented. But put them all into the assessor's list together, put in the millionaire with the man of moderate means, assess them according to their ability for all these several objects, and let them stand together, and there is no cause of complaint. I deprecate this segregation of any portion of the property. This is our country, the States are the upholders of the country, the counties are the upholders of the States, the towns are the upholders of the counties. We are all within one another, and when you separate one from another, or weaken one at the expense of another, you derange the whole and produce conflict and complaint.

It was said by the Senator from Michigan that a bank could not go into operation with the tax that would be imposed on it. Then I ask, why should that bank go into operation? I want to know why the General Government should take from under the burdens which the towns and counties and States have incurred, any portion of that property and make the tax to fall lighter on it? If there be $500,000 in the city of Detroit ready to go into a national bank and to be assessed at a less rate than you assess the rest of the people of Detroit, I ask what justice there is in doing it. I say let us stand together in support of the Government, and let these burdens rest upon all alike.

I would not have a rush for national bank stock; I would not have a rush to change one security to another. I would appeal to the people and ask them to take the Government debt, and they will take it. They may not take it very readily at five per cent. when you have fed them with six per cent. and then propose to strike it down to five. I find no fault with the policy of the Government; I am desirous to support the Government in any policy that can consistently, which they may adopt, and I will do it unflinchingly; but I have a right to ask, as a legislator, that in imposing these burdens, or in granting these privileges as I may say, you shall remember the people behind that have got the rest of the taxes to pay.

I listened with pain to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts the other day. I should not have said "the argument." I do not regard it as an argument. I listened with pain to the ridicule he sought to throw upon the position of those like myself under the name of State rights, and he appealed to the Senate not to listen to this provision to have taxes assessed by the States because the claim was made in the name of State rights, and he wanted to induce the Senate, because Mr. Mason, or somebody else, had stood up here in the Senate and said he owed no allegiance to the Government—

Mr. SUMNER. I never alluded to that.

Mr. CLARK. I know the Senator did not allude to it in terms, but the abuse and the odium produced upon State rights is done by that very thing, which is included as the less is included in the greater.

Now, sir, while I deprecate the use that was made of State rights, and while I repudiate the doctrine of State rights entirely as they held it, I say the States have rights, and the States have duties, and nobly have the loyal States performed those duties; and it is not fair to the States to try to cast this odium upon them. Why, sir, if it had not been for these loyal States—and they claim nothing under State rights—you could not have put your men in the field; and if it had not been for the banks in the States the States could not have put their men in the field. Break down the banks in my State, and you break down the institutions which carry the State debt, you break down the institutions which carry the county debt, and you break down the institutions which carry the town debts to a very great extent, and you leave us entirely just as you would be left if you had no moneyed institutions. In my judgment, it is quite as well that the Government should be left without banks as it is that the States should be left without banks. It is the part of patriotism for us all to stand together, each bearing, as I said, its share. There should be no complaint of one class from another. I would leave the towns to tax their shareholders where the shares of the stock are held. We have had the experience of it for thirty years; we have found it to be an experience that has worked well, and we are loth to quit it and try new schemes, especially schemes which separate one portion of property from another, one class of men from another, and impose a burden on one which they do not impose on another.

These are my views, Mr. President, shortly, succinctly expressed. But I do say that I should deprecate, as I deprecate anything of this kind, the removal of this class of property from the taxation of the States. I say you should let the States tax the shareholders in your national banks, and bring the States into the support of your national banks, not into hostility to them. If you allow the States to derive the same advantage from these banks by taxation which they derive from other property they will come to your support, they will allow the State banks to be changed without much objection, if any, readily, in order to support the Government; but let it be understood that you are going to withdraw the capital of these banks from the control of the States, that you are going to take it away from their control for taxation and give it to this Government entirely, leave them to defray alone the debts of the States, the debts of the counties, the debts of the towns and cities, and the support for years and years as they will of the families of the men who have gone out to sustain your Government, and they will feel it to be a hardship—not that they will hesitate in their loyalty; they will stand by the General Government; they will stand by the General Government to the last, well knowing that when the Government goes it goes with a sweep that sweeps everything away; but they do ask you so to arrange this matter of business that they and you can stand together and have equal shares and parts in this great Government which they help you to preserve.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I want to reserve the right of taxation to the States, counties, and towns, for the reason that it has in it the power to destroy these institutions if necessary. The time may come, as it once was, when the people of this country will not want a United States bank; and I desire to give to every city, county, and State the power to destroy it if that time shall come. I vote for this bill because it is deemed by the Secretary of the Treasury a necessity for the maintenance of the country at this crisis. But for that, any United States bank bill would meet my fiercest opposition.

If our country were at peace I should feel it to be a duty that I owed to my constituents to ask for time from the Senate to denounce this scheme. I opposed it when it was in existence; I spat upon its grave after it was buried; and I am now induced to support it because my country demands it; and when the Senator from Michigan tells me that the power to tax these institutions gives to the people the power to destroy it, I am satisfied. I should vote that authority to the cities, counties, and States.

Mr. SUMNER. If it were in order I would move an amendment to the proposition under consideration; but as it is not I propose to make it in the form of a suggestion to my friend who has moved this amendment. It is not in order I take it, because the amendment now under consideration is an amendment to an amendment, and that is as far as we can go. I understand from the Senator who has offered this amendment that he desires to exempt the shares of individual proprietors from local taxation.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the Senator be pleased to read his amendment that we may see what it is?

Mr. SUMNER. On a careful study of the Senator's amendment I do not think it is successful in carrying out that idea, and I therefore propose to add these words, "but the shares of the stockholders shall not be subject to any State, county, or municipal taxation." These words will come in at the end of the Senator's amendment, and they will make his idea perfectly clear, so that hereafter there can be no question if the Senator accepts the proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. My amendment displaces precisely that language in the amendment reported by the committee on Finance. My amendment is in the place of the proviso in the amendment reported by the committee; and I think that as it stands it does not allow the shares to be taxed to anybody.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me from reading the amendment of the Senator, that if it were left to stand as it is, the shares of individual proprietors would be liable to local taxation. I must say that is my opinion on considering the amendment, and I find that it is the opinion of other Senators about me who have considered it carefully also.

As I have said already in this debate, what I am ready to do I want to do thoroughly, and as I have made up my mind to support this measure and to organize this national bank, I want to do what I can, to the extent of my vote and my counsels, so far as they may be of any value—I set very little on them myself—to make the institution as strong as possible. We cannot hope that it can succeed unless we make it as strong as possible. If we leave it exposed to any hostile influence from without, from another jurisdiction whether State or municipal in any way, I feel that we do not do justice to our own work; we leave it exposed.

I think, therefore, the idea of the Senator whose amendment is under consideration will be carried out and completed if he accepts the words which I now propose.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it is not in my power to accept the Senator's proposition, because the yeas and nays have been ordered upon my amendment, and I think my amendment is more perfect without those words than with them.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, then; it is not in my power to move it. Perhaps at some other stage it will be.

Mr. POMEROY. If the amendment which I have moved shall prevail, the Senator can then move further to amend by adding the words he proposes.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, the question

involved is whether the shareholders in the national banks shall be subject to taxation by State and municipal authority. It is argued that they should not on the ground of hardship, and hardship enough to defeat the measure. Let us see.

The capital stock of these banks is or may be wholly indebtedness of the United States to the shareholders, or, in other words, they have made loans to the Government, which are evidenced by Government bonds bearing six per cent. interest payable as well as the principal in gold. Upon depositing these bonds in the Treasury, Government furnishes to the bank ninety per cent. of their value in bank notes intended for circulation, and imposes one per cent. annually as a tax upon that circulation.

The first thing to be noted is, that the bond deposited bears interest at six per cent. in gold, which would not be extravagant if the lender had lent gold. Such, however, was not the case; the loan was made in currency, to-day worth say sixty cents on the dollar, would reduce the actual value of a $1,000 bond to $600. For this $600 Government pays $60 in gold, equal to ten per cent. per annum. This $60 may be sold for $100 in currency, thus raising the rate to sixteen and two thirds per cent. in paper, which, so far as the Government is concerned is the same as gold, because it is bound to redeem it in gold. Whatever his bond may have been worth, he receives annually for the use of it $100 in currency—at least a fair compensation. The Government, however, by this scheme proposes to do still better, and when the bond becomes bank stock delivers to him ninety per cent. or $900 of bank notes for circulation. Three fourths of this amount he may, as banker, realize interest upon again by either loaning it to the Government or to the people. Suppose to the latter at six per cent., he would then receive $40 50; and from this sum one per cent. on the $900, or $9 must be deducted, leaving $31 50. This added to the $100 received on the bond makes $131 50 clear per annum for the use of $600 real or $1,000 paper, which one would think was doing very well by way of compensation. And yet it is argued that this bondholder, thus receiving thirteen per cent. upon an investment of $1,000, which was really worth but $600, cannot afford to pay his share of the local taxes. What is there to prevent him from reinvesting his interest or his profits in Government stocks and Government banks again on the same terms, and thus receive in the end the whole in gold? In this aspect the rate of the profit rises enormously, for, starting with the $600 originally loaned, it becomes nearly twenty-two per cent. I beg Senators to make this calculation for themselves, because it seems to me there is great misapprehension as to the real nature of the working of the laws of a depreciated currency, and of the amount to be realized by shareholders out of these banks. If I am right, I think it impossible that any one can complain of the provision made by the amendment of the Committee on Finance, and I hope that the amendment proposed here may fail.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I inquired just now of the Senator from Kansas whether his amendment does more than is done by that part of the bill that came from the House of Representatives which is proposed by the Finance Committee to be stricken out, and whether, if I was right in that, he proposed to substitute his for what is to be stricken out on the recommendation of that committee. That part of the bill which the committee advise us to strike out says:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the taxation by States of the capital stock of banks organized under this act the same as the property of other moneyed corporations for State or municipal purposes; but no State shall impose any tax upon such associations, or their capital, circulation, dividends, or business, at a higher rate of taxation than shall be imposed by such State upon the same amount of moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State: Provided, That no State tax shall be imposed on any part of the capital stock of such association invested in the bonds of the United States deposited as security for its circulation."

I am not sure that I have collected the true meaning of the amendment offered by the member from Kansas; but so far as I understand it, it does no more than is done by the bill as it came from the House of Representatives; so that it leaves subject to State taxation everything of capital in the bank, and all the business of the bank except such portion of its capital as may be invested in the bonds of the United States. Feeling, as I stated the other day when the bill was before us, that the States have a very deep interest in the questions which this measure presents, and that its success will very materially interfere with that interest, I beg leave to add now a word or two more for the purpose of showing what will be the effect of the bill if it shall pass as is proposed, and more especially the effect of the bill if it shall pass with a prohibition upon the States taxing the capital of these banks.

The first effect of the bill will be to transfer the whole capital now invested in banks in the States into the banks contemplated by this law; and another and an equally certain effect will be to induce everybody who has money to make such an investment, to place his money in these associations. The honorable member from Pennsylvania has, as I think, very conclusively proved that the profit which these banks will make will be very much greater than any profit which can be made by any existing bank operating under a State law. Without going into all the particulars to which the honorable member adverted, I ask the Senate's attention for a moment to the strong inducement which the law will offer to all State bank capital and to all State capitalists to invest their respective funds in these associations.

A thousand dollars in gold now if loaned out at six per cent. interest would bring only sixty dollars. That $1,000 of gold, at what I believe is the depreciation of the governmental currency, will purchase $1,800, and that $1,800 in the governmental currency under this bank bill, if it passes, may be invested, the whole of it, in United States bonds bearing an interest of six per cent., and that interest and the principal when the principal matures payable in gold; and the bank can loan out to its customers $1,800, and if the rate of interest in the State is six per cent., which I have assumed in relation to the item of gold, it will receive $108 as interest on that $1,800; and while it is receiving by lending to its customers $108 on the $1,800, the representative of that $1,800 is not in the vaults of the bank bearing no interest, but is in the bonds of the United States bearing interest during the whole time that the loan is going on and during the whole period that the bonds may be held by the bank, and that gives $97.20 in gold. But in order to simplify the calculation, supposing gold to be worth when it is received only the par of the governmental currency, the receipts for the year upon an investment of $1,000 will be $205 and some cents—more than twenty per cent. on $1,000 of investment.

That is not all. The rest of the calculation cannot be made because the element cannot be ascertained upon which it would depend. These banks will be authorized to loan upon their deposits; and if the deposits are $1,000,000, they can loan just as much as they think proper, keeping within the limit of the law; they may loan the whole $1,000,000 and be receiving six per cent. interest upon that $1,000,000; and the amount that they will realize by that six per cent. on the deposits upon which they are paying no interest is to be added to the two hundred and odd dollars which they are receiving upon the loan of their $1,800 and upon the $1,800 worth of bonds.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the interest on the $1,800 of bonds will be paid in gold that is worth one half more.

Mr. JOHNSON. I said that. The difference between the value of gold and of currency is to be added, of course. Now this being the operation of the bill as a financial operation upon the part of those who may invest in it, it seems to me to be very evident that all the State banks will come into the scheme, and that the individual capitalists will come into the scheme, so that the whole banking capital of the States and the whole capital in the hands of the citizens of the States may become invested in these banks, and if so invested be removed from State taxation.

How are we to meet our engagements? As I stated the other day, it is a very great mistake to suppose that the credit of this country depends upon our being able to meet merely our national obligations. It is as much involved in the ability of the States to meet their State obligations as it is involved in the ability of the United States to meet their own obligations. But not only will it affect our reputation, although we may be able to meet our own national obligations, if we shall prove unable to meet our State obligations, but the existence of the last fact will be certain in the end to produce an inability on the part of the General Government to meet its national obligations.

Now, another word. The Supreme Court, in the case so often quoted, of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, not only cautiously abstained from deciding that it is in the power of the General Government to take out of the taxing power of the States the property of the citizens of the States invested in the stock of the Bank of the United States, but affirmatively declared that each of the States will have the power, and has the power, to tax each of her citizens upon each of his shares of stock in the bank. What Maryland attempted to do was to impose a tax in the way of a license to the Bank of the United States to establish a branch within her limits. It was a tax, therefore, upon the franchise, a tax upon the corporation, a tax upon the means selected by the Government, and, as the court decided, constitutionally selected, for the purpose of carrying out the powers of the Government. But no judge thought, and no member of the bar, as far as I can collect from the reports, and as far as my memory will serve me, for it was my good fortune to have been present at the argument, no judge and no member of the bar who argued the cause dreamed of denying that it would be in the power of the States to tax the property of their citizens invested in the stock of the Bank of the United States. On the contrary, the objection urged upon the part of the counsel of Maryland was that a denial to Maryland of the right to pass the law which she had passed was to deny to Maryland the right of taxing at all the property which her citizens might have in the bank. The counsel for the bank met that by saying that that was by no means true; that was not what Maryland had done; Maryland had attempted to impose a tax upon the bank itself as a franchise, upon the right of the bank to bank at all; and the Supreme Court, in answering the argument made by the counsel for Maryland in support of Maryland's right to pass the law which was in question in that case, took precisely the ground taken by the counsel for the bank; that is to say, they said in the conclusion of the opinion as given by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall that their opinion was not to be understood at all as interfering in any way with the right of Maryland to tax the real estate of the bank, or to tax the interest which her citizens might have in the shares of the bank—

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator just there?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that that point was in question before the court?

Mr. JOHNSON. Directly.

Mr. SUMNER. The latter point?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know what you mean by "in question." It was in argument.

Mr. SUMNER. It was not necessary to the decision. Do I understand the Senator as affirming that the Supreme Court have passed finally, definitively, and in the sense of a judicial decision by a judicial tribunal, upon that question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, what I said was that the question itself was distinctly argued. In arguing the proposition whether the law passed by Maryland had been constitutionally passed, the counsel for Maryland insisted that if it was unconstitutional it would have been equally unconstitutional if she had taxed the real estate of the bank or taxed the interest which her citizens held as shareholders. The counsel for the bank admitted, as the honorable member from Massachusetts will find, that a law passed by Maryland to tax the shares of her citizens, and to tax the real estate which might be held by the bank, would be constitutional; and the Supreme Court closed their opinion, so as to exclude any conclusion which could be drawn as against the taxing power of the States on that point by saying that it is to be understood that Maryland has the right, and every State in which there may be a bank of the United States, either the mother bank or a branch, has the right to tax the real estate which the bank may hold within that State, and to tax the shares of her citizens in that institution. And the honorable member will find by looking at the dissenting opinion—I have not read it for some time; but I speak, I am sure, correctly, for it is a case in which I participated with the present Chief Justice in behalf of the State of Maryland—the honorable member will find in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Thompson, in the case of Brown vs. The State of Maryland, which involved the right of Maryland to exact a license to entitle one of her citizens to sell goods imported in the original packages, that he states, and without contradiction, and Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, who gave the opinion against the State in that instance said the same thing, that it had been decided in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, had been decided, not arguendo, not as a mere obiter, but had been decided that, although the Bank of the United States was in one respect, and was in point of fact, as far as the constitutional question was concerned, a fiscal agent of the Government, (the right to charter the bank as a fiscal agent of the Government being constitutional because necessary in the judgment of Congress, and over the question of necessity the judiciary had no right to interfere,) and was necessary to enable the Government to execute its powers of collecting its debts, and regulating commerce, and a variety of other things, it would yet be in the power of the States to tax that portion of the capital which the bank might have invested in real estate, and to tax the interest which her citizens might hold in it as shareholders.

In each of those cases, and in several other cases the names of which I do not now recollect, where the same propositions were before the court, it was held that there is no authority to tax any of the means of the Government, to interfere by State taxation with any of the powers of the Government, that under the Constitution Congress has the right to borrow money; and as she may borrow to better advantage, or might not be able to borrow at all unless she had that advantage, by exempting what she gave as security for the loan from State taxation, she had a right to exempt from State taxation the bonds which she might give or the stock she might issue. But what is proposed to be done in this case I think is far beyond the principle involved in that.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator just there? I simply wish to call his attention to what seems to me to be a point in issue, and certainly it is only with a view of having it elucidated.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object at all.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that the Senator admits that under the Constitution the States may not tax any instrument or means of the national Government. Now, does the Senator intend to limit that proposition to a direct tax, or also to include under it an indirect tax? If an indirect tax is included under that proposition, that is, if a State may not impose an indirect tax upon an instrument or means of the national Government, then I ask on what principle a State can impose a tax upon the shares in a bank? It cannot impose a tax upon the bank directly or upon its capital stock directly. May it impose a tax upon the shares, and thus do indirectly what I understand the Senator to admit it cannot do directly?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will answer the honorable member by resorting to what is often done in his section of the country—asking another question. Does the honorable member suppose that the States cannot tax the real estate which the bank may purchase? Is he willing to deny to the States the power to tax the real estate? I do not think he is; and yet does he not see that in one sense that is an indirect tax upon the bank itself? What is to prevent the Government from chartering a bank with a capital altogether invested in real estate? Now, suppose he has said that there would be no right in such a case—he has not said it yet—to tax the real estate; the United States go to Massachusetts and say, "We will have a bank in Massachusetts founded upon real estate exclusively; each farmer in Massachusetts"—as has been done in many State institutions—"may subscribe his farm as capital to a fiscal agent of the Government." The country needs it, says the honorable member, cannot get on without it; it becomes, therefore, one of the instruments by which the Government will be enabled to carry out its admitted and exclusive power. If it be true that the States would have no authority to tax in such a case as that, then it would be in the power of the United States to take the whole real estate of any State into its own hands for the purpose of raising revenue, and exclude the State from the privilege of supporting herself by taxing the same article of property.

If the honorable member will look at the case of McCulloch—I have it not by me—he will see that the court, because as they admit in so many words the great importance and the vital importance of preserving the power of State taxation, are very cautious in laying down the proposition upon which in that case they decided the law of Maryland to be unconstitutional, to guard against the conclusion that it was, in the judgment of the court, not in the power of Maryland to tax the property which her citizens might have taken and invested in the bank.

I do not deem it necessary to argue the question which the honorable member has suggested whether there can be a right to tax indirectly one of these instruments, if there is no right to tax directly. The only answer I have to give, so far as that question is applicable to the case before us, is that the Supreme Court held that what the honorable member says is an indirect tax is a constitutional tax, and that what he says is a direct tax they held to be an unconstitutional tax, and that the latter tax they considered as exclusively applicable to a tax upon the franchise itself, the right to bank.

Now, what have we told the holders of our bonds? The honorable member from Massachusetts, say, has loaned $10,000 to the Government, and they have said that upon the bonds which they have given him in return for his $10,000, he shall not be subject to taxation by the States. The Government issue those bonds under the authority to borrow money; the bonds are the evidence of the loan; and as mere bonds they are exempt from State taxation. But what is proposed to be done now? You by this law say to these bondholders, "Exchange your bonds for bank stock, bank upon it; make it capital; and if you exchange your bonds for bank stock the States lose the right to tax the bank stock." That is a very different thing. In McCulloch vs. Maryland the court put the inability of the State to tax upon the ground that the subject which Maryland had attempted to tax was a subject brought into existence for the first time by a law of the United States; it was the franchise; it was not property before within the State or anywhere else; it grew out of the powers of the General Government, existed nowhere else; it was as much an instrument of the Federal Government as the Army or the Navy, in the view that the Supreme Court took in discussing the constitutionality of that act which they first disposed of, I mean the constitutionality of the act chartering the bank which they first disposed of. But in this case you are about to say to every citizen, "Bring all your property into this institution; if you bring it in as money you are liable to State taxation; but if you will go into the market and buy up our bonds, and the bank is willing to take the bonds in payment of your subscription for the stock, then you at once become exempt from State taxation."

I submit, Mr. President, in the first place, without proposing to discuss it any longer, that you have no right to do any such thing; and in the next place, that if you had the right to do it, it would be most inexpedient to do it. It would be reducing the States almost to a condition of pauperism. I feel, in common with every member of the Senate, a desire to strengthen the Government as much as possible, but I must do it respecting at the same time the support which the States demand, which the interests of the public demand.

But there is another view which has suggested itself. You are now, by this proposition and what you have been doing, telling our citizens to come in and buy the five-twenty bonds and the ten-forty bonds, as you are now doing; and you have told them that you want it done because you want to get the currency out of circulation. "The currency is too inflated, bring it in, and we will give you bonds in exchange;" and everybody is coming in as fast as he can come in, for he makes a very good bargain as times are in buying the bonds, being payable in coin, principal and interest. You get the circulation in, and now what do you propose to do by this bill? "Take your bonds, invest them in bank stock, and you may circulate as bankers a certain proportion—$675 out of $1,000; you may issue a circulation for that amount, and we, the United States, will guaranty the payment of that circulation." Do you not suppose these banks will issue a circulation to the whole amount authorized. Who can doubt that? Then what is the practical result of it? You take out of circulation the Treasury notes and you substitute for them these bank notes for which the United States stand as guarantors. So far as the public is concerned, what possible difference does it make; if the inflation of the currency is the cause of the present embarrassments of the money market, what possible difference can it make whether that inflation is caused by the issue of bank circulation, or whether, in the absence of bank circulation, it is caused by the issue of governmental circulation? It is but a new name for the same thing. The first are notes, Treasury notes, issued by the Government; the next are notes issued by these fiscal agents of the Government, guarantied by the Government. I know, at least I think I know—I speak of course under the restraint which I feel when I differ from others, especially when I differ from any of the gentlemen who are supporting this bill and the Secretary of the Treasury, who I understand is in favor of the bill—I think I know that the measure will operate most prejudicially to the States, while, at the same time, it will afford no revenue to the Government in the particular in which it is supposed to be important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] to the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Harding, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilkinson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I propose to amend the amendment of the committee in the sixty-third line on page 35 by inserting, after the word "purposes" the words "in the State where the bank is situated;" so that the clause will read in this way:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the market value of the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate, from being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of all taxes imposed by or under State authority for State, county, or municipal purposes in the State where the bank is situated; &c.

My object is this: that the States in which the banks are situated shall have the benefit of the taxation of the banks, and that the States where the capitalist owning the stock may happen to reside shall not, on account of that residence, be entitled to the benefit of the taxation. I am quite aware of the principle of the common law that personal property is supposed to follow the owner wherever he may be, and that, in contemplation of that code, a man's personal property is attached to him and belongs to his residence. If the bill shall pass without this amendment, this will be the result: that where the owners of the stock reside, for instance, in the State of Massachusetts or Maine, and their money is invested and employed in banking operations in Michigan or Indiana or Ohio, or any other western State where capital is not so abundant, the money thus invested will be taxed by the State of Massachusetts or Maine, and the tax put into the treasury of those States instead of going into the treasury of the State where the bank is in its actual operation. Unless my amendment is adopted, therefore, this will exempt a vast proportion of the stock thus invested by non-resident capitalists from local taxation, and I think will be, and very justly be, a cause of serious complaint on the part of the people where the banks happen to be situated. My amendment is offered for the purpose of curing that evil.

The Senate will perceive with what facility a non-resident stockholder may conceal the fact that he is the owner of stock invested and employed in a State where he does not reside. The assessors know nothing of it ordinarily, and it would be rather an abnormal and singular process for the assessor to inquire of every man and ascertain from him where every cent of his money is invested. Indeed there would be no way, no convenient way at least, of ascertaining what the man really owned and where it was.

Now that I am up I beg to say another word on this subject. I confess that in voting for this clause of the bill I act with considerable hesitation and doubt as to the right of Congress to give this authority to the States to tax the stock of these banks. It is said that that question has already been definitely settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not so regard it. I speak with great deference to the opinion of other Senators who may entertain a different idea; but for one I cannot regard it as a settled question that the State has the right to tax the stock of a stockholder in one of these national banks, and I do not consider the Supreme Court of the United States as having settled that question. In the case which is so frequently alluded to, that of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that question was not raised. It was not raised, because it could not be raised on the record in that case, and if the Supreme Court assumed to determine that question in that case, I think their opinion is obiter, and not binding as being connected with the issue before the court.

The suit was brought by the State of Maryland for the purpose of recovering from Mr. McCulloch, who, I believe, was the cashier of the branch bank of the United States, if I recollect rightly, a penalty imposed by a statute of the State of Maryland for carrying on the business of banking within that State, which was not authorized by the laws of Maryland. The statute is very brief, and I beg the patience of the Senate a moment while I read it:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That if any bank has established, or shall, without authority from the State first had and obtained, establish any branch, office of discount and deposit, or office of pay and receipt, in any part of this State, it shall not be lawful for the said branch, office of discount and deposit, or office of pay and receipt, to issue notes in any manner, of any other denomination than five, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, five hundred, and one thousand dollars, and no note shall be issued except upon stamped paper of the following denominations."

Then follows the mere denomination of the notes:

"Provided always, That any institution of the above description may relieve itself from the operation of the provisions aforesaid, by paying annually, in advance, to the treasurer of the Western Shore, for the use of the State, the sum of $15,000."

Now comes the clause of the act under which the suit seems to have been brought:

"And be it enacted, That the president, cashier, each of the directors and officers of every institution established, or to be established as aforesaid, offending against the provisions aforesaid, shall forfeit a sum of $500 for each and every offense; and every person having any agency in circulating any note aforesaid, not stamped as aforesaid directed, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding $100; every penalty aforesaid to be recovered by indictment, or action of debt, in the county court of the county where the offense shall be committed, one half to the informer, and the other half to the use of the State."

The person accused here was carrying on the business of banking in the State of Maryland without paying any regard whatever to this statute of that State, and an action of debt was brought against him for the purpose of recovering the penalty thus imposed. It is very true, as the court say, that the act of Maryland tended to prevent the operations of the Bank of the United States. It was not a tax upon the franchise so much as an embarrassment of the operations of the bank; and because that statute tended thus to embarrass the operations of the bank the Supreme Court held that the State statute was void. At the close of the opinion the learned Chief Justice uses this very cautious, circumspect, and well-guarded language:

"This opinion does not deprive the States of any resources which they originally possessed."

That every one admits. The opinion does not deprive the States of any resources which they originally possessed, and it was not intended to deprive the States of any such resources:

"It does not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the bank in common with the other real property within the State."

That is perfectly certain. The opinion does not extend to any such question, because the issue did not and could not relate to that question, and therefore the court cautiously avoided passing any opinion on that question. The Chief Justice speaks with perfect truth, but with his characteristic cautiousness: the opinion does not extend to any such question. He continues:

"Nor to a tax imposed on the interest which the citizens of Maryland may hold in this institution, in common with other property of the same description throughout the State."

My remarks are equally true respecting this clause of the opinion, and for the same reason, that the question of the power of Maryland to tax the stock in the hands of the stockholders of that bank was not before the court. The Chief Justice proceeds:

"But this is a tax on the operations of the bank, and is, consequently, a tax on the operation of an instrument employed by the Government of the Union to carry its powers into execution. Such a tax must be unconstitutional."

The point of the decision is this: that a tax upon the operations of the Bank of the United States was unconstitutional because it tended directly to prevent the operation of a lawful instrument of the United States in carrying out its powers. I beg to know what distinction in principle there is between a proposition to tax the operations, or, if you please, the franchise of a bank, and one to tax the stock in the hands of the stockholder. It is said in this opinion that if the State may tax the operations of a bank to the amount of one per cent., it may tax it to such an amount as to compel it to close up its business, and thus it will be in the power of the State Legislature to prevent the operations of a national bank. But if the State can tax the stock of such a bank in the hands of a stockholder, it may carry this taxation to such an extent as completely to deprive that stock of all value, and thus it may ruin the institution and bring about precisely the same result as if its taxation had been confined to the mere franchise for the operations, that is, the working of the bank itself. I think when Senators undertake to draw a distinction between the one kind of taxation and the other, they seek to get up a distinction where there is no difference, for the reasoning applies, in my judgment, as strongly against the right to tax the stock in the hands of a stockholder as to tax the franchise of a bank. Hence, as I remarked before, it seems to me that we are endeavoring to exercise a very doubtful power under the Constitution.

But if the States possess the power to tax the individual stockholders in this bank, what power have we to restrain or trammel or limit the power of that State taxation? And still both the original bill and the amendment of the committee, which is now under consideration, assume thus to limit the power of a State over this now called one of the ordinary subjects of taxation. If the States have the power to impose taxes on this stock, they have it irrespective of us; they have it in virtue of their original sovereignty as States, and it is incompetent, as it seems to me, for Congress to restrain, modify, or limit that power of State taxation. If the States have it not, then it is equally idle, still more idle for us to undertake to restrain it. In short, sir, if we have the power of taxation in such cases, if Congress have that power, is it not an exclusive power—exclusive because it is imposed upon a species of property which has existence and existence only under and by an act of the United States—property which previously had no existence? I refer to the certificates of stock. That is the ius ad rem, the right to a proportionate share in the distribution of the corporate funds; for it is not pretended that the individual stockholder has the ius in re, has any absolute possessory right to the thing itself. If we have the power of taxation ourselves, and that seems to be conceded, it seems to me to be an exclusive power. If the States have it not as States, then it is impossible for us to impart it to them. It is certainly a very singular notion about State rights that the Congress of the United States can give to States rights of legislation which they did not previously possess.

I hope, sir, that my amendment will meet the approbation of the Senate; for if the bill is to pass I think that will be a very material safeguard in it, and one which will make it more acceptable to the people of the States where stock is not subscribed as readily as in other States than it would be without such an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not propose to discuss the question as one now for the first time arising whether there is not a distinction between the authority of the States to tax the shares which their citizens may invest in a bank or not. The honorable member from Michigan says that that particular question was not involved in the case of McCulloch. In one sense he is correct; that is to say, the case might have been decided without saying anything about the right of a State to do anything more than impose such a tax as Maryland attempted to impose in that case; I referred to the decision in the case of McCulloch, not for the purpose of showing the very point was decided as being necessary to the decision of that particular case, but that it was admitted by the court, who denied the power of Maryland to impose that particular tax, that she would have a right to impose a tax in a different mode.

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator will excuse me, I do not understand the court to have made any such admission. Certainly if we construe the language of the Chief Justice with any strictness—and we know he was in the habit of writing very carefully—we will find no such admission, as I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has been read several times, and it is rather fatiguing to the Senate to recur to it again. The honorable member says that there is no admission on the part of the Chief Justice or of the court—the court were unanimous—that the State would have a right to lay a tax upon the shares of its citizens or the real estate of the bank. The honorable member is now of the opinion, and so is the honorable member from Massachusetts—

Mr. HOWARD. I said nothing about real estate, however.

Mr. JOHNSON. They were both of the opinion that the principle involved in the case of McCulloch and the United States Bank denies to a State the authority to tax the shares or the real estate of a bank; the shares at any rate.

Mr. SUMNER. The shares.

Mr. JOHNSON. The argument made in support of Maryland's taxation was that if the right to impose that particular kind of taxation did not exist, then Maryland would not have a right to impose the other kind of taxation, or rather to impose a tax in a different form, a tax upon the shares of her citizens in the bank. What do the court say? The honorable member reads it as not implying an admission on the part of the Chief Justice that Maryland would have a right to impose such a tax as the counsel for Maryland insisted she would be excluded from imposing provided the court should decide that she had no right to impose the particular tax which was in question. What does the judge say?

So far there is an admission that there were resources originally possessed before the bank was chartered. What are they?

"It does not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the bank, in common with the other real property within the State, nor to a tax imposed on the interest which the citizens of Maryland may hold in this institution, in common with other property of the same description throughout the State."

What is the inference to be drawn from the two sentences I have read? The property which Maryland's citizens are investing in the bank existed antecedent to the bank. It was feared on the part of Maryland that if her act was not sustained she would not have a right to tax that property if it were invested in the bank stock; but the Chief Justice says no such thing: we tell you expressly, in so many words, that this property existing before this decision, it does not deprive you of the right to impose such taxation. When the case came before the court again as an authority in the case of Brown vs. The State of Maryland, to which I adverted just now from recollection, the honorable member will find in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Thompson upon the general question that he relied upon what was done in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland to show that what Maryland proposed to do in this case she had a right to do; and what does he say was done in McCulloch vs.

The State of Maryland? After citing the case, he says:

"It is there admitted that the power of taxation is an incident of sovereignty, and is coextensive with that to which it is an incident, and that all subjects over which the sovereign power of a State extends are objects of taxation."

He then goes on to speak of the Bank of the United States being brought into existence by the General Government, and therefore not subject to taxation. He continues:

"And it is expressly admitted in that case?"—

I am reading the words of the dissenting judge, and they all concur in that—

"And it is expressly admitted in that case that the opinion did not deprive the State of any resources they originally possessed; nor to any tax paid by the real property of the bank, in common with the other real property within the State; nor to a tax imposed on the interest which the citizens of Maryland may hold in the institution in common with other property of the same description throughout the State."

Mr. HOWARD. That is a repetition of the same language used in the other case.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is; but I refer to it for the purpose of showing that one of the judges who participated in McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland says it was admitted that the States had the power to lay taxes of this description. It is rather broader.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will allow us to get through with this troublesome question. There are no other amendments scarcely to the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If we wait to dispose of that we shall get no dinner to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there will be any further debate.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to say just one word. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of adjournment must first be determined, and that is not a debatable motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the solicitation of the Senator from Ohio I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to say simply this: I am as anxious as the Senator from Maryland or any other Senator to subject these funds in the hands of the stockholders to State taxation if it can be done legally, for I see the inconvenience which would arise from the exemption of that vast fund from State taxation; but what I fear is this: that we shall be enacting a series of lawsuits which will keep the country in a state of turmoil and disturbance on the subject of this currency, and thus injure the public interests. That is one great ground of my fear. Another is this: that we cannot impart to the States a power of taxing this species of property by any act of ours if they have it already in virtue of their sovereignty, so to speak, as States.

Mr. HALE. It strikes me the amendment of the Senator from Michigan would introduce a new and dangerous principle into legislation; for it would enable, for instance, the Legislature we will say of Massachusetts to tax the citizens of New Hampshire. If a bank happens to be located in Boston and a man in New Hampshire owns $50,000 of its stock, that is personal property owned in New Hampshire over which the State in virtue of its sovereignty has the right to exercise the power of taxation; and that has never been denied by the decisions which have been read. This amendment of the Senator from Michigan proposes to let the State of Massachusetts tax this $50,000.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir. I propose that the tax shall be imposed in the State where the fund is used and where it gains its profits. I think that is fair.

Mr. HALE. I understand it. In other words, it allows the State of Massachusetts to tax the holders of personal property existing in New Hampshire, Vermont, or any other State. It seems to me that that would be a dangerous innovation and a dangerous provision, and one that the States would never submit to. Besides, you could not by this means deprive the State of the power of taxing its own citizens for its own property, and they would tax it; and in that way you would subject them to a double tax. It seems to me that it would be unjust in that respect.

I think it is obnoxious also to the criticism which the Senator from Michigan himself makes when he says we cannot give nor confer upon the States any power to tax. I agree to that entirely. We have a navy-yard situated in Massachusetts, another one situated in Maine, and another one in Pennsylvania, and they are now exempt from taxation. But suppose Congress consent that for State and municipal purposes the State of Pennsylvania or the State of Massachusetts or the cities of Boston and Philadelphia may tax the navy-yards and the property there. That is not conferring any power upon the State; but the General Government simply lets go of an exemption which they now enjoy.

It strikes me we had better leave this power of taxation of personal property where it now is; and it results in no great practical difficulty that I know of. I suppose the States all over this Union exercise the power of taxing the personal property of their citizens invested in bank shares, no matter where the banks are located. If a citizen of New York invests property in bank shares in Massachusetts, the State of New York taxes that property and the State of Massachusetts does not. Besides, it seems to me it would be unjust in many respects, because the property might be subjected to taxation in a foreign jurisdiction in which the individual who was taxed would have no interest and from which he would receive no benefit. I think it is perfectly clear, from the authorities that have been read, that this power of taxing the shares of a bank of the United States or of any bank that may be incorporated by the General Government does not come by grant from the General Government, but it resides in the States, as the exercise of a sovereign power which they have the right to exercise, to tax the property of their own citizens. It seems to me it had better be left there.

Mr. HOWARD. One word further as to the justice of this amendment, the equity of imposing a tax upon the stock by the State within whose limits the bank operates. What is this stock? In reality it is this: if I am a subscriber to one of these banks, and I reside in Boston, and become the owner of this stock, say to the amount of $10,000, and the bank is located in Detroit, Michigan, the $10,000 which I contribute as a stockholder ceases to be my personal and individual property. It passes into the possession and enters into the corporate property of the bank itself. It becomes, in short, the property of the corporation itself, and I can never withdraw it. It is, as I said before, not a jus in re but a jus ad rem; and while it is employed by its owner, the bank in Michigan, for the purpose of gaining a profit in banking transactions, I beg to know in what respect it differs from the same amount of personal property or money in the actual possession of a citizen in Michigan residing at the same place. Certainly the State has the right to tax that citizen. Why should the State then be deprived of the power of taxing this fund which is used within its limits for the purpose of making gain in precisely the same sense in which the property of an individual residing there is used? I can see no distinction in point of justice, in point of principle; as I said before, in this way this bank stock will be taxed, and the States will derive a certain amount of revenue from it; whereas, if no amendment of this kind is inserted in the bill, the right of taxation will adhere to the States within whose limits the stockholder resides. If its authorities can ascertain that he is a stockholder, they may, perhaps, impose a tax and collect it; but I tell you, sir, that in nine cases out of ten this whole fund of these stockholders will escape taxation. I think that is a danger against which we ought to guard if we can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWARD. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the vote is taken I wish to make a suggestion. I understand the Senator to propose to insert this amendment after the word "purposes."

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe that by coming in there it will make the whole clause without meaning. It will apply to the preceding sentence. If he is to move the amendment at all I think it should come in after the words "such State," in the sixty-fifth line, and be in lieu of the subsequent provision. As it is now proposed the clause will read:

From being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of all taxes imposed by or under State authority for State, county, or municipal purposes where said bank is situated.

It would hardly apply there.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the amendment is in the proper place. It strikes me that it would give the State the right of local taxation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course "all taxes imposed by or under State authority, for State or other purposes," are imposed in the State where the bank is located.

Mr. HOWARD. Not of course, Mr. President. There is the very point on which the Senator and I should differ. By the common law the owner is supposed to have the personal property about him; it pertains to his person, and if the owner does not reside in the State where the bank is, that State does not obtain the taxation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the amendment of the Senator from Michigan should be adopted, I think it will be necessary when the bill is reported to the Senate to change its phraseology a little, but we can test the sense of the Senate upon it now.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It would come in in another place a great deal better.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, and Wilkinson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—27.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to strike out in the sixty-second line of the amendment after the word "State" the words "or other," so that it will read "for State purposes."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That has already been amended. Those words have been stricken out, and the words "county or municipal" inserted, so that it reads, "State, county, or municipal purposes."

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move to strike out the words "county or municipal," so that it will read "State purposes."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not now in order, because those words have just been voted in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will not be in order in committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I offer the following proviso—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I renew the motion for an adjournment. There is no probability of getting through with this matter to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us dispose of this amendment.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; let us adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 29, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SEA-WALL AT BUFFALO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a report with reference to the sea-wall at Buffalo by Colonel J. D. Graham, United States engineer; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

TAX BILL.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to record my vote on the tax bill, as I was unable to be present last evening.

There was no objection, and Mr. ELDRIDGE recorded his vote in the negative.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I ask it be the unanimous agreement that members on both sides of the House who were not present shall have the right to record their votes on the passage of the tax bill.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I object. Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. If I had been here I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the members ought also to have the privilege of recording their votes on all questions before the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That might change the result on some of the amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I object. It is the duty of members to be present attending to the public business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I had no idea that the vote would be taken on the tax bill so early in the evening as it was. I was on my way to the House when I heard that the vote had been taken and the bill disposed of. I therefore ask that I shall have leave to record my vote. I should have voted against the bill had I been here.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. ANDERSON stated that if he had been present he would have voted in favor of the passage of the tax bill.

IOWA MAIL FACILITIES.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, submitted the joint resolution of the State of Iowa asking for additional mail facilities; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COLE, of California. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to make a report from the select committee on the Pacific railroad that it may be ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I object.

CHARGES AGAINST A MEMBER.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to call up the report of the special committee appointed to investigate the charge against Hon. F. P. BLAIR, presented by Hon. J. W. McClurg, for the purpose of having it, together with the evidence, ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCLURG. In accordance with the notice I gave on Saturday last, the tax bill having been disposed of, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise to a point of order. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. A question of privilege called up by the gentleman from California, who has charge of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it a question of privilege with respect to any but the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR?]

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege could not be confined to any particular member, but, as in contested elections, all members are interested in it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the Chair will pardon me for asking a question. What constitutes it a question of privilege except that it affected the private character of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] who is not here?

The SPEAKER. It affects a member of the House, and is therefore a question of privilege.

Mr. VOORHEES. To the House, or to him alone?

The SPEAKER. To the House as well as to himself. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] put it upon the ground that if the charges were true he was not fit to be a member of the House.

Mr. CLAY. My opinion is that it has already been ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. A motion to print was pending when the gentleman from Missouri made his speech, and then the question went over.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is it not the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] had to obtain unanimous consent to speak?

The SPEAKER. The Globe of yesterday states the matter correctly. There was a motion pending, made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill, and the Chair then decided as follows:

"The gentleman from California has a right to present his report as a matter of privilege, if the gentleman from Vermont withdraws his motion."

Mr. VOORHEES. The gentleman from California used the following language, to which I heard no dissent from the Chair:

"I understand that it is in the power of any one member to object; that unanimous consent is required for the gentleman from Missouri to proceed, without my motion. I prefer, therefore, to leave it to the House, and withdraw the motion to lay it upon the table."

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not responsible for what other gentlemen may state, although he is for what he states himself. If he were to interpose always when gentlemen make statements in regard to parliamentary proceedings, he would be occupying more time than the House might deem proper. The Chair remembers remarking that if the motion to lay upon the table were withdrawn, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] would be entitled to the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. I only want the report and evidence printed. I think that they should be printed; and I shall seek an opportunity, when the testimony is printed, to rise to a question of privilege, in order to place myself right upon this matter before the House. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. McClurg,] by some understanding with the House, has an opportunity to speak, and if he seeks that opportunity now it is by no understanding with me. I have risen for the purpose, and for no other, of having this report printed. This case is in the hands of the House and not in mine.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that by no understanding of the Chair with the gentleman from Missouri is that gentleman upon the floor now. The gentleman rose upon his own motion. The Chair was not aware that he intended to rise; but as he did rise he has a right to proceed.

Mr. McCLURG commenced his remarks, but before he had proceeded far was interrupted by

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri are not in order. He must confine himself to the report of the select committee.

Mr. McCLURG. I merely made these remarks as introductory to what I have to say upon this report.

The SPEAKER. If the House grants unanimous consent to the gentleman as it did to his colleague, [Mr. BLAIR,] to proceed without regard to the rules the Chair has no objection; but without that, the Chair must hold, as he did in the case of his colleague, that the gentleman must confine himself to the report of the select committee.

Mr. STEVENS. It will be remembered that after the same ruling the other day in reference to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] the House allowed him to go on in his own way. I move that the same course be pursued in reference to the gentleman now upon the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. There can be no earthly objection.

No objection being made, Mr. McCLURG was allowed to proceed in his own way.

Mr. McCLURG. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with notice given last Saturday, as labors have ended upon the tax bill, I rise to a question of privilege on the motion to print the evidence and report of the committee appointed to investigate the charges said to have been made by myself against Hon. F. P. BLAIR, member from the first district of Missouri, and to inquire into the truth or falsity of a certain alleged liquor order. I regret it was not the pleasure of the House for me to speak then while "the military member" [Mr. BLAIR] was present. It will be remembered I desired to speak then, but submitted to a vote of the House desirous of considering the tax bill; neither do I consider it unfair for me now, in his absence, to comment on the testimony when the first assault in this House was made by this military "member," and in a clandestine manner by inserting his personal remarks, not uttered in the House, into his printed speech. But I regret the necessity of asking the attention of the House to the subject now presented when the people are calling for immediate action upon bills of importance to our afflicted country. But, forced into my present position by another, I also regret that I cannot ask your indulgence beyond the one-hour rule. It is impossible in one hour to do justice to the case and properly expose the witnesses, from their own testimony, who have come forward and testified, as I believe I can show, to save themselves or others from disgrace. I desire to show up in distinct colors those who would rule, in corruption, my beloved but unfortunate State, and who have their counterparts in the other border slave States.

As my language will go to the public, it is due to myself, to truth, and the cause of freedom in Missouri, on which my heart is fixed, to remind this House, and thus inform the country, that I was drawn reluctantly into this discussion, that I was forced into it, that I remained in almost disgraceful silence after I had been, without provocation, attacked in my character for truthfulness by a colleague—excuse me, "the military member" from the first district, [Mr. BLAIR]—on the 5th day of February last, and until after a second attack by the same "member" on the 27th day of the same month. In his first attack he spoke distinctly of the four radicals from his State, and in reference to General Schofield said: "After accepting the concession, these parties flew from their agreement." Notwithstanding a colleague from the seventh district [Mr. LOAN] in a personal explanation pronounced it "false," thereby directing his, "the military member's" [Mr. BLAIR's] attention to his language, he did not in his second speech, although twenty-two days after the first, retract, but attempted to add insult to injury. It was after all this that I condescended to make a defense, and still "the military member" [Mr. BLAIR] had the audacity on the 23d instant to say that "vindictive persons had pursued him to this place." It is known to all that he first attacked. The radical members from his State had agreed with themselves to remain silent with regard to the past if unprovoked, believing it possible he might, if left to himself, advance again to the attack he had once led upon the enemy of the country, slavery, and rejoin those who had outstripped him, and regardless of him, were pressing up the heights and driving back the foe. But he went over to the enemy and attacked his former friends who had never on any occasion abused him.

In my defense I did not therefore conceive it to be my duty merely to have parried off his thrusts at my character, but, having been forced by him into the contest, to bring down a few blows upon the head of one I regarded and still regard as a political trickster, that his future attacks upon myself or others would be weakened and powerless for harm; to exhibit the character of one who would make all others bow before him, not because of worth, but because of the fortuitous position of birth and a name which he has failed to honor. His own conduct, therefore, as you know, forced me to notice him. The result was he was unable to defend himself in arguments and facts, and called for a committee of investigation on what he called "the charge of violating the laws in the matter of an alleged liquor speculation." We will therefore see what charges I made and whether or no I am sustained by the evidence. My belief is that if I had made a direct charge of "violating the laws in the matter of an alleged liquor speculation" I could sustain the charge and myself before an impartial and intelligent public. But I did not so charge. What was my language? We will refer to the Globe—good authority—of 12th March, containing my speech of the 9th. My language appears as follows:

"My colleague from the first district has much to say about trade regulations, 'trade friends,' 'trade stores.' It may therefore be well to display without comment, for they are a commentary within themselves, the copies of a certain 'order' and certain 'invoice,' and which will not be denied to be true copies of the originals, to which access can be had in a proper manner."

Copies of the order and invoice are then set forth. My language then is:

"It is only necessary to say they did not reach their destination. Trade regulations prevented. Probably $30,000 were not made. Politicians should have some honorable way of making bread and meat when they do not own lead mines. Probably there was an interference when an attempt may have been made to smuggle liquors contrary to existing regulations. Fortunes in anticipation from sale of poor whisky at rich prices may have been lost."

Not another word in my speech of March 9 did I utter with regard to the order or the speculation. Is there in them a charge of violating laws? Nothing of the kind. There is no charge. And if the "military member" had remained as cool as he should be when going into battle, and had asserted the order to have been altered from a small amount, the whole liquor discussion might there have ended. But he could not control his vindictive spirit, and took occasion to again attack the Secretary of the Treasury through the special agents. He directly, in emphatic language, charged two of the agents with forgery, and gave the name of Mr. Bonner as one. We now know he alluded to Michael Powers, his own agent "to procure the liquors," as the other; and it is in evidence that he was never what is known as a Treasury agent, but had been, prior to the purchase of liquors, a steamboat revenue aid, appointed by Mr. Howard, a witness in this case, collector of the port at St. Louis, a personal and political friend of "the member," [Mr. BLAIR,] appointed, not by Mr. Chase, but by the President, and that appointment procured, Mr. Howard in his testimony "supposes," through his friend "the member," [Mr. BLAIR,] All this is in the evidence. But the name of Mr. Powers, who, as it appears in the testimony, held letters of recommendation from the "military member," was not mentioned. Mr. Bonner's name was made prominent because he was not a political friend. He, "the member," [Mr. BLAIR,] used this language in his interruption:

"It is acknowledged now to have been a forgery on the part of these two agents of Mr. Chase." * * * * *

"When these miserable miscreants committed this forgery."

Now, as I remarked, it is in evidence Powers never was a Treasury agent, and at date of the purchase of liquors was not even a revenue aid. It is also in evidence that Mr. Bonner was not a Treasury agent until weeks after the purchase and shipment, and knew nothing about the case until after the seizure of the liquors at Cairo. And it is not in evidence that the order was ever under the control of any one except Powers, the agent of "the military member," after it was delivered to him and before it went into the customhouse. He and his friends wrote and signed and controlled it. And in the face of this positive testimony, which I hope will be printed, that it may be read by the public, "the general-member" [Mr. BLAIR] on last Saturday said, "Evidence shows that the forgery was made public by a Treasury agent, who knew it to be of that character." I assert the evidence does not so show. It shows only that Mr. Bonner did what any honest office-holder should do: gave to one of the sovereign people a copy of the order and invoice, not believing that the corruption of those in power should be kept concealed. It shows that Mr. Bonner never acknowledged that he believed there was a forgery. To be sure, Mr. Howard testifies that he (Bonner) "tacitly" acknowledged it; acknowledged by saying nothing. I say Mr. Howard, who I will show you, before I close, contradicts himself when on oath.

Now, as "the general-member" [Mr. BLAIR] has uttered as a fact what the testimony proves to be false, I merely ask, what are the anonymous letters worth which he produced and read containing denunciations of Secretary Chase? The letters may be genuine; they may not. They may be from those of like character with himself. I shall not, therefore, be led away from the points in this case to an unnecessary defense of the Secretary of the Treasury. I will only remark I am a great admirer of the photographic art, and will imagine a scene that may find its way to canvas and appear among others of the naval engagements of this war: a mammoth iron-clad with six-inch plating, the S. P. Chase, lying undisturbed upon the bosom of the quiet deep, and "an individual," bearing the name of a major general, firing upon her paper wads from an alder popgun, and the sentinel not aroused from his slumber. As my speech will show, I then stated that I would retract if Mr. Bonner's acknowledgment should be at any time presented. I remained in silence two weeks. "The member" [Mr. BLAIR] did not produce Mr. Bonner's acknowledgment, nor did he retract. It therefore became incumbent upon me to defend Mr. Bonner against so false a charge. When on the 23d March I did so, and had Mr. Bonner's letter read, what charge did I make? None but what I am sustained in by the evidence. And it was to investigate "the charge" made in this speech that "the military member" [Mr. BLAIR] called for a committee. The most pointed language used in those remarks upon which it is possible to base anything like a "charge" is the following:

"What becomes of his maddened attempt to relieve himself of the 'suspicion' of an effort to speculate by smuggling liquors in violation of regulations?"

If afterwards I use the words "condemned criminal" in comparison, they could only apply to the charge "of suspicion." I will show you enough in the testimony to convince you that he was suspected, that he should have been suspected, and that, by this investigation, he has indelibly stamped "suspicion" upon his character. An intelligent public will pronounce a correct verdict, and consign to a political grave a political demagogue.

I say "suspicion." Let us see the language of his own witnesses and friends on this point, for no others did he have, save a Mr. Finney, whose testimony is so insignificant and manifestly partial that I shall not further notice him.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to remark to the gentleman that being a member of the committee, I patiently heard all the testimony in the case, and there is not a particle of evidence going to show that General BLAIR was implicated in this matter at all. There was not even a suspicion cast upon him. The matter is as plain as day is from night. There was not one particle of evidence during that whole investigation showing, or tending to show, that Mr. BLAIR was engaged in liquor speculation.

Mr. McCLURG. My speech may go forward to the public, and they will judge for themselves. I here give the language of that testimony, and I contend that it does throw suspicion upon him. If I come to a false conclusion, it is my fault; if the House come to a false conclusion, it is their business and not mine. I will give the language, and I am willing that it should go before the public in that way.

But before I proceed to the definite language of the witnesses, I wish to give you a hasty insight into the case from a correct point of view. Then I will endeavor to make your view more distinct. The order was signed by "the military member" [Mr. BLAIR] as general commanding a division near Vicksburg, 3d June, 1863, and by eight of his staff officers, the last one, Doyle, having signed it at Memphis. The order empowered one Michael Powers to procure liquors, &c., "for their own use." The order, according to its present face, is for twenty-five gallons brandy "each," and other articles in proportion, such as whisky, ale, wines, cigars, &c. The order is as appears in the photographs now distributed in the House. Michael Powers, the agent, purchased from one David Nicholson of St. Louis, as the original invoice will show, which is in evidence, nine times, * with two small variations, the amounts of each article named in the order, interpreting the order as it reads, "each" being after the word brandy, the first item, and dotted for the others, nine being the number of officers. The shipment was made and the application for the shipment was made at the custom-house, and permit granted. Mr. Howard, the friend of "the general-member," [Mr. BLAIR] is the custom-house officer, the collector of the port. The original application for the permit to ship is in evidence, and that application embodies the affidavit of a clerk of Mr. Nicholson, who sold the liquors, &c., his statement, sworn to, that "the goods, wares, and merchandise are owned by Powers," and again that "M. Powers is the owner," &c. This application and affidavit are dated 15th June, 1863.

The liquors, &c., succeeded in reaching a point near Vicksburg; but a military order of General Grant, dated 15th June, prevented their going ashore in a formal manner. They remained in the boat, (so much as were not sold or used up,) and after some weeks were seized at Cairo on their passage up the river by the collector for alleged violation of regulations. At length Mr. Bonner, special Treasury agent at St. Louis, the same individual who is charged with forgery by "the member," [Mr. BLAIR] who was not appointed an agent for weeks after the purchase and shipment, ordered the liquors, &c., to St. Louis, and turned them over by his order to the owner, Mr. Powers, and he immediately to Mr. Nicholson, who, you will see, swears he was, and who acts as the owner. They arrived at St. Louis in process of time. A loss was the result to somebody, if testimony be true. Bad feelings were aroused.

Treasury agents were abused. A defense had to be made. The newspapers were resorted to. The so-called "liquor speculation" was discussed; it was defended; it was excused. Letters were written early in September by Mr. Nicholson, the vender of "the goods." Those letters are in evidence. In October, Michael Powers, the agent, appeared in a published letter excusing "the member" for having signed the order, as the sutlers were selling at prices too high to the soldiers. The order and invoice appeared in the newspapers, and "the Blair liquor speculation" became a subject of common conversation. During that entire discussion it was never intimated by either "the member" [Mr. BLAIR] or by any of his friends to the public that a forgery had been committed. This is the evidence. Notwithstanding "the member" was in St. Louis in July, which will not be denied, and it is in evidence he was there in September, and made a speech, in which he abused Mr. Chase, and notwithstanding it is in evidence that the witnesses, the staff officers, and Mr. Howard and Mr. Nicholson saw the publication of the order and invoice, still, as they themselves testify, there was no allegation that a forgery had been committed. Nothing of the kind appeared until a letter of Mr. Howard appeared in print, dated 4th of February last, and that was indefinite in its language, and three or four months after the lengthy discussion. Therefore there was before the public prima facie evidence that somebody violated the "laws in the matter of an alleged liquor speculation." As "the member's" [Mr. BLAIR's] name was about that time prominent as one indorsing an emancipation ordinance, "declaring slaves free at their death," and as his name was first to this order for liquor, it was natural and reasonable that "suspicion" should have rested upon him.

Then when he, unprovoked, attacked my character twice, was it to be expected that I would not let fly an arrow, knowing him to be vulnerable not only in the heel, but in all parts of his body? And was it to be supposed I would not aim at a vital point? The poisoned arrow which deprived "the member" of his self-possession was the words, "how can he relieve himself of the suspicion?" The committee is constituted to investigate, and the vender of the liquors, the collector who permitted the shipment, and four staff officers, whose names are signed by themselves to the order, interested witnesses, appear to testify. I produce, of course, the prima facie proof, the order. They swear that the amount of the order has been increased by addition of figures and the word "each." I might here let the case rest, as I have made no charge except of "suspicion," and as there is not one word of evidence to show, indeed, no attempt to show, that Mr. Bonner heard of the order until the liquors were seized at Cairo. I have made no charge, and Mr. Bonner is proven not to be a forger, which "the member" distinctly charged him to be. But had I been disposed to have not argued this case further than this point, and to have suffered "the member" to escape unharmed, in case he had shown that magnanimity which I am satisfied an innocent man would have shown when apparently a load of suspicion was removed, all such disposition was eradicated by "the member" himself, by his cross-examination of Mr. Bonner, which covers fifty-seven pages of foolscap paper, throughout which his vindictive spirit is clearly manifest. I am under no obligations to be lenient, and it is my duty to give fearlessly my opinion formed from the testimony. The frowns of those I shall speak of I do not fear; their favors I do not ask. I shall give testimony as the reasons for my opinions. If testimony shall not sustain them of course they will be harmless. If it should the public should know them.

On page 18, of the manuscript testimony, Captain George A. Maguire, a staff officer, who signed the order, testifies that "the affair, commonly called 'BLAIR's liquor speculation,' was discussed in the papers of St. Louis." On page 22 a letter or card of Captain Maguire appears, dated 28th March last, last month, after my speech of 23d, when I exhibited the order, and he says "the question of General BLAIR's liquor speculation" having been recently renewed by the agents of the Treasury Department, &c.—"renewed." It had been. On page 35 "the member's" [Mr. BLAIR's] first question to his own witness, Mr. Howard, collector, is, "Do you recollect anything in regard to this order for stores, liquors, &c., which has been so much commented on in the newspapers, called the 'BLAIR liquor speculation'?" And the answer is, "I do not recollect a great deal about it until after it was seized and made a matter of notoriety." On pages 55 and 60 this witness testifies that "during the months of September and October, 1863, he saw the discussion in regard to the 'so-called liquor speculation'." On page 73, the first question asked by "the member" of Mr. Nicholson, his own witness, the vender of the goods, is, "Did you ship the goods named in this 'famous BLAIR liquor speculation'?" On page 116, is a lengthy printed publication signed by this same David Nicholson, dated 31st October, 1863, and this communication has for its caption, "More of that liquor speculation." Still, as I have said, not one word, in all their communications, is uttered intimating a forgery until in February, 1864, and then the language is indefinite. "The member," in attempting to prove that Mr. Bonner knew of the forgery, asked Mr. Howard, I believe, with apparent astonishment, if Mr. Bonner knew it for three months, and would not do him the justice to publish it. With astonishment may I not ask why "the member's" personal friends, the collector, the merchant, his staff officers, who have lately come to the rescue, suffered at least four months to pass without attempting to do him justice, when, during that time, printed letters, making excuses for having signed the order, appeared?

Captain Maguire, who does not appear in the testimony in a very enviable light, which I will show should I have the time, on page 19, after saying he looked over the order and invoice a few days after the publication and satisfied himself that the forgeries had been committed, testified that he stated it was a forgery, "to all his friends." Still, he testified that about that time he did not write and have published a card. Why did he not come to the rescue of his friend at that time, when he could have so easily defended him by exposing the forgery? Why did none of his friends? He stated it to "all his friends." Surely a staff officer had friends who were friends of the general. But none would defend him. On page 21, he, Captain Maguire, says "he saw two communications from Mr. Nicholson and one from Michael Powers and did not recollect that they stated it was a forgery." And, on same page, he testified "he did not see in any of those communications that a forgery had been committed." But he had satisfied himself and he and "all his friends" remained silent. But he did not show himself a lagard, when, on the 28th March, he dated a printed letter, after the exposure in this House on the 9th and again on the 23d of that month. We can suppose there was time for a proper understanding.

Even Collector Howard, the personal and political friend, and who "supposes" "the member" used his influence to have him appointed to office of collector, did not come to his friend's relief, but in silence suffered him abused, for he testifies, on page 39, that he "thought he discovered the alterations and forgery some time in September or October, after the order had been published." Still this same partisan friend, after publicity of the order, remained silent until the 4th of February last, when he appeared in a letter published and in evidence on page 36 and said that Mr. Bonner would inform that the documents, on which the charge of "General BLAIR's liquor speculation" is founded, "are base forgeries." He commences his testimony by saying, "the presentation of the original papers by Colonel McCLURG, in the House of Representatives on the 23d of March, 1864, demands this explanation." The presentation of the copies to the public in September or October did not demand from this personal and political friend even a letter to the public for four months. And when, on the 8th of February last, a letter appeared in the papers from Mr. Bonner, to disgrace whom the attempt has been so persistently made, which, in his too great kindness, he was induced to write by "the member's" friends, in which he did not inform the public as Mr. Howard had expressed, but stated merely that Mr. Howard stated that a member of General BLAIR's staff had, on examination of the paper, pronounced the word "each," as it appeared in the order, also the last item on the order, as forgeries, and that Mr. Howard also gave it as his opinion at the time that the same were forgeries and that to his mind there was a dissimilarity between the words mentioned and the body of the order; yet he (Howard) did not object but suffered the charge against his friend to remain with such an explanation for two months more, until he was called to the witness-stand. Still "the member" asks for a committee to investigate my charge: "how does he expect to relieve himself of suspicion?" He did not in September attempt to remove it; when absent his friends did not; when again in St. Louis in December he did not. Why, it even appears on page 50, from Mr. Howard's own testimony, notwithstanding he severely censured Mr. Bonner for giving a copy of the order, that, in his anxiety for his friend, he underscored some words and figures and sent the original order by mail to the President, and that it was seen by the Postmaster General also. But the forgery was not apparent enough for them to have made a publication in "the member's" behalf. Could it then be expected that I would not suspect, who had not at the time of my first speech seen the order; when now, having seen it and heard witnesses, I conscientiously believe every word and figure to have been made by Captain E. M. Joel, except the last item of canned fruits? If no suspicion, what had removed it? There was no proof, no declarations. I think, then, that if my language amounted to a charge at all, I stand justified in the opinion of all.

But I will now ask in all sincerity, where do those nine officers who signed that order stand? By their own testimony, if they are not guilty—those who testified—of perjury, they are morally, every one who has had knowledge of a forgery, guilty of that forgery. If their testimony be true, they knew the order went into the hands of Michael Powers, their own agent, and that as he made the purchase and shipment, and the order was enlarged to enable him to do so, he committed the forgery or procured it done. By their own testimony they knew of the forgery for months and remained silent, although their own characters were suffering. From their own mouths are they condemned. They knew a felony had been committed. "The member" knew it, for, as is in evidence by Mr. Howard, "he [Mr. BLAIR] wrote from the Army that a forgery had been committed," but he did not produce the letter. They knew who the felon was. They concealed the crime and the criminal, not only for a day or a week, but for months. If not accessories before the fact, by their own testimony they are after the fact; certainly morally if not legally. They will so stand condemned in the eyes of God and man. "The member" would not have him—Powers—who is guilty, by their direct testimony, if any one is, of the forgery, subpoenaed as a witness. I did, knowing he could give the required light. Before I put him on the witness-stand, I informed the committee I knew what he would swear to. He testified as he stated to me, and covered himself with shame, if capable of shame. I did not believe his testimony. I do not now. Even upon the witness-stand "the member" came to the defense of him he would have us believe committed the forgery; for so soon as he—Powers—had testified to answer "the member's" purposes, as it would seem, he came to his relief and objected to my question, saying "I had no right to bring down my own witness;" but he should have added his own friend, either the perjurer or the forger, who knew how to testify so as not to criminate himself, as it is but reasonable to suppose he had been taught.

But there is another proposition I will make which will scarcely be controverted. It is this: "The member" [Mr. BLAIR] and staff officers are not only morally but legally bound by the acts of Michael Powers. He was their agent; and, admitting for argument's sake for the time being the forgery to have been committed, they ratified his acts. Their subsequent silence was a ratification and adoption of the acts of the agent by the principals. In sixty-sixth section, second volume, Greenleaf on Evidence, the truth of this proposition is enforced in these words:

"When the principal is once fully informed what has been done in his behalf, he is bound, if dissatisfied, to express his dissatisfaction within a reasonable time, and if he does not his assent will be presumed."

Then it is hardly competent for these principals to come in, interested witnesses, and by their own oaths repudiate the acts of their own agent. It is hardly competent for them to censure others for confirming, in words, the truth of what they themselves were confirming in actions.

Do I not therefore stand guiltless of undue severity in my language when I made the charge of "suspicion?" Is it improper to breathe "suspicion" upon one when exalted when the same act would brand the humble citizen with infamy? Are the exalted not to be brought low by their complicity in crime or acts in violation of laws? The people will answer that question correctly, and, thank God, they, the honest masses, constitute a tribunal, a committee of the whole, that never fails to pronounce a correct verdict. To that tribunal this case will go, and I doubt not the result.

My only witnesses examined were Mr. Powers, the agent of "the member," Mr. Bonner, and a Mr. Conner, of Washington city. Mr. Conner was summoned merely to show an irregularity even in Captain Joel's signatures by producing a number from the quartermaster's department. Mr. Bonner was only subpoenaed that he might defend himself against the charge of forgery made by my colleague. My only reliance, therefore, to convince others that my opinion is correct, is upon the testimony of my colleague's interested witnesses. My candid, deliberate conviction that Captain Joel wrote all, except "25 box can fruits," and that all the staff officers and my colleague were cognizant of the same; that when they were detected they conceived it to be better for one to suffer than all, and better for that one to be the more obscure and unfortunate one, rather than a major general and staff, if that individual could be induced to take the whole load of disgrace upon himself. To be sure, in doing so, he would not so testify as to jeopardize his liberty by confinement within the walls of a penitentiary. His having written "25 box can fruits," probably, and I think most probably, by consent, but certainly afterwards, as I have shown, acquiesced in, would aid in placing suspicion on him; but it would not be necessary, if subpoenaed, to criminate himself, and he would be able to explain it away as a good opportunity to make some money. And who knows that he has not made money by testifying as he has? If guilty of a high crime, as his own testimony indicates, to make money, would he not perjure himself for money? I am irresistibly brought to this conclusion by the appearance of the order itself and by the testimony of these interested witnesses. In the remaining time left me I cannot do justice to them. My analysis must be too brief. Either one would require my whole remaining time.

Captain George A. Maguire, of the staff, testified that he signed the order, but did not know at first where, but recollected "very distinctly what was in it," even without inspecting the order. But subsequent testimony disclosed the fact that he had examined the order months before in St. Louis, and another witness testified that "a photographic copy of the order obtained from me had been examined in Washington city by the staff." Of course his testimony corresponded with Captain Joel's: "that the word 'each' was inserted, the item of canned fruits added, the first five twos and three in first column prefixed, the fours in twenty-four boxes Catawba and claret altered from sixes, (which is the only perceptible truth in the whole, except the canned fruits), the cipher added in thirty boxes cigars, the cipher added in twenty boxes champagne, and doubts as to whether four boxes tobacco is or not an alteration from one," (and the sixes may have been altered to fours by Captain Joel.) This is the same witness, Maguire, that discovered the forgery months since, but remained silent, but now comes boldly up to the work. He remembered "very distinctly," at length, Powers "coming to Haines's Bluff, on a mule." It was seven to eleven miles from the boats. "He [Powers] offered to bring down a small lot of liquors and cigars." "He made the offer." "He had more facilities." "Liquors, &c., that were shipped to us were constantly stopped by special Treasury aids and revenue aids and were seized." "Captain Joel was our quartermaster, and wrote the order, and presented it to us." "We signed it." "I examined it." "It was a very small one."

Let us notice whether or no his language does not recoil and show corruption and falsity on its face so as to destroy his testimony. Mr. Powers, who, as in evidence, was "not a personal friend," but bore "letters of recommendation" from "the member," [Mr. BLAIR,] rode fourteen to twenty-two miles on a mule, in June, in a hot climate, to "offer" to "bring down a small lot of liquors!" One instance of disinterested benevolence! They cannot now say his object was to commit a forgery, for his request, "not being a friend," was unreasonable, and, if true, he would have been suspected. Captain Joel says he remained at headquarters that day. But we were not informed whether or no he slept with the general, "who was not a personal friend," to talk over the "sheriff's bonds" against themselves, (and I might say the judgments for twenty to thirty thousand dollars; but that is not in evidence, as it was left out of Mr. Powers's testimony from considerations on my part that I consider were afterwards abused by the "general member,") or merely to procure those "letters of recommendation" which Mr. Powers admitted he had. He "offered" to bring. Ah! there is such a thing as proving too much. No less than four times, in one answer to one question did this witness use this language, on pages 13 and 14.

I have not time to describe the affecting scene which can be imagined at headquarters (and which might be photographed to grace bar-rooms) when in the morning this benevolent man (Powers) on his mule took his departure; and the many admiring eyes followed him as his retreating form disappeared in the distance, and heartfelt wishes ascended that there might be a speedy return of the "whisky" and "brandy," which soothe all care, drive away fogs and sorrows, and aid in charging fortifications. He bore the order which would bring gladness and comfort to nine officers, and, of course, many friends. And, according to the testimony of these witnesses, what was it? Five gallons brandy, five gallons whisky, three boxes cigars, and a few other articles! The enormous quantity of one third of a box of cigars each and two and two ninths of a quart of whisky and same of brandy! And to procure this supply a major general and one of his staff, the quartermaster, signed the order, and that quartermaster hunted up and presented it to six other staff officers for their signatures, and the ninth signed it at Memphis. Why was all this necessary for two and two ninths quarts each of whisky, and two and two ninths quarts of brandy? There is too much proven. Why, Mr. Howard, the collector of the port, testified, in one answer, that the name of a general was sufficient, (meaning for any amount;) and here we have the names of nine for a morning dram! And we are told by a witness that Powers could take the liquors down without charge and without interruption. That is, Michael Powers could run the gauntlet between the Treasury agents; and Captain Maguire on that point indulges in these words: "Liquors, &c., that were shipped to us were constantly stopped by special Treasury aids." Of course, shipments were constantly being made to have been constantly stopped, and the disappointment was so great that in that warm climate the thirst became intense, and in desperation it was resolved to have two quarts each, &c.; and, to obtain it, to become accessories before the fact to a violation of the regulations, as implied in the fact that liquors were being stopped by the Treasury agents. This they knew, for one most aggravated case is mentioned by Captain Joel, the quartermaster, who "went with some others of the member's" staff officers to the custom-house at Cairo, and found an "empty demijohn there with General Blair's name on it, a three or a five-gallon demijohn!" We were not informed who emptied it or how many demijohns might have been found all along the river with General Blair's name and empty. I doubt not the whole truth would make an interesting record.

Of this witness, Captain Maguire, I have only time to add that he testified as to when he first saw the original order after its publication, and then, in a printed letter of 28th March, 1864, which he indorsed as true under oath, he states, in referring to the second time he attempted to see it, that he was informed at the custom-house that Mr. Bonner had "purloined" it. It is clearly shown by Mr. Bonner's and Mr. Howard's testimony that Captain Maguire's statement was false, although Mr. Howard attempted deception by giving the names of those who could give information at the custom-house, whom, on cross-examination, he acknowledged to be only porters. The maxim, "false in one, false in all," brings the whole testimony of this witness to the ground. And he, as is in evidence, some months since stated to friends that "each" and "canned fruits" were forgeries, and then comes and testifies distinctly to additions of figures, two and a three and two ciphers. And he testifies that the order "plainly shows the forgeries in a different handwriting from the body of the permit," to discover the falsity of which it is only necessary for any man to inspect the order.

Another witness, Dr. Franklin, the surgeon, a staff officer, I will pass by. It may be his first erroneous step; it may be his last. His recollection seemed distinct. He had seen the photograph; he "did not read the communications," as he did not "take the papers," and immediately says, "I saw the publication of it in the paper."

In turning attention to Mr. Howard I regret I cannot pay more respect to this personal and political friend of "the member." He is collector of the port, grants permits for shipments, &c. As to questions of veracity between himself and Mr. Bonner, irrelevant to the case, I must pass by them. Where the two are known, Mr. Bonner cannot suffer. For my present purpose, it is enough to show he contradicts himself, and at last is compelled to disclose the fact that he violated the regulations, and, of course, then, his oath of office, in granting the permit to ship the liquors. And here I would direct attention to the language of the committee in their report. The language is correct, but minds of others may be misled. The committee say, "At the time the order was delivered to Powers there was no law or military regulation in any way prohibiting it."

Mr. CLAY. I think the whole point of this part of the gentleman's speech is founded upon a mistaken idea. If I understand the facts, Mr. BLAIR never charged Mr. Bonner with forgery at all. He charged one of the agents with forgery and another with publishing the forged order. Mr. Bonner is the one he charged with publishing. Therefore, the burden of this part of the gentleman's speech, trying to convince the House that he charged Bonner with the forgery, is without foundation, for that charge was never made by Mr. BLAIR at all.

As to the matter of trade regulations, there were no trade regulations as we could understand from the collector. He said decidedly that there were no trade regulations, and that the permit was not given in violation of any orders whatever. That is my understanding, and that is the statement of the collector of the port. Therefore I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken in stating that the committee overlooked the matter.

Mr. McCLURG. I think the gentleman will be convinced, when I shall have quoted the language of the witness, that he did knowingly violate the regulations. I am aware that in the haste of the committee they overlooked that portion of the testimony, and I will make that clear to the gentleman himself before I am done. In the quotations I have made from the remarks of the military gentleman it is shown that he did distinctly make an allegation of forgery against Mr. Bonner. It is most clear and definite.

Bear in mind the committee say only that there was no regulation prohibiting "the order." That is true; a general could order what he pleased. But the committee do not say there was no violation of regulations in making the shipment. "The general member" did not violate the regulations in making the order; but Mr. Howard, the collector, as his own testimony shows, and Mr. Powers, the agent, violated the regulations by permitting and making the shipment; and I contend that the silence of these parties ratified all that was done and made the violation of regulations their own.

On Mr. Howard's cross-examination, page 55, he answered that "the regulations of the Treasury Department and military orders" governed him. To another question he answered, "I think then (meaning June, 1863) they could ship on a military order solely; of a major general's, for instance. Now I think the signature of the commander of the district is required, as well as that of the general commanding. There are now two." That answer not satisfying me, I asked, "Whose signature was required in June, 1863?" The answer came: "I think that of the major general commanding the department or district." The truth at last came contradicting his former testimony. "The member" [Mr. BLAIR] did not command a department or a district, but a division, as designated in the order itself, in his signature. This true answer is confirmed by Mr. Bonner, the special Treasury agent. Then, what is Mr. Howard's testimony worth? What value can be given to his opinions? What to his judgment, when he underscored, as forgeries, four figures and words and left five not underscored, which some others testify to as palpable forgeries?

A few words as to Mr. Nicholson, another witness, who sold the liquors. He testifies that he is the owner; that he and Powers were the only ones interested; that he sustained losses, saying nothing about Powers's losses. He testifies that they were turned over again to the owner, and that they were turned over to Mr. Powers. Here is a contradiction. The invoice is made out to Mr. Powers, and Mr. Nicholson's clerk swears "Powers is the owner." The bill of lading shows "M. P." as the mark, and it is sworn to as correct. There are printed letters of this witness in evidence, in which he writes authoritatively as the owner. He paid the five per cent. at the custom-house. This witness, as his testimony shows, labors to establish the belief that the Treasury agents are corrupt plunderers, seizing goods without giving receipts, and not accounting for the same, but appropriating to their own use. And when I attempted to, and did show by himself, that the liquors, &c., were in charge of his own clerk, specially appointed, he even attempted to disguise the truth by saying "they were in the hold of the boat, if that was being in his charge." But he had to acknowledge that the liquors, &c., were in the charge of his clerk and Mr. Powers, his clerk being present all the time, until they arrived at Cairo, and he had to acknowledge that he sold a part of the "canned fruits" and butter, and fifty half barrels ale, and that he could produce no account of what arrived at Cairo, merely relying upon a statement of the clerk, who may have disposed of much more. There is further proof, in Captain Maguire's testimony, that he "thought they (those who gave the order) procured some of those liquors, &c., from Powers by an order from General Grant's adjutant." There is not a word of evidence, as the committee will say, to show that a Treasury agent committed a wrong, except in not rigidly enforcing the regulations and disposing of these liquors, &c., for the Government. For it will be remembered there was no order or permission for the purchase from a department or district commander, and nothing to show that a shipment of one dollar's worth of liquor without such order was not a violation of the regulations. The regulations made no difference, although a custom was yielded to. Mr. Howard, however, testified that he "thought all orders (large and small) required the words in the order before us, 'for our own use.'" And this in part accounts for those words being in this order.

I leave the witness Nicholson to drown his conscience in liquors and sustain his character at home. Before proceeding to the next witness, I will state that Mr. Howard produced a memorandum book of Mr. Powers to prove that "25 box can fruits" and "each" and the additional figures were made by Mr. Powers. I believe after an examination of that book "25 box can fruits" to have been written by Mr. Powers, but whether consent of the principals was given or not it was useless for me to attempt to prove. The word "each" and other figures resemble those in Powers's book about as much as an ox cart resembles a pleasure carriage. It is evident to any observer that "can fruits" and "each" were not written by the same hand.

Now, my few remaining minutes to the last, but not least, witness, I shall notice—Captain E. M. Joel, the quartermaster, who acknowledges to have written the body of the order.

Bear in mind that positive swearing does not always convict even of the crime of murder. A perjurer might acknowledge himself guilty to save friends, character being gone and the grave opening to receive him. But he would not be recognized, if the footprints of another, marked with blood, were truly traced from the bleeding corpse.

We will see the evidences of guilt, in my opinion, covering this witness. On page 4 "the member" asked the question, "Is there a palpable difference between the additions and the body of the order as written by you?" The answer is, "Yes, sir; there is a very large difference." Question. "Compare the capital E in your signature with the same letter in the word 'each.'" The answer is, "The letter has no resemblance to my style of writing." Therefore, on page 6, I ask this witness to point out in what respect the figure 2 in the line "2 doz. bitters," acknowledged to have been made by him, differs from the other figures 2 claimed to have been added, and you could not imagine the answer of one who had just said "a very great difference." His answer was, "They look very much alike." To the question, "Do not the figures 5 appear to have been altered as much as any others?" he answered, "It does not make any difference whether they look so." I then asked him to point out any difference in the shading of the lines, the quantity of ink used, or in any other respect, between the word "each" and the rest of that line. The answer is, "I am not sufficiently posted to tell whether it is done with a different pen or with different ink. It looks pretty much alike, though it may have been with other ink altogether." He says E in "each" is not his E, because it differs from E in his name. Cast your eyes to the order, or to the photographic copies, and you will see as great a difference in C in "Capt." in his name and C in "Catawba" and C in "claret," "cigars," and "Charles" as between the E's. Again, see H in "each" and it resembles most strikingly the H in "Michael," in "half," and in "whisky." Again, the order as it now is bears evidence of hurriedness. The letters in "each" are not well formed, neither are they in "Catawba," "tobacco," and "genuine." Again, the 4 in "bales tobacco" was originally a 4, because "bales" is in the plural and not altered. The same hand that formed 4 to bales formed all the fours as they now are. The ciphers in "30 boxes cigars" and "20 boxes champagne" appear to have been made by the same hand, at the same time. Obliterate those ciphers and see how you destroy the beauty of the order by leaving wide spaces. As it is, the order presents a neat and business-like appearance, though hurried.

There is one peculiarity which please notice. The left margin, beginning with first figure and ending with four presents a straight line, but not perpendicular, but inclining regularly from the right to the left. And that your imaginations may not be taxed too severely, please observe the photographs made to correspond with Captain Joel's oath and you will see the order which he swears he wrote. Is there a man who believes him? Is it not more than ridiculous, more than absurd, inconsistent with reason and truth? The whole beauty and harmony is destroyed. The first five figures in the right hand column incline somewhat to the right. Then the next figure is commenced a half inch to the left and a wide space left between it and the B. The next line, which he acknowledged he wrote, is written properly. In the next there is a wide space between the 2 and B. The margin from 3 down is regular and in harmony and inclines from the right to the left, and it requires the very figures as they appear in the order as it now is to place the margin in that harmony which we observe in the original order, and which alone is consistent with the evident business qualifications and neatness of this quartermaster. Captain Joel was the quartermaster, a business man, and such an order as he represents himself to have made is supremely ridiculous, and every candid man must say he has attempted to prove too much. If they had relied only upon the words "each" and "canned fruits" they might have induced some to doubt. As it is, it is evident they have been caught in their own net. Even Michael Powers, the agent who made the purchase, could not swear to anything definite; all that he seemed to know was that the order had been for a smaller amount, and that "each" had been inserted. He could not point out where one figure had been added; he would not swear he made the alterations; he would not criminate himself.

Look at the photograph of the order, omitting the alleged forgeries which makes it as Captain Joel swore he wrote it, and ask yourself why is the margin so different, from figure 3 down, from that of the part above; from 3 down inclining gradually to the left and the other somewhat to the right? Why a space after the 3, giving ample room for inserting a cipher? Why same space after 2 in line for champagne? Why, but that figures could be inserted and a regular margin made as now appears in the order that has been published? An inspection of the photographic order omitting the alleged forgeries will remove all doubts. No one can doubt that Captain Joel either swore falsely or carefully wrote the order that the forgeries might be perpetrated. And as "the general-member" [Mr. BLAIR] said, "He could congratulate himself that the photographic art was applied to detecting criminals," I would suggest that he have the photograph of the order, as sworn to have been made by this witness, placed in the "rogues' galleries," with his quartermaster's likeness as executing it, and his own looking on complacently and approvingly. And here I leave them, in their disgrace, to themselves, their God, this House, and an intelligent public.

But before I take my seat I desire to read a letter. It may still be contended by some that the anonymous letters read by "the military member" [Mr. BLAIR] have some force when used against the Secretary of the Treasury. I therefore desire to close by reading the following:

CAMP THIRD REGIMENT MISSOURI INFANTRY VOLTS.,
WOODVILLE, ALABAMA, April 6, 1864.

Sir: Permit us to make to you a statement which may, probably, draw some light upon the whisky-speculation case of General BLAIR, now before the House committee. While our regiment was encamped at Young's Point, Louisiana, (opposite Vicksburg,) in the spring of 1863, we were in the habit of frequently visiting the sutler's establishment of the thirtieth Missouri infantry regiment, then belonging to General BLAIR's brigade. The sutler always kept a fine stock of ale, wines, liquors, and can fruits, which he was selling to officers and men. To our great surprise we found that boxes containing the above mentioned articles were marked "General F. P. BLAIR," and it greatly astonished us to see that the sutler sold such articles as were marked as above stated. It is not our wish to accuse General BLAIR and blame him for this transaction, as he may not have had anything to do with it, but there must have been some swindle in some quarter, and it may be interesting for you to know it. At the same time we do not wish that this note be published, as it may injure us, but should you think our evidence desirable in the investigation of the liquor case, we declare our willingness to give it cheerfully, and so contribute anything that may enlighten the subject.

We have the honor to remain, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants.

Lieutenant Third regiment Missouri infantry,
Third brigade, First division, Fifteenth Army corps.

First Lieutenant Third Missouri volunteer infantry.

Hon. J. W. McCLELLAN, of Missouri.

This letter was unexpected, unsolicited, and the authors are personally unknown to me. I would merely suggest that it may be an excusable offense "to suspect" that an individual who seems to have been engaged in one dishonorable transaction in the spring, may have been so engaged in another in the summer.

Here I leave this subject, with "suspicion" in my mind confirmed of guilt resting upon an individual who it seems to begin to appear, was only a pseudo-member.

Mr. HIGBY. I did not intend when I moved this morning to have this evidence printed with the report to say anything at this time, neither did I expect that any one else would. I supposed after the printing of the evidence that I would be allowed to rise to a question of privilege to vindicate myself from the position, rather a false one, in which I was placed on Saturday last as chairman of the committee by the gentleman against whom the charges were made. That was the only part I intended to take in this matter.

INCREASED PAY TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me, as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to occupy the attention of the House for a moment in order to report a bill increasing the pay of soldiers, and have it printed?

Mr. HIGBY. I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Military Affairs have a right to report the bill back at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I report back from the Committee on Military Affairs bill of the Senate No. 115, to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and I move that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. I propose to call the bill up for action as soon as it shall be printed; if possible to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that the bill be made the special order for some early day, say Monday or Tuesday next.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should be glad if that could be done by general consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Say Tuesday next, after the morning hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. There are a great many special orders now.

The SPEAKER. The business of the House is so blocked up now with special orders and postponements that a special order made to-day for to-morrow or Monday or Tuesday next would not be reached for some time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a special order for Tuesday?

The SPEAKER. The special orders already on the docket will consume a great deal of time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, then, that the bill be recommitted and ordered to be printed. I will then enter a motion to reconsider the vote to recommit, and I can call up that motion to reconsider at any time, when I suppose the question will be before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Cannot we do it more effectually by authorizing the committee to report at any time?

Mr. SCHENCK. Will that give the House an opportunity to consider the bill when it shall be reported back?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is all I want.

The SPEAKER. Then if there be no objection the bill will be ordered to be printed and re-committed to the Committee on Military Affairs, with authority to report it back at any time.

No objection was made; and it was so ordered.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL—RECORDING VOTES.

Mr. KNAPP. I ask leave to record my vote on the passage of the internal revenue bill.

No objection was made.

Mr. KNAPP. I vote "no."

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I ask the same privilege.

Mr. STEVENS. I have objected to anybody recording his vote.

The SPEAKER. That objection does not apply to the present time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KNAPP] has just obtained consent to record his vote.

Mr. VOORHEES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania allowed the gentleman from Illinois to record his vote, and I hope now he will accord the same privilege to others.

Mr. STEVENS. There are a great many gentlemen upon this side of the House who want to vote, but I cannot agree to it, for I think they ought to have been here.

Mr. HIGBY. I learn that I have acted under a misunderstanding of the rules of the House, not being familiar with them, and that if final action should be taken on the question of printing the testimony now, I would not have an opportunity when the evidence is printed of submitting the few remarks I desire to make. I could have made them in much less time if I had had the printed testimony before me; but as I cannot have an opportunity then, I must say what I have to say now.

Mr. VOORHEES. With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that there will be no objection to his recording his vote on the tax bill, which I find is not recorded, if he will allow gentlemen on this side of the House the same privilege.

Mr. STEVENS. I voted. I do not know whether my vote is recorded or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I voted. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. I must object to his voting at this time. He may have the Journal corrected if he will allow me to vote.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to correct the Journal now, the Journal of yesterday having been read and approved.

Mr. STEVENS. I care nothing about it. I was not in my own seat, but I was in the House and voted. If my vote is not recorded, I care nothing about it.

The SPEAKER. The vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not recorded on the Journal, nor is it in the papers of this morning.

Mr. STEVENS. I voted very distinctly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I simply wished to do the gentleman a kindness, that he might be on the record on his own bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I was not in my own seat, but I was sitting yonder opposite the Clerk's desk, and voted at the time. But I care nothing about it. If my vote is not recorded, I cannot help it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I made the suggestion in the kindest spirit. I thought there might be some misunderstanding in the public mind from his name not appearing on the record in support of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. Scores of men heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; and the Chair therefore supposed he had voted.

Mr. STEVENS. I did vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt of what the gentleman states, and if the Journal had not been approved, the Chair would have ordered the correction to be made.

Mr. STEVENS. I care nothing about it. I do not ask to have my name recorded on the Journal.

Mr. DAWSON. I think my colleague should be allowed to record his name on that vote.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it was not with a good deal of reluctance that he voted for the bill?

Mr. STEVENS. It had become so mangled that I almost wished I had been a Loco-foco to enable me to vote against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. Very good. That is all I want.

CHARGES AGAINST A MEMBER.

Mr. HIGBY. I shall occupy but a few minutes' time, and then I shall move the previous question, and I hope that that will close up the Missouri controversy in this House and that we will hear no more of it. I do not know that any one has become surfeited, almost to disgust, more than I myself, because a local question and not a national one. Had the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] confined himself, in his remarks on Saturday, exclusively to what was reported by the committee, I should not have taken the opportunity to say anything on the question one way or the other. In what I have to say I shall confine myself entirely to my duties as a member of that committee, and to the final action in that report.

The question was raised in regard to the subject on which the committee should make its final report. The members of this House have already learned that in a large part of the report the whole committee agree, but that there was something appended to its conclusion on which no two members of the committee agreed. It will be recollected that the chairman came to the conclusion from the evidence that certain charges made by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR], in his reply to the charges made against him, had not been sustained by the evidence. The gentleman from Missouri denied that the order referred to was genuine. The committee sustains that declaration. The report exculpates him from being engaged in liquor speculations.

But in connection with the gentleman's reply he made charges of a character which the people would probably like to know something about. Much evidence was introduced in regard to those charges which he made. I call the attention of members of the House to what took place at the time the resolution was introduced by the member from Missouri who asked for a committee of investigation. It will be borne in mind that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] rose and asked that the resolution be amended. If the amendment had been substituted in place of the original, it would have confined the duties of the committee to the simple business of ascertaining whether the order referred to was genuine or was forged. That would have been the whole business of the committee, and would have been all accomplished in three hours' work. Let me read the resolution as introduced in the first instance:

"That a select committee of three members be appointed by the Speaker, with power to send for persons and papers, to investigate the charges made by Hon. J. W. McGurk, of Missouri, against F. P. BLAIR, a member of the House of Representatives from the first district of Missouri, of violating the laws in the matter of an alleged liquor speculation."

That was the resolution as introduced by Mr. BLAIR. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] rose and proposed an amendment which was adopted, and was as follows: "and to inquire into the genuineness or falsity of the alleged order for the purchase of liquor, dated June 3, 1863." That amendment was adopted, although the gentleman from Missouri who introduced the original resolution objected to it, lest it would limit him in the introduction of certain testimony outside of the mere sustaining of his denial of being engaged in that kind of business. He wanted to introduce proof to sustain the charges he made against certain Government officials for being engaged in the forging of that order. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] went before the committee and insisted on introducing proof to that point. This proof comprises more than half of the evidence taken before the committee.

When the committee had gone to the length of tolerating the introduction of that testimony and deemed it to be legitimate under the resolution I, for one, deemed it my duty to report whether Government officials had or had not been engaged in forging such orders. The people of the country, I knew, would be anxious and sensitive upon that point—whether Government officials would be tolerated in their places after committing such criminal acts. That was the reason why I deemed it my duty to report upon it. We should not make ourselves such laughing stocks as to sit day after day taking testimony and pay no attention to that evidence in our report. It was for that reason that I did assert as a member of that committee in conclusion of the report my judgment as to the conclusions to be arrived at from the evidence in the case as to the charges which the gentleman from Missouri made which were criminal in their nature. I did not deem it proper to refer to any mere matter of imprudence or indiscretion. I leave that matter to them in the settlement of their local difficulties. But when charges are publicly made against officers of the Government criminal in their nature the people are anxious to know something about them, especially when those charges are under investigation, and I deemed it my duty as a member of the committee to include that matter in our report. But it seems I stood alone in that.

Well, sir, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] after being present at the taking of all this testimony and after reading the report of the committee, saw fit on Saturday, when that report was read, to rise in his place here and reiterate the language used when he made his charges in reference to Government officers. He did it in the face of and against the proof in the case, and he knew it when he asserted it. The proof shows this beyond contradiction. The very witnesses he called in reference to the matter proved who was the man that did commit the forgery, and I will not be mealy-mouthed about it. I do not want to go around it, as a portion of the committee did. I wanted to assert directly in the report that Michael Powers committed that forgery. There was an abundance of proof distinctly and directly to the fact that he was the man that altered the order. I did not feel that there was any delicacy in the matter when the man Powers came before the committee, after three men had testified who had signed the paper and pointed out the alteration made in it after it was signed. More than that, the surveyor of the port (Mr. Howard) examined the paper before the committee, and said that a certain word, the word "each," the word that has been spoken of so much here, was, in his judgment, put in by Mr. Powers; that he was familiarly acquainted with Mr. Powers's handwriting, had often seen him write, and had an abundance of his handwriting in his possession; and he stated under oath that, in his opinion, Mr. Powers made the alteration which was made in that order. More than that, we compared the handwriting with that of other writing of Powers's in his possession, and found them to be similar. More than that, Mr. Powers himself, when brought before the committee, admitted that the order passed into his hands after it had been signed by these parties. And when the question was put to him whether the order was altered after it came into his hands, he said it was, "Who made these alterations?" Well, he does not like to answer that question if he can get along without it.

Now, there is no lawyer in this House who has been in the practice of the law for a term of years who would hear a witness undertake to evade a question in that way; and not say, "You are the criminal!" First, the circumstantial proof was directly to the point; and secondly, his own evasion of that question and another similar one put to him, left no doubt in the mind of any one that he was the guilty person. For these reasons I wanted to insert in that report the fact that Mr. Powers was the man who committed the forgery.

Now, sir, who was this man Powers? The gentleman from Missouri has no right to rise and say here, or anywhere else, that I have no right to ask that question, because he introduced the proof before the committee, and directed their investigations directly to this point; and it was through the testimony thus introduced by him that proof was brought before the committee that Powers was the man who committed the forgery. His mouth is therefore shut forever from any complaint in this connection.

Now, sir, I repeat, who is this man Powers? The gentleman from Missouri on Saturday last asserted that he was a Government agent—"one of Chase's understrappers." He asserts when he makes the charges in the first place that it was one of Chase's agents who committed the forgery. Mr. Howard is called as a witness on the part of BLAIR; and his evidence was directly to the point, and cleared up the matter. He is called upon to state, as surveyor of the port of St. Louis, in what capacity this Mr. Powers was acting.

Mr. Powers, at the time of this transaction, at the making of this order and the sending of these liquors and other articles down the river, was acting in no official capacity. He had been a Treasury aid previous to that time. By whom was Mr. Powers appointed when he had that office of Treasury aid? The question is asked Mr. Howard. "I appointed him," said Mr. Howard in answer. "By whom, Mr. Howard, were you appointed to occupy the position you do as surveyor of the port of St. Louis?" He replied "By Abraham Lincoln." If there were a shadow of a possibility of that man Powers acting as a Government official at that time, the appointment came from Abraham Lincoln and not from Mr. Chase. But that would not suit the purpose of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR.]

There is not, however, the head of any Department of the Government, from the President down, who is not fully and completely exonerated from the charge made by that man on Saturday last. And I am only astonished a man who occupied the position that he here did as a member of this House, a Representative of the people—of one hundred thousand and more if his district be full—I am astonished, sir, that a man occupying such a position should get up here and make such a barefaced statement in defiance of the testimony taken in the case.

As I said before, I would have preferred not to have said a word. I would have been glad to have called the previous question at the outset. I did move that the report should be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed; and if it had not been for the importunity all around me I would not have withdrawn that motion. I believed that we had had already enough of discussion on the subject. I would not have said a word if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] had not made charges entirely unwarrantable by the testimony taken in this case.

I now close by stating in reference to the evidence that members may refer to it conveniently. I refer them to the testimony, so far as the report is concerned, of Captain Joel, Franklin, the surgeon, and one other, whose name I do not remember; to the testimony of Mr. Howard, surveyor of the port of St. Louis, and also to the testimony of Mr. Powers. I think then that they will find no difficulty in coming to the same conclusion that the committee did. I think when they examine the testimony of Mr. Powers they will find that the conclusion of the report made by the chairman is entirely sustained; that the charge of criminality against any Government officer is not sustained in the least. If the testimony had been printed I would have had it read from the Clerk's desk; but as it is in manuscript, and would have occupied a great deal more time, I have not seen fit to do so.

With these remarks I close, and now demand the previous question.

Mr. CLAY. I ask my colleague to yield to me to submit some remarks.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have said anything to the House on this subject until the testimony was printed and laid upon the desks of members, and when that was done I proposed to submit such remarks as might seem to me just and proper. This discussion, however, having sprung up this morning, and other members having spoken, if the House will indulge me I will say at this time what I had expected to say on some future occasion.

Mr. Speaker, it is an unpleasant business at all times to be placed upon a committee to investigate charges against honorable members of this House. I would have avoided it if I could; I knew that some gentleman had to perform the duty, however unpleasant it might be, and when the House put me on this committee I determined to do my duty, and to continue to do it by stating the facts as I understand them in a plain and straightforward manner.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not go into the details of the testimony taken before the committee, but I shall speak of the facts as they are impressed upon my mind. I may be inaccurate in regard to some of the dates, but in regard to the main facts I do not think I can be mistaken. I will endeavor to make my remarks short. The committee sat many nights and days, and full latitude was given to the parties to bring out all of the facts, and from those facts our inferences were made.

Now, what are the facts? It seems that charges were made against General BLAIR of being engaged in a liquor speculation in Mississippi. From the evidence which was produced before the committee it appears that it was necessary, according to what was usual, and according to the recommendation of the surgeon of the corps which General BLAIR commanded, that General BLAIR and his staff, while in the service of the United States in Mississippi, performing duty near Vicksburg, should use moderately some stimulant as a kind of antidote to the diseases which prevailed in that country.

This man Powers came to General BLAIR and his staff, representing himself as a Treasury agent, and supposing that he had facilities for doing so, while traveling up and down the river as such agent, he offered to supply them with such liquors as were needed and were necessary. He said that if they would give him an order he would supply them with such liquors as they desired. Therefore it was that upon the application of this man that order was drawn. It was written by one of General BLAIR's staff, Captain Maguire. He testified himself that he wrote the order and presented it to General BLAIR, and then to the remainder of the staff of General BLAIR, making in all nine persons who signed the order. Powers received that order, and after he received it, according to the testimony, and according to his own confession, he altered it. He did not exactly say that he committed a forgery, because after acknowledging that it had been altered he was asked who made the alteration, and at the same time he was informed by the committee that he was not bound to criminate himself, and he did not answer that question. Yet he answered it sufficiently to convince the committee that he was the forger, as the honorable chairman of the committee has said. After receiving this order, Powers returned to St. Louis, and there he concluded that there was a good chance under that order to make a speculation for himself. As he said himself, he thought he was not cheating the Government, because he paid the proper percentage upon the goods shipped; and that he was not cheating General BLAIR, because he was not bound for the goods which he got under the changed order. As liquors were very high, and it was difficult to get them shipped to that country, Powers concluded it was a fine chance to make a speculation, and the result was the forgery of this order.

Now, gentlemen, I will draw your attention to the order itself. The original order was given, for instance, for five gallons of whisky. By putting the figure "2" before the "5" it made it "25," and then by putting the word "each" after that, it made the amount nine times that amount, because nine persons signed the order. So in regard to the other articles the amount of which was changed. For instance, five gallons of brandy was changed to thirty-five gallons, and then to nine times that amount, by virtue of the word "each." Thus it happened that the order which in the beginning would probably amount to $150 was absolutely forged so as to amount to eight or nine thousand dollars. The evidence before the committee was conclusive to my mind that General BLAIR never saw the order after he signed it, and that he never saw the individual who received the order, and of course that he had no complicity with the man who altered the order. So far as General BLAIR was concerned in regard to this speculation, the committee were unanimous.

This man Powers went to St. Louis, and after having obtained a permit from the proper department to ship the goods, went to a grocer to purchase the goods, but not having the means of paying for them, the grocer entered into an arrangement with him by which he was to send an agent down the river with Powers to receive the money whenever the goods were sold; thereby having a joint occupation of the goods for the purpose of receiving the money. In this transaction BLAIR's name was not known. Powers merely showed the permit from the custom-house, and this grocer was anxious to fill that order and anxious to sell the goods, because it was difficult in those times to sell goods at all. Then so far as General BLAIR is concerned, in my judgment, he has completely exculpated himself from all connection with this matter further than the signing of a simple order for a quantity of liquor which was not unreasonable for himself and his staff.

In regard to some other matters the committee were not entirely unanimous. On some points I came to a different conclusion from the chairman, and I will state the reasons upon which I formed my judgment upon this matter. Under the resolution adopted by the House it was a matter of doubt whether we had a right to investigate or report upon charges made by parties outside of this House. We thought the investigation ought to be confined to parties, members of this House, and that outside parties ought to be left alone to take care of themselves, and that we had no right to exculpate or implicate them in any way whatever. If they were implicated by the testimony taken, let it go to the world, and let the world decide without the House troubling itself about the matter. That was the opinion of the majority of the committee, but the chairman differing with us and being disposed to bring other matters in, I had no particular objection to its being done, reserving my right to give my reasons why I dissented when the report should be presented to the House. I will quote the charge made in this House from the speech of the gentleman from the fifth district of Missouri, [Mr. McClurg:]

"Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I ask my colleague if he does not know that the order which he has quoted here was a forgery committed by one of Mr. Chase's agents, and that its publication was procured by another of Mr. Chase's agents, who knew it to be a forgery, in a paper which was in the pay of Mr. Chase. The whole thing can be traced to malice and malevolence. It is acknowledged now to have been a forgery on the part of these two agents of Mr. Chase."

Now, here was a distinct charge made by General BLAIR that the forgery was committed by one of Mr. Chase's agents and published by another.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Do I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that Powers at the time of this transaction was an agent of the Treasury Department?

Mr. CLAY. I will explain the matter if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. He was not.

Mr. CLAY. I will explain that matter if the gentleman will listen to me patiently. I am speaking of the charge made by General BLAIR, so that we may know what the charge is which we are here to consider.

Mr. McCLURG. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to read a little more of that language.

Mr. CLAY. I am going to read it presently. But I wish to say here in advance that so far as Mr. Chase is concerned I have nothing to say about him, for I do not see that he figures in this matter at all. In speaking of Mr. Chase's agents in my remarks, I merely allude to the Treasury agents. I shall not indulge in any such technicalities as to draw a distinction between men appointed by the President and men appointed by Mr. Chase, or men appointed by the surveyor of the port. They are all, in the true sense and meaning of language, agents of the Treasury, and Mr. Chase is the head of the Treasury. I have no charges whatever to make against Mr. Chase, for I do not see that he has anything to do with this matter. I wish to be confined to the testimony in the case. I wish to give a fair detail of all the facts, and to state my conclusions from those facts, and then let the House and the country judge.

I go further, and will say that so far as these two gentlemen from Missouri are concerned, I never knew either of them until I came into this House. I am not a personal friend of either of them. I have no particular feeling of friendship or hatred for either. I look upon both as honorable gentlemen and members of this House, and equals with the rest of us; but as the gentleman from the fifth district of Missouri has thought proper to make a speech reflecting upon the committee I felt as if I was bound to notice it, and to give my version of the story as the correct interpretation of the evidence.

Mr. McCLURG. I intended no reflection upon the committee and cast none.

Mr. CLAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to show what the charges are in this matter. In the first place, I have read from General BLAIR's interruption in the speech of his colleague from the fifth district [Mr. McClurg] to show that the charge was that the forgery was committed by one Treasury agent and published by another. I read further to show that the gentleman's endeavor to represent Mr. BLAIR as charging Bonner with committing the forgery is not borne out. I read from the same point in the speech and from Mr. BLAIR's interruption:

"I was in the field doing my duty when these miserable miscreants committed this forgery which the gentleman parades here. I suppose he has seen the denunciation of that pretended order as a forgery in a St. Louis paper, and he may have all the credit he can get for circulating the forgery of Mr. Chase's agents."

"Mr. McCLURG. Will my colleague give us the name of the person he alludes to?"

"Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I allude to Mr. Bonner."

Mr. HIGBY. I would ask the gentlemen what construction he puts on the language of Mr. BLAIR, "when these miserable miscreants committed this forgery?"

Mr. CLAY. Here is the explanation. Here is the direct charge that Mr. Bonner published the forgery. The extracts I have read show to me conclusively that General BLAIR charged Powers with committing the forgery, and Bonner with the publication. That was the charge made by General BLAIR, and in my judgment the testimony bears it out.

Now, sir, who was this man Powers? When he received this order he represented himself to be a Treasury agent, or, in the gentleman's phrase, a "Treasury aid." He had been going up and down the river as a revenue aid, and so reported himself at the time he received this order. I do not think that the testimony exactly shows the time at which this gentleman was dismissed from the service. He had been a revenue aid, and so represented himself at the time he received this order; and it is plain to my mind that Powers was the forger, and that he was or had been a Treasury agent.

I now come to Mr. Bonner, and what does he say? How does this gentleman stand according to the testimony before the committee? It has been denied over and over again that he acknowledged knowing this paper to be a forgery; but it is proven by Mr. Howard, the surveyor of the port, that he did acknowledge it to him in a conversation. And what does Mr. Bonner himself say? I will read you what he says:

Editors Missouri Democrat:

I am requested by personal friends of F. P. BLAIR to state what has come to my knowledge with reference to a certain order made by General BLAIR and members of his staff, on which Mr. Michael Powers obtained a permit from the collector of this port for the shipment of a certain lot of liquors to Vicksburg, and as to the forgery of any part of said order.

I will state that I never saw the order referred to until after the liquors were seized at Cairo. No suspicion was raised in my mind as to any part of the order being a forgery until after there had been some newspaper criticism in relation to the shipment, when Mr. Howard, the collector, called my attention to the original order, stating that a member of General BLAIR's staff had, on examination of the paper, pronounced the word "each," as it appeared in the order, also the last item on the order, as forgeries. Mr. Howard also gave it as his opinion at the time that the same were forgeries, and while I am not prepared to charge that any gentleman connected with this transaction would perpetrate a forgery, I will state that to my mind there does exist a dissimilarity between the chirography of the word "each," also the last item of the order, and the balance of the order.

Yours, very respectfully,

B. R. BONNER.

Now, Mr. Bonner says he never had any suspicion of this paper being a forgery until a certain time. The inference is that after that time he did believe it to be a forgery. What is Mr. Bonner that he should be vindicated by members on this floor because he is an agent of the Treasury Department? Mr. Bonner is one of the special Treasury agents at St. Louis, and has figured very largely in this matter. The goods were shipped from St. Louis by the authority of the Government, and when they got near Vicksburg they were met by an order from General BLAIR to turn back. They were unshipped at Cairo, and there placed in the care of Government officials. And Mr. Nicholson swears that when he received the goods back they were minus $2,000 worth, which had been abstracted while in the hands of these Government officials.

In that state of the case Bonner comes here and imposes on the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. McClurg.] Or, if he did not impose on him, if he communicated all the facts, then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McClurg] is as guilty, in a moral sense, as the forger himself. I consider that the man who knowingly publishes a fraud or forgery upon another is as guilty as, if not more so than, the man who originally commits the forgery. The latter has not the manhood to stand up and make the charge boldly, but he skulks behind some other individual to shield himself from responsibility. Mr. Bonner had access to the records of the custom-house where these papers were. He took out the papers, and while they were in his possession he gave copies of them to individuals. In that way the matter got into the journals, and this order was brought here as a genuine paper while it was known to be false. The man who could sit and listen deliberately to all that testimony when there was no rebutting testimony to leave a doubt on his mind, and who can then come and reiterate such charges here, ought to receive the contempt and indignation of every member of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an attempt here to incorporate other charges. What are they? While General BLAIR is released from all stigma in this matter, they try to brand the forgery on his aids and on his associates in arms—men who were fighting our battles while these recreants were trying to make political capital out of them. It appears, sir, not only by Powers's acknowledgment but by Mr. Howard, that this forgery was committed by Powers. There is no doubt about it. Four members of General BLAIR's staff certify to the same thing. They all stated it was a forgery. And I put this question to the surgeon, who seems a most intelligent man: "Doctor, could you, under any circumstances whatever, have been induced to sign such an order as this?" Said he, "It is impossible I ever could have signed an order of that magnitude." He said he had no use for it and had no way of taking care of it, and that if it had been an order of that description it would have struck him immediately. Therefore the proof, in my judgment, is conclusive on all these points. There is the forger. There is the man guilty of it, and there are the men who are endeavoring to make capital out of it.

Mr. Speaker, I should not have gone so particularly into the matter but for the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McClurg] and of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HIGBY.] We differ upon that point. I have no doubt that it is an honest difference of opinion.

But I felt that I owed it as a duty to myself and to this House and to the parties concerned that I should speak freely and fearlessly upon all matters and persons connected with this transaction.

Mr. HIGBY. I now demand the previous question on the motion to print.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote ordering the report printed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY POSITION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the question of privilege presented last evening, and demand the previous question upon it.

The SPEAKER. The question will then be upon the adoption of the following resolution, yesterday submitted and laid over for one day:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House copies of the notes, letters, telegrams, orders, entries, and other documents which are referred to by him in his message sent to the House this day, which have connection with the answer made by him in that message to the resolution requesting him to inform the House whether FRANCIS P. BLAIR, jr., of Missouri, holds now any appointment or commission in the military service of the United States.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports; and Joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports.

MILITARY POSITION OF A MEMBER—AGAIN.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, moved to lay the resolution on the table; and on that resolution demanded the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, 12 voted in the affirmative, and 57 in the negative.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAIR, of West Virginia, and HIGBY, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 25, noes 54.

So the yeas and nays were ordered; more than one fifth voting therefor.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 28; nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnold, Jacob B. Blair, Brandegee, Broomall, Dawson, Dixon, Eliot, Ganson, Grier, Hall, John H. Hubbard, King, Knapp, McAllister, Amos Myers, Orth, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, Stuart, Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Fernando Wood—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Chauler, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, English, Finck, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, Law, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perham, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Upson, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—84.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to offer an amendment to his resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question for the purpose of hearing the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I propose to amend by adding as follows:

And that the President be also requested to report as soon as possible to the House all facts or depositions which are or have been in his possession, or in the possession of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Solicitor of the Treasury, respecting the printing in the bureau in the Treasury building, where are printed the public money, the bonds, and other obligations of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the gentleman from Massachusetts yields for the purpose of allowing the amendment to be offered, it can only be done by unanimous consent, it not being germane to the original proposition.

Mr. DAWES. If there be no objection, I will not object.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Let the gentleman's amendment come in as an independent proposition.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman give me the opportunity to introduce it as an independent proposition?

Mr. STEVENS. I will give the gentleman an opportunity of asking the general consent of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. If the amendment can be introduced I am willing to have the information, but if it is objected to of course it would do no good for me to yield. I therefore renew the motion for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts then will allow me to speak on this resolution. I promise to renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. So far as the resolution itself is concerned I have no objection, but the other proposition has nothing to do with it, and I object to the gentleman debating that on this resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to speak to the resolution itself.

Mr. UPSON. I object to the gentleman from Massachusetts yielding, unless he yields unconditionally.

Mr. DAWES. I yield unconditionally, understanding that the gentleman will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I am surprised that there should be such sensitiveness on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the House in granting the opportunity of submitting a few remarks on a resolution calling on the President of the United States for information. I am not able to comprehend that sensitiveness, or to understand why there should be any objection. I am quite sure there can be no apprehension on the part of these gentlemen who have so much confidence in the President, when a resolution calls upon him, and especially when that resolution is introduced by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that any damage could result as the gentleman from Michigan seems to apprehend from such information coming from the President, or that there should be any desire to conceal that information. Under our form of Government we are entitled to all the information from the Executive which is not detrimental to the public interests; and the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] as it is proposed to be amended by me, will not be detrimental to the public interests, but on the contrary will subserve the public good. The demand upon the Executive for information should be allowed at all times and on all occasions, except in case of war, and when the publication of information would be detrimental to our foreign relations or our domestic safety.

Nor can I comprehend the objection which was made, I think, by the honorable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Upson] to the amendment which I proposed to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and which, under the ruling of the Chair, I was compelled to withdraw.

Sir, we not only have the right to know what is going on in all of the Executive Departments, but I think that it would be satisfactory to the public. The Representatives of the people always have the right to know what is going on in other departments of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, the House will recollect that after the close of the Christmas holidays I made some remarks here especially in reference to the subject of the printing of the public money in the Department of the Treasury. There seemed then on the other side of the House some little disposition that there should be some inquiry on the subject. I made allegations as to the character of the printer, and I submitted the documents. The debate was in print, the documents given in here, and all could be referred to, as they were on the records of the House. I waited until the month of February, when I again called the attention of the House to the fact that the gentlemen on the other side had made no use of the testimony which I had submitted. I then expressed my surprise that no attention had been given to a subject so important to the welfare of the country.

Mr. CRESWELL. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from New York is speaking to the resolution which he proposed as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Dawes,] and which was ruled out of order. He is not speaking to the question before the House. The gentleman is therefore out of order.

Mr. KERNAN. Discussion is allowable on the resolution to show the importance of obtaining information from the Executive Departments. My colleague's remarks are to show the necessity of passing the pending resolution.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not debatable, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. Kernan] has seen fit to counsel him as to the manner in which it should be decided, which counsel he has listened to cheerfully, although compelled to differ from him.

The Chair decides that the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] are not in order. He must confine his remarks to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Dawes.]

Mr. BROOKS. I assure the gentleman from Maryland that it is utterly impossible to defeat my purpose to get this information out. If debate be choked in this House, it is utterly impossible to suppress the newspapers of the land. If I am not allowed to say what I have to say here, I can say it any time in the newspapers. Gentlemen might, therefore, allow me at this time to say what I have to say as well as at some other time. If on mere points of order members shut me off here I will go before the country through the newspapers; and the facts I have will only be the more damaging if Republicans suppress them here. What I have to say is in reference to peril of plunder in the Treasury and to the stealing of the public money. Will the gentleman make his point of order after that allegation?

Mr. CRESWELL. The propriety of restraining the paper with which the gentleman is connected is a question of public morals, and cannot be reached by a point of order. I can only say that it is a matter of very little moment what may be said in the New York Express. Gentlemen on this side do not read it, because they do not regard it as a reputable paper. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's remarks are not in order here. The Chair has no control over the other arena to which the gentleman from New York referred.

Mr. BROOKS. The honorable Speaker belongs to that arena, and feels the force of my appeal. Now, the question of public morals—

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. The question is whether in the discussion of this matter we can discuss the obtaining of executive information, not only on these "notes," "telegrams," and "documents," but of kindred subjects connected with them, involving the disbursement and use of the public money. The question which has been discussed before the House during the greater part of this day has been upon a certain order for a certain quantity of liquors, and those liquors must have been paid for by somebody's money; and in the course of that discussion there has been brought before the House all the various parties connected with the matter and with the Secretary of the Treasury. The broadest latitude of discussion has been admitted in reference to one member of the Cabinet, or in reference to the brother of one member of the Cabinet, but when I approach another member of the Cabinet an honorable gentleman upon the other side of the House rises and puts in an objection upon the ground that it may be offensive to public morals.

Well, sir, I know the narrow limits in which the strict and rigid rules of order and the keen eye of the Speaker will be able to confine me in the course of my remarks. But I assure honorable gentlemen upon the other side of the House it is bad party policy. Ten years ago, here, on the Whig side of the House, and in the midst of a Whig representation, I rose on the Galphin matter, surrounded by my Whig friends, and protested against the frauds connected with the Galphin claim, and a majority of my Whig friends years ago stood with me and did not shut me off on points of order. There was a scene of two hours in the House, but the Whigs let me in as a Whig. I then rose to avert from the Whig party the facts which I foresaw the Democratic party would use against the Whig party in connection with the Galphin claim or fraud; and yet now, as I approach this subject connected with the Treasury, there arises a universal clamor upon the other side the very moment I approach it. I tell gentlemen they had better permit me to go on, and I ask permission to go on.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I object to the gentleman proceeding otherwise than in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the Clerk read the resolution now before the House, to which the gentleman from New York will direct his remarks.

The resolution of Mr. DAWES was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the general question whether the President shall give information to the House upon various subjects is not now under discussion, as the Chair believes; but the question is whether the House desires the orders, telegrams, notes, &c. mentioned in the resolution, and debate relating thereto is in order.

The Chair will say in relation to the allusion to the strict manner in which the Chair administers the rules, that he has endeavored to administer them with equal impartiality upon both sides of the House, as he did upon the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McClure] who spoke an hour or two since, and upon the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Blair] who spoke a few days since upon the same subject.

Mr. BROOKS. The House gave him permission to proceed just as he chose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can proceed in the same manner if there is no objection. Is there objection?

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman will wait and introduce his resolution as an independent proposition I believe it will pass, and that this side of the House will vote for it. I certainly will.

Mr. BROOKS. I hold in my hand the resolution which I desire to introduce, and I ask that it may be read.

The SPEAKER. Another resolution is before the House, but the resolution can be read for information, if there is no objection.

No objection was made.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the disbursements of the Treasury now amount very nearly to one thousand million dollars per annum, mainly obtained through loans; and whereas the business of the Department has grown to proportions never contemplated by the framers of the Government, and as Congress has conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury not only the power to receive and make disbursements of the public funds, but also the power of making and issuing the evidences of the public debt; and whereas the business of the Department is now conducted as it was originally organized, no change having been made in its internal operations except the enlargement of the several bureaus thereof:

Be it resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine into and report upon the management and condition of the Treasury Department, and especially into the bureau where is printed the legal tender, or money, or bonds of the United States, with power to employ such experts as may be required, and that such committee be instructed to suggest and recommend any changes in the organization of the Department for facilitating its business and the protection of the public interest as they may deem necessary, with power to publish and report the testimony thus taken at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to allow me to have read a resolution which I desire to offer as a substitute for his.

Mr. BROOKS. I yield for that purpose.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be directed to summon Hon. JAMES BROOKS, a member of this House, to give testimony in regard to any and all frauds of which he may have any knowledge connected with the Treasury Department.

Mr. BROOKS. I accept that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that these resolutions have been read for information, and are not subjects for debate at the present time.

Mr. BROOKS. I am sorry for that. Permit me one word in reply to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not call the gentleman to order unless a point of order is raised on the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Let us go on and decide the question before us, and then we will hear the other.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest this is not fair.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Ohio has not made any remarks that I know of.

Mr. BROOKS. He introduced a resolution seemingly reflecting upon me.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object.

Mr. BROOKS. I will not object to the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, if he will consent that my resolution shall come in immediately afterwards; and I will abandon the floor, and not say another word if I may be permitted to publish my speech in the Globe to-morrow.

Mr. CRESWELL. I object to printing what the gentleman, who is out of order, would have said if he had been in order.

Mr. COX. I object to this debating by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I understand that the gentleman from Maryland, who made the point upon public morals, objects to the publication of my remarks in the official organ of the House of Representatives?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes; as against public morals. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] charged me a moment ago with having opened the flood-gates upon the House in this way by yielding as a matter of courtesy to the gentleman from New York. I do not know what the gentleman meant by the remark. I have only to say, Mr. Speaker, that without any knowledge of the character of the remarks which the gentleman desired to submit to the House, I yielded as a matter of courtesy to him. But I have this further to say, with the leave of the House, that no man who ever offered a resolution in this House calling for an investigation into the official conduct of any man, whether he be a political friend or a political opponent of mine, has ever found any opposition from me, for I have learned in my experience that it did my friends more harm to attempt to defend them by covering up than it did to give the largest liberty to anybody who desired to investigate their official conduct. If a man brings a foundationless charge against any official, you have but to let him have rope enough and he will hang himself; if you do not, he will hang you. [Laughter.] That is the only difference.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, I ask permission to hang myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that permission be granted. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Without having any knowledge of these charges, I am not to have the rule of conduct by which I am to be governed laid down by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That is all I have to say upon the subject.

Mr. BROOKS resumed the floor.

Mr. CRESWELL. I hope I may be permitted to make an explanation.

[Shouts of "Order!"]

Mr. BROOKS. I cannot yield to the member from Maryland again. He is not a member of the House by election but by force. He is only the representative of the bayonet. He has no moral or constitutional right to be heard here at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from New York has just expressed a wish that he may be permitted to hang himself. I move that he have the consent of the House. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] now allows me to proceed without objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] made the objection.

Mr. BROOKS. I am quite sure that the gentleman from Massachusetts, if for no other reason than that he belongs to the same profession I do, and is for free speech and a free press, will permit me to go on without interruption.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I wish to go on with the business of the House.

Mr. CRESWELL. I wish to say in regard to this matter—

[Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is not in order unless he rises to a point of order.

Mr. CRESWELL. I do rise to a point of order. I insist that the rule be enforced as the gentleman from New York persists in proceeding out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland insists that the rule shall be enforced. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"61. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has been called to order, and the Chair has decided that his remarks have not been germane to the resolution before the House. As the rule is required to be enforced the gentleman must sit down unless permitted to explain.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the Chair enforce that point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to enforce it if the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I was trying, when interrupted by gentlemen upon the other side of the House, to adhere to the decisions of the Chair. My profession is not the legal profession. I was not educated as a lawyer, and know little of legal matters.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would respectfully state to the gentleman from New York that that is not embraced in the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. It is impossible for me, a journalist, to adhere as strictly to the rules of order, even when acting in good faith, as gentlemen who have been bred to the legal profession, but I will try to do it to the best of my ability.

When I was interrupted here by gentlemen on the other side, I was dwelling upon the importance of obtaining information from the Executive Departments of the Government; and I was about to illustrate the evils, the dangers, and the perils to the community when information is not allowed to be had from these Executive Departments of the Government. In order to show why this resolution should pass as submitted by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, it is necessary for me to illustrate not only on the point of telegrams, notes, et cetera, but on the general peril of concealing information from the people which the people should have and can have from this House when it is permitted to call on the Executive Departments for information. One of these evils which I was about to illustrate was that when I at an early period of the session called upon the other side of the House in this matter of printing public money, I gave them an opportunity of correcting that great evil which, because they did not correct, has led to the peril of the sacrifice of millions and millions of public money in the printing bureau of the Treasury of the United States and to the conversion of the Treasury Department into a house for orgies and bacchanals. If I had been allowed at that time and am allowed at this time, and if the galleries are cleared so that charges can be made which are not fit for female ears, I will show the country that every word I have said is truth and more than truth.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is that in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair can do no more than state to the gentleman from New York, as he has repeatedly, that in his opinion his remarks have no bearing on the resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. If I have a right to do so, I ask that the rule be enforced.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Does my colleague raise a point of order for the Chair to decide?

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Will the Chair state that point, and give his opinion on it, so that we can have a record of it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the debate must be confined to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], and that in his opinion the remarks of the gentleman from New York are not confined to that resolution.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Is it the ruling of the Chair that it is not in order to tell the truth upon this floor?

The SPEAKER. The ruling of the Chair is that the debate must be confined to the subject under discussion. A gentleman might be telling truth in regard to matters in California, but unless

Mr. BROOKS. I want the gentleman to know that I am his peer here. This is not Baltimore [Cries of "Order!" "Order!" from the Republican side of the House.] This is the Capitol of the country and the gentleman does not command

Mr. BROOKS. I will not struggle much more. The discussion I wish to make I have put on paper a little more precisely. The question to be

Mr. DAWES. I will not proceed with an apology unless the House are willing to hear it. If there be no objection, I desire to apologize to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for a remark made to him and to the House for anything that has transpired of an unpleasant nature.

character through any instrumentality of mine. I wish to say that in introducing the resolution which preceded the present resolution I did not undertake it on my own motion. I was preceded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, who undertook, though unsuccessfully, to institute this investigation. I repeat that I regret exceedingly that I yielded the floor to the gentleman from New York. I should not had I known the course of debate he proposed to indulge in. I think I ought to be permitted to say, after what has transpired, that there is no man in this House who has a firmer confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury than myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order in referring to the Secretary of the Treasury, unless the consent of the House is given.

Mr. SHANNON. I object.

Mr. DAWES. I was aware that I was not confining myself to the resolution; but I thought I had the permission of the House to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not put the question to the House on giving the gentleman permission.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware that I am out of order in saying what I propose to say; and I will not undertake to say it without that permission. I ask it.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. ARNOLD. I rise to a point of order. I understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts asked and obtained leave to make this explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that leave was obtained.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the gentleman be permitted to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. That would leave the matter precisely where it is now.

Mr. DAWES. I will not without the leave of the House attempt to proceed. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order, the morning hour having expired, is the bill in regard to the rebellious States, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD took the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds, that under the order of the House the evening sessions continue until otherwise ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the evening sessions be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the order we are now entering upon will be the special order until the adjournment, unless the House previously goes into the Committee of the Whole, or by unanimous consent proceeds to the consideration of other business.

Mr. COX. I thought the evening sessions were to continue only until the tax bill was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. They were to continue until otherwise ordered. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the evening sessions be dispensed with from and after to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If it is desirable for the House to have evening sessions for discussion only and not for business I have no objection. We have full time to do all our business by daylight, and I object to evening sessions for business.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will not yield to the motion now, but when I get through gentlemen will have an opportunity to settle the matter.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to speak a full hour, he will be taken off the floor by the arrival of the hour of four and a half o'clock. At that time the Chair will have to declare a recess whether the gentleman is through or not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I shall not occupy my full hour. However, I will yield to the wishes of gentlemen.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman says he will yield that we may determine the question whether we will have an evening session or not.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the House will consent to have evening sessions, as there are so many gentlemen who desire to speak upon the matter now before the House, but with the understanding that no business should be done.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the evening sessions be continued for discussion only, and not for business.

The SPEAKER. That motion can be adopted by a majority vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question upon it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. PENDLETON. Can a majority of the House make the order?

The SPEAKER. A majority of the House can change the order of business. The whole order of business has been under the control of a majority of the House since the tax bill was taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

So it was agreed that there should be evening sessions for debate only, and that no business should be transacted.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to know whether it is understood that we can go on with the same subject and debate it?

The SPEAKER. If at the time of taking the recess the bill in relation to the rebellious States is under consideration, that subject will be debated during the evening session.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to know whether the discussion can be upon matters of business before Congress, or whether it must be upon matters foreign to business?

The SPEAKER. That will depend entirely upon the action of the House. If when the House takes a recess they are discussing the rebellious States, that, being a special order, will be the only subject under discussion during the evening. If the House should be in Committee of the Whole upon the President's message, debate would be unlimited.

Mr. GANSON. I understood that the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois precluded the right to talk upon matters of business during the evening session.

The SPEAKER. That is not so.

THE REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The continuity of constitutional government in the seceded States has been broken, the regular transmission of political power interrupted. How shall the severed thread be joined? By the unconstrained action of the people themselves, say the gentlemen in opposition. Very good, sir. I most heartily indorse that sentiment. When the people of these States shall voluntarily ground the arms of their rebellion, and uncoerced take upon themselves the easy yoke and light burden of the ever-gentle Federal Government, it will mark a glad day in these uncheerful years of our history. For one, I will be ready to hail it. I presume I may speak for my political associates; we will all be ready to hail it. Your care-worn President and weary Army—weary with, but not of, the battle—will be ready to hail it. The Federal arm, now raised in such terrible power in defense of the life and liberties of the nation, will fall as gently as the tenderest sympathizer will ask upon the heads of repentant and pardoned offenders. But that bright day does not yet dawn. These erring prodigals still prefer the husks of transgression to the fattened calf with which their old political allies would entice them back to party, perhaps to duty. Your calf has grown to be an ox, so long do they tarry in revolt; and I fear they will continue to neglect your feast until our gallant Army shall bring them to their stomachs.

In the meanwhile some kind of government ought to be established in those States from which the hostile army has been excluded; and while we wait the return of friendly popular action there, Congress must legislate or leave the people in the rough hand of military law. This bill, designed to discharge that congressional duty, provides a temporary government and a practical mode of State restoration. I will not enter into a criticism of its many details, for I suppose they will be generally acceptable to any one who concedes the propriety of any congressional action. Its three prohibitions, as it strikes me, are the most noticeable and perhaps only debatable points. It prohibits the assumption of rebel debts, prohibits rebel officers from voting, and prohibits involuntary servitude.

The first I will pass by with the single remark that to assume the rebel debt would be to offer a high bounty for future rebellions, and I suppose we will have enough of this one never to want another.

I have but a word for the second prohibition. The ballot is the sovereign of this country, and if you permit these officers to vote you make them, to the extent of their numbers and influence, the rulers of the land. To-day you meet them in battle as outlaws and traitors, conquer them, and crown them your king to-morrow. If ordinary criminals are properly excluded from the polls, upon what principle of comparative justice can these men, guilty, not as subordinates or accessories but as contrivers and leaders of a crime recognized by all Governments as the highest or deepest that can be committed against human laws, ask the high privilege of the ballot through which they may complete the ruin of the country they were not quite able to destroy in the field? Of the third prohibition I have something more to say.

Mr. Speaker, if God shall give us victory, and enable us to subdue or scatter the army of the enemy, is a voluntary reunion of the States possible? I say voluntarily because I suppose nobody desires a Union always to be maintained by force; and I use the word reunion because nobody proposes a form of Government different from our present system of State brotherhood. I am not now speaking of the several plans of reconstruction, for they are designed only as temporary devices, looking to a reunion—a kind of scaffolding for repairs, to be torn away when the repairs are completed. My question looks beyond the battle and beyond reconstruction. When the victory is won, if won it shall be, and the transition over, will the insurgent States willingly stay where they have been forcibly put in their old places in the old Union? It has been said by gentlemen in opposition, and it seems to me with great truth, that as at present constituted or situated, they will not. They disliked the Union three years ago too much to remain in it, and dislike has deepened into hate now by the severity of the war. They tell us that Ireland, Poland, and Hungary—suggestive names, I admit—after so many years of compulsory alliance, do not yet fraternize with their political associates. They still sigh for separation, and impatiently await the opportune hour in which to strike for independence. What then? Shall these States be permitted to depart? No, sir. The great Republic could not survive the amputation. Shall they be retained, then, in the long future by military force? No, sir. Our own liberties could not survive their permanent subjugation. When the Federal Government becomes strong enough to hold eleven States as colonies, it will be too strong, I fear, for the people's liberties. To repeat my idea, if you allow a single stone to drop from the national edifice, the whole structure may fall; but if that stone must be held in its place by drafts upon its surroundings, supporting nothing itself, the building were stronger without it. This brings me to the paradoxical conclusion that we can neither allow these States to depart, nor forever force them to remain. How can the paradox be solved? By making them willing to remain, or, if this language still sounds paradoxical, I will say by removing all motive to depart. How can that be done?

Mr. Speaker, similarity of ideas is the bond of nationality. Contiguity of territory is nothing, natural boundaries are nothing, except as they are tributary to unity of thought. Ireland is indeed restless, but her restlessness is not owing to unslumbering animosities of civil wars. Such wars have been more frequent and more severe between different parts of England and between England and Scotland than they ever were between England and Ireland; and yet the people of these sections of the British empire cordially fraternize. Nor is it owing to English subjugation, for Ireland is no more subjugated to England than Massachusetts is to New York. She is a part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain possessing the same rights as any other part, with a proportionate representation in Parliament and all departments of Government. English people and Irish people do not think alike. That is the trouble. They differ in religion—a difference that more than anything else has been the cause of popular estrangement throughout the world. They have each a long independent national history, full of glorious traditions; and national thoughts and feelings, long flowing in a particular direction, cut their channels rudely, but deep, and do not readily follow new though better channels of political science. These differences of sentiment are only removed by years, perhaps centuries, of political and social intercourse. But in the case of Ireland this necessary intercourse was cut off by an intervening sea, a sea that under the old system of navigation was as wide, almost, as an ocean in our day. The same or similar things may be said of Poland and Hungary. They had even a greater difference in language, and in the case of Poland there was a wide difference in the form of government. Having been accustomed to a kind of republic, she was placed under the control of a solid, silent, cast-iron, absolute monarchy. There is no analogy between these countries and ours. All our States prefer a government republican in form. Even the insurgent States adopted a constitution almost exactly like the one they attempted to abandon. We have the same national history. Whatever there may be in the past, either of suffering or achievement, worthy to be remembered or cherished is the common property and pride of all the States. We follow the same fashions, speak the same language, and worship at the same altar. No mountains, no seas divide us. On the contrary the shape of your territory and the course of your rivers are of themselves a revelation that the Union of the States is an ordinance of God.

We have but one cause of estrangement, the difference of opinion upon the subject of slavery. Upon that subject can the North and the South be induced to think alike? Can the North be induced to sanction slavery and think with the South, or can the South be induced to abandon slavery and think with the North? Either course would accomplish the purpose. Is either practical, and if so, which is most practical? For I will not now ask which is most just. Many persons will not consider these questions because they think there is an easier and better way. Let the North and the South, say they, agree to disagree about slavery, each section retaining and acting upon its own opinions unmolested by the other. This theory is plausible; it involves no expensive and troublesome change. I blame no one for adopting it, for I am myself one of its aforetime believers. I never could bring my mind to doubt its practicability until I actually saw the dissatisfied States go out. Even when warned in advance that these States would secede unless the North suppressed their own views of slavery and adopted or silently acquiesced in the views of the South, I confess I was incredulous. I still believed we could hold the Union together and each section retain and utter its own sentiments. But the moment the people decided that a man holding the sentiments of the North was not thereby disqualified to hold a Federal office, secession followed. Experience, that high-priced school in which it is said the dumbest learn, has taught its lesson. The theory has failed upon trial. Each section, I know, charges the failure to the other. "You wrote and spoke and agitated against slavery," says the South, "and thus irritated and maddened our people into rebellion;" "and you," says the North, "annexed Texas and tried to annex Cuba for the sake of slavery, and insisted upon extending it to California and Kansas, and thus forced us to discuss its merits." Blame whom you please, the slaveholders, the abolitionists, or both; the fault was in the theory. It was not possible to ignore a great subject like slavery, connected, as it was, with all our business and all our politics, in this busy-thinking, many-tongued Republic.

The Democratic party North that clung to this theory so long, and sacrificed to it so much of party ascendancy, acting, quite likely, from patriotic motives, are very slow to comprehend and accept its fallacy, now so clearly demonstrated, although they were the prophets of its failure. They cannot see, they say, why slavery and freedom cannot coexist in the same country. Why, sir, they can coexist, but not in a country of unlicensed presses and uncensored debates without provoking discussions on many questions of conflicting interest, and this discussion they concede, nay, they charge, provokes rebellion. The revolted States, knowing that discussion was irrepressible, and fearing that it was inimical to their institution, gathered up their slave investments and walked out of the Union, leaving their old allies doubly amazed—amazed to see the theory in which they had so long believed fail, and the prophecy of its failure, in which they never did believe, fulfilled. A witty Democrat, in speaking of this prophecy by one party and its denial by the other, said to me the other day there was this difference between us, "You lied when you thought you were speaking the truth, and we spoke the truth when we thought we were lying." They are still bewildered. I can think of no apter comparison than a hen with a double brood of chickens and ducks. Sometimes they try by tender clucking to call back to the peaceful shore the brood of secessionists, hatched by their false theories of State sovereignty and concessions to the slave power, and again they flutter to the water's edge and contemplate embarking with them upon the chill waves of revolution. The wild ducks of the South took readily to this dangerous element, but so far their twin-hatched chickens have been content to cackle on land.

But to come back to the point. Our fathers, say the advocates of this theory, lived in peace upon the same principle; a precedent is always good with a lawyer and if our fathers lived in peace if only for half a century upon this compromise, we can certainly follow their example. But those who cite the precedent mistake the facts in the case. The compromise of our fathers was, that slavery should be tolerated for a time with the understanding that it should be gradually relinquished. They did not expect both ideas, slavery and freedom, to go hand in hand throughout the whole life of the Republic. Slavery was to recede slowly and freedom follow steadily. Upon that basis they did get along very well, and so could we. Territorial acquisitions and certain discoveries in the material arts, as it is said, changed the attitude of slavery altogether. Instead of consenting to go out, it demanded expansion and perpetuity. Instead of remaining subordinate it claimed to be the national idea and denounced freedom as sectional. This was just reversing the compromise of our fathers, and of course it had to be discussed, and at this the slave interest took umbrage and resorted to secession and war. If, then, these two systems cannot coexist without causing discussion, and slavery will not brook discussion, it is clear we cannot have a voluntary reunion unless one sentiment or the other becomes predominant. The North and the South must learn to think alike upon this subject, or agree to submit their differences to general and free debate, taking no appeal from popular legislation, and judicial action and decision, except according to the forms of the Constitution, or, upon a rehearing, to ask the second sober thought of the people upon any point supposed to be settled wrong. But the slave interest, anticipating unfavorable action and therefore refusing to abide by the decisions of this constitutional umpire, leaves us no alternative. To live in peace together we must embrace slavery or they must abandon it.

"Homogeneity," said Jeff. Davis at Montgomery. His opinion, I know, is very poor authority with this House, but I believe he has thought more profoundly upon this subject than any muddle-brained advocate of mixture in the country. His head is clear though his heart is cold. Just the reverse is true of those well meaning and perhaps patriotic gentlemen with us who still believe in the union of opposites and the harmony of extremes; their hearts are tender and so are their heads.

If, then, likeness of sentiment is the surest bond of a permanent and peaceful Union, which can be most easily adopted as the national standard, slavery or freedom? To adopt slavery involves a change of opinion on the part of a great many people, twenty millions in the free States alone; for slavery never had any real friends in the free States. Those who are sometimes so considered were only its apologists. How can you change the opinions of twenty or thirty million people? Remember, sir, that opinions are not voluntary things, to be taken up and laid down at pleasure. The mind deals in proofs. Belief follows evidence. But if three years ago slavery could find no real admirers in the free States, who will be its champions now, since it has crowned its many alleged offenses against the rights of man with this bloody treason against the mild and most beneficent Government in the world? Many, I am sure, who took its dark hand then, not in friendship, but only in token of constitutional obligation, will recoil from it now in horror when they see it extended reddened with the blood of our thousands slain. On the other hand, to adopt freedom as the national idea, involves only a change of investment. That may not be easy, it will be attended with loss, trouble, and sacrifice; but still it is possible, while a change of opinion without new proofs is not. It is from this view of the case that thousands of men formerly pro-slavery from principle and practice, have become anti-slavery from Union-policy. Living in slave States, they did not regard the institution as immoral, and therefore sanctioned it. But when they saw it used by anti-republicans and disguised monarchists for the subversion of popular liberty and the division of this Government—a Government weak, indeed, when in conflict with the feelings of its honest citizens, but always majestically strong when its flag was assailed—into two insignificant, wrangling, and hostile nationalities, they rose above local prejudices and State policy and personal interest, and said to anti-slavery men and patriotic men everywhere, we will join you to save our country, to overthrow the rebellion, and to break into fragments the stone upon which it is built. For the present extinguish the great conflagration; for the future remove the inflammable material from which it was kindled. For the present seize the mad revolutionists of the South; for the future destroy the virus that poisoned their blood.

In the debate here a few days ago, the consistency of some gentlemen from the loyal slave States who were said to be moderate emancipationists many years ago, and are only moderately so now, was contrasted with the alleged changes of their more radical colleagues. Gentlemen who boast of their consistency seem often to forget that there is such a thing as being upon different sides of the same question at different times and each time right. The question itself often changes sides. I can very well understand how a citizen of a slave State many years ago giving little attention to the morality of the institution might fall in with the settled policy of his section and decline to disturb the harmony of his neighborhood by what might seem to him then the unnecessary or untimely introduction of abolition agitation, and yet now become an earnest and honest emancipationist in the belief that emancipation alone could preserve the unity of the country. There is such a thing as being right in the wrong time and wrong in the right time. I do not say that those who introduced emancipation in the slave States many years ago were right in the wrong time, but sure I am that all such gentlemen who retard emancipation now are wrong in the right time. But this plan of Union does not necessarily involve immediate emancipation, and I therefore hail all whose labors tend, however slow, to the general result as co-workers for a voluntary and peaceful reunion of all the States.

In these remarks I have confined myself to a single point, the presentation of slavery as an element of discord and disunion, and as such asked its removal. I have waived its inhumanity to the slave, its corruption of the master, its injustice to white labor, its impoverishment of the soil, its intolerance in politics, its despotism in government, its inconsistency in all things. Advocating State sovereignty, it blots out all divisions of its empire, molds all its States into a single power, and calls it the "South." Professing liberality, it yet proscribes from the lowest office the most exalted patriotism, the most brilliant abilities, the highest learning, and the purest integrity, if found blended with the slightest compassion for the slave. Claiming to be law-abiding, the mob, the bowie-knife, and the bludgeon are its chief ministers of justice. Professing to be constitutional, it suspends the great writ of liberty in time of peace, tramples down the trial by jury when found in its way, contracts freedom of speech to the right to advocate its unchristian cause, revives constructive treason, and in Philadelphia, Boston, and Kansas indicts of that high crime respectable citizens who spoke too rudely of its traffic in men. All this, and much more, I have omitted because they were not in the line of my present purpose.

And now I call upon those gentlemen who think there are some concessions within the range of possibility which if made would conciliate the slave power, and restore the Union without the necessity of resorting to emancipation, to point out what they are. Name the items. Of course you will not mention the proclamation, confiscation, and what you call the unconstitutional acts of the Administration, for the rebellion preceded all these. On the territorial question there was nothing left to concede. The Wilmot proviso had been voted down, the Missouri compromise repealed, and the Dred Scott opinion ordered and obtained. Even James Buchanan, so gifted in abasement, could find nothing more in the shape of theory to give them, and in its stead tendered them the low villainy of Lecompton. The fugitive act of 1850, with its slave-hunting officers, the posse comitatus, the conclusive affidavit of the master, habeas corpus and trial by jury abolished, and the United States to foot the bill, left nothing more to be conceded here.

Concession exhausted and conciliation still a failure! Hereafter let all concession be in favor of freedom; and in all our legislation let us approximate, as rapidly as the interests of the two races will permit, the homogeneity of universal emancipation, and upon that basis make the Union perpetual.

Mr. DAWSON obtained the floor.

Mr. LAZEAR. Will my colleague yield to me to move a recess?

Mr. DAWSON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LAZEAR, (at twenty-five minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House take a recess.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me to offer a resolution to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. DAWSON. I will yield for that purpose if my colleague will withdraw his motion for a recess.

Mr. ANCONA. I object to the gentleman yielding.

The question was taken on Mr. LAZEAR's motion; and the House refused to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to offer his resolution now, and that we then take a recess. At least let it be read for information.

Mr. DAWSON. I give way for that purpose.

CHARGES AGAINST SECRETARY CHASE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask leave to offer the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas in the House of Representatives, on the 23d instant, Hon. FRANCIS P. BLAIR, jr., made the following declarations, as reported in the Globe:

"Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, (resuming.) Now, I propose to show that the Secretary of the Treasury, with all the commerce of the country in his hands, with the collection of our foreign revenues and of the vast internal revenues in his hands, is using these abandoned plantations and grasping at all power and patronage for the purpose of providing a fund to carry on the operations of the Pomeroy committee to carry on his war against the Administration which gave him place."

"Nobody is simple enough to believe that the distinguished Secretary has really retired from the canvass for the nomination to the Presidency, although he has written a letter declining to be a candidate. That letter was written because the 'strictly private' circular of the Pomeroy committee unearthed his underground and underhand intrigue against the President. It was such a disgraceful and disgusting sight to make use of the patronage and power given him by the President against his chief, that even Chase got ashamed to occupy such a position publicly. For that reason his letter was written; he wanted to get down under the ground and work there in the dark as he is now doing, and running the Pomeroy machine on the public money as vigorously as ever."

And whereas in the World, a journal published in New York on the 28th instant, it is declared that "developments of the most astounding character have just come to light in the fractional currency and printing bureaus over which Mr. Clark presides;" and the Constitutional Union of this city, in its number of the 28th instant, declares as follows:

"If this whole bureau is so utterly foul and corrupt as the prevalent rumors would indicate, there is no security for the accuracy and integrity of its work; because a shameless disregard of morality and decency in any vital point of conduct is certain to taint the whole character and entail a thorough demoralization in all its aspects. It would indeed be a frightful thing, were it true, that the manufacture of paper money by the Government is placed in the hands of persons known to be guilty of the gross delinquencies freely charged upon one of the leading officers of the Treasury Department."

And whereas Hon. JAMES BROOKS, a member of this House, has this day, in his place here, repeated the substance of the above charges: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate and report upon the truth of the allegations above quoted and of any other allegations which have been or may be made affecting the integrity of the Administration in the Treasury Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer.

Mr. ANCONA, (in his seat.) I object to the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Who objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ANCONA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it go upon the record that the resolution was objected to on the other side of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will withdraw his objection. I make the point of order that no gentleman rose in his place and objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair has repeatedly decided that gentlemen making objections must rise.

Mr. ANCONA, (rising.) I object now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That objection is good, and it comes from the other side of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say that we on this side of the House are very anxious to have this investigation.

The hour of half past four having arrived, the House now took a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m., very few members being present.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to take a further recess for fifteen minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House again came to order at a quarter past seven o'clock, p. m., and resumed the consideration of the bill in reference to the

REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. DAWSON resumed the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask my colleague if he will allow me one moment to offer an amendment to the bill, merely for the purpose of having it printed. It is a substitute for the bill now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House was that no business should be done at this evening's session. But the Chair supposes the gentleman can give notice of his amendment; it would not be in order now, because there is a motion to recommit pending.

Mr. STEVENS. Who has control of the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It is in the power of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania can give notice of his amendment, however, and move to have it printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I then give notice of my amendment, and I ask that it be printed.

It was so ordered.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, this is the earliest moment that I have been able to get the floor, to say that the gentleman who represents the district of Pittsburgh [Mr. MOORHEAD] has seen proper to make my speech of the 24th of February the subject of one delivered by himself on the 26th ultimo. I regret that I cannot characterize the gentleman's effort as an argument. There is, indeed, very little in it that rises to that level. I had scarcely supposed it necessary to notice it on this floor. It is profuse in denunciations of disloyalty and of alleged sympathizers with the rebellion. They constitute, indeed, the staple of his speech. While to me he disavows any intention of giving them a personal bearing, yet by implication they are regarded as personal, and his friends, at least, have made the application.

In his opening remark, in the declaration that I had stated with great frankness and clearness the grounds of my opposition to the war, he has been guilty of a gross misstatement. In common with the party with which I have the honor to act, from its first outbreak I accepted the war as a necessity, and, while I have fearlessly condemned the policy which governs it, have never hesitated to support it within what I deemed the constitutional limits. The Democratic party have acted throughout these trying troubles with a magnanimity and greatness of purpose that no other political organization ever exhibited. They did try to avoid the war. War is the greatest of all national misfortunes; a civil war is the worst of wars, and this promised to be the most gigantic of civil wars. They opposed abolitionism because they knew it would bring war and desolation in its train. They tried their utmost to bring all difficulties between the North and the South to a peaceful and an honorable settlement; and they failed not for want of will but want of power. When the war came, when the vindictive stubbornness of abolitionists and secessionists left no choice but support of the Government by arms or submission to a rupture of the Union, the Democracy offered their blood and money for the Union freely, without stint, without reservation, without measure. All they asked in return was that the party in power should conduct it honestly and fairly, for the purpose of restoring the Union and saving the Constitution.

My colleague falls readily into the trite and well-worn style of reply which his party leaders have taught him. If any Democrat objects to an act of the Administration, he raises the cry of disloyalty, and insists that we should employ our time solely in denouncing secession. If we see the money of the nation squandered, the Constitution trampled upon, the laws disregarded, public liberty endangered, the right of suffrage taken away, the freedom of speech and of the press restricted and punished, the Union for which we are bleeding laughed at as a thing of the past, we must, according to my colleague's code of political morals, find no fault with those who do these wrongs, ask for no reform, seek no change. The respect I have for my colleague forbids me to say that this is the mere twaddle of the demagogue. Such abject submission is only fit for a slave, wholly unfit for a freeman.

He pronounces a eulogy upon General Cass. That great old man will be filled with grief if he hears that an avowed and open abolitionist has spoken of him in such terms. It was heartless cruelty to vex the evening of that venerable patriot's life by praise which implies that his whole public career has been a false one. What has General Cass done to deserve such a eulogy from him? He claims the right to speak of him because "he and I once and again, but vainly, labored" to make him President. It is true that while my colleague professed to be a Democrat he also professed to be a Cass man. After the battle of Buena Vista, however, he deserted his friend Cass and went over to General Taylor. The Whigs of that day were not willing that "Rough and Ready" should be so unceremoniously appropriated, and my colleague early in 1848 came back to General Cass with professions of loud devotion, quite as loud as they are now for Abraham Lincoln. After the October elections of that year which indicated that General Taylor was to be the lucky candidate, my colleague's zeal suddenly evaporated, and at the presidential election which followed he failed to vote for General Cass.

My colleague has repeated what he alleges was said to him by General Cass. It is not in good taste, nor is it by any means a safe practice, to repeat private conversations. The old-fashioned notions of society which regulated intercourse between well-bred people always discountenanced the practice. I know my colleague with a manly bearing condemned the stone-breakers for their private revelations in the memorable contest in 1838, when he and I joined hands for the elevation of David R. Porter to the chief magistracy of Pennsylvania. But having assumed the responsibility to repeat, he has no right to report him in a way which would make the General seem false to the faith of his fathers. I tell my colleague that that great man for more than twenty years had warned the country that the Union would be destroyed if a sectional President should be elected upon a platform which ignored the Constitution. After the elections of 1860 had shown that all his efforts to avoid such a result had failed, well might he have said, "We are lost and destroyed." And my colleague quotes the language in which the patriot mourned over the triumph of abolitionism as evidence that the patriot himself was an apostate to the unsullied record and noble example of his life.

If the retirement of General Cass from office in the winter of 1861 be construed as just condemnation, how shall we construe that of Mr. Holt, who remained in his place as Secretary of War until the 4th of March, and gave his most earnest support to the Buchanan Administration, and at the close of it expressed his most cordial approbation of all the President had done, as well as all he had forborne to do. In his letter of the 2d March, 1861, filed in the State Department, resigning the office of Secretary of War at the close of Mr. Buchanan's Administration, Mr. Holt bears attestation "to the enlightened statesmanship and unsullied patriotism of the President." Mr. Holt has the confidence of President Lincoln, and holds by his appointment at this time the responsible office of Judge Advocate General. General Dix, Secretary of the Treasury in the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan, now a major general in the Army, appointed by Mr. Lincoln, in his address on retiring from the Cabinet and referring to Mr. Buchanan, declared himself "impressed with the purity of his motives, his conscientiousness, his thorough acquaintance with the business of the Government in its most complex details, and his anxious desire that the unhappy questions which distract the country may have a peaceful solution."

It is surprising that my colleague, in his assault upon the Administration of Mr. Buchanan, repeats here in his place the stale charge that Floyd, the Secretary of War, stole a large portion of the public arms and transferred them to southern arsenals. The allegation is of little importance, except as far as it misrepresents a Democratic Administration. My colleague was a member of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, and should have known that a committee constituted by the House, of which Mr. Stanton, a leading Republican, was chairman, and of which a majority were Republicans, reported on the 18th day of February, 1861, that the southern States received in 1860 less, instead of more, than the quota of arms to which they were entitled by law; and that three of them, North Carolina, Mississippi, and Kentucky, received no arms whatever, and this simply because they did not ask for them. I refer my colleague to the report, which will be found in the second volume of Reports of Committees of the House for 1860-61.

It is stranger still that my colleague has repeated that the Administration were derelict in not arresting the progress of the rebellion in its early stages. I reassert what I stated in my remarks of the 24th of February, that the law of the 28th of February, 1795, did not confer upon the President sufficient power to employ military force to execute the laws and protect the public property, and that Mr. Buchanan, in his message to Congress on the 8th of January, 1861, asked for such authority. Congress failed to grant it. My colleague was a member of that Congress. It is a sad commentary on the degeneracy of the times that he should stand up here in the broad light of the heavens to revile the then President for omitting to do what he, among others who constituted a majority in Congress, failed to grant the power to do. This is a gross abuse of our patience, to which the boldness of Catiline would scarcely have been equal, and if he had been blessed with Catiline's sagacity he would have seen that it was useless.

The gentleman asserts that our financial success has become the wonder of the world. I agree with him that it is a wonder. On the 1st of January, 1861, prior to the commencement of hostilities, the entire circulation of all the banks, North and South, was but a fraction over $202,000,000, while on the 1st of January, 1863, in the States known as the loyal States, the circulation exceeded $238,500,000. Add to this the United States Treasury notes, interest-bearing Treasury notes, fractional currency, and certificates of indebtedness, all of which circulate as currency, and it amounts to over $779,000,000. Put to that the issue of the new national banks, which in the aggregate swell the volume of circulation to more than $1,000,000,000, and he will learn the magnitude of the Government issues. The legitimate business of the entire country before the war could be transacted upon a circulation of a fraction over $202,000,000. Now, with a divided country and with commercial intercourse comparatively restricted, the circulation is increased to more than $1,000,000,000, deranging the measure of all values, one dollar in gold, the constitutional currency, commanding $1 81 in greenbacks. Well may it be pronounced a wonder. Prior to 1861, the average daily clearances in the clearing-house of the city of New York were only about $22,000,000, while of late they have averaged over $115,000,000, and have even run up as high as $146,000,000 in one day. My colleague should read much and reflect more before venturing to become a public instructor.

But notwithstanding the freedom with which the gentleman impeaches the motives of classes as well as individuals, I look over his speech in vain for any condemnation of the usurpations of those in authority, and especially for the slightest reflection upon the miserable crowd of sappers and miners—the contractors who have fattened themselves on the blood and tears and distresses of the nation—whose howl is ever fiercest for the war, whose policy it is to prolong it, and who denounce without measure all who seek to give it a proper direction or a speedy termination. We in Pennsylvania have seen these harpies feeding on the life-blood of the State, and my colleague knows—none knows better than he—the paralyzing and consuming power of the frauds on which he chooses to preserve a silence so profoundly loyal. As a faithful sentinel on the watchtower of the nation, why has he never given notice that this same class of persons are gnawing its foundations away? It was Madame Roland who, when the caldron of the Revolution was boiling over in France, weeping over the degradation of society and the frauds that were everywhere apparent, exclaimed: "O Liberty!"—and I might add, O loyalty!—"what crimes are committed in thy name!"

I have great respect, Mr. Speaker, for an argument, for statesmanlike views, and for a candid and honest difference of opinion; but it required a great deal of assurance, almost the audacity of ignorance to charge me with no expression of sympathy for the soldiers who had defended his home and my home, when since the commencement of the session I have been laboring in his presence in obedience to the united sentiment and instruction of my party, and against the opposition of him and his friends, to secure to the soldier a just compensation for his services. The soldier wants and is entitled to substantial aid, not mere expressions of admiration and sympathy, but something to supply his physical wants and comforts, and especially those of his wife and children in his absence. This material aid the Democratic party as a unit have repeatedly offered on this floor, and as often has it been ruled out of order and defeated. He cannot forget, and if he does I refer him to the remarks which I had the honor to submit on the 17th of February, the occasion on which I offered a proposition to increase the soldiers' pay and declared that they had performed their duty with noble fidelity and zeal, and that Antietam, Vicksburg, Gettysburg, and Chattanooga were monuments of their bravery and patriotism that would bear their fame to a distant and admiring future, and were at least entitled to our justice. I may further say that on that occasion I declared that wherever any part of that great Army had moved on the water or upon the land its ranks had been filled with thousands of gallant Democrats, many of whom now sleep in soldiers' graves.

But, Mr. Speaker, such exhibitions are not uncommon in struggles like the present, when the country is in the throes of revolution. The tenor of his speech is the same which pervades a thousand speeches since these troubles commenced. Notwithstanding the evils which civil war bring to the masses, there are always some dashing patriots who scout the magnitude of the trouble, and flourish in the general ruin, like the storm bird which careers in the tempest which is devastating the face of nature. Those parties are ever ready to impeach such as have the courage to expose corruption and to labor in a spirit of true patriotism for the welfare of their country.

My colleague would like to make the country believe that he is especially devoted to the preservation of the Union, and to the prosecution of the war for that end. How sincere he is in his professions appears from his course on the following resolutions, which I had the honor to introduce on the 18th day of January last:

"Whereas a great civil war like that which now afflicts the United States is the most grievous of all national calamities, producing, as it does, spoliation, bloodshed, anarchy, public debt, official corruption, and private immorality; and whereas the American Government cannot rightfully wage such a war upon any portion of its people except for the sole purpose of vindicating the Constitution and laws and restoring both to their just supremacy; and whereas this House, on the 22d day of July, 1861, speaking in the name of the American people, in the face of the world, solemnly and truly declared that it was waged for no purpose of conquest or oppression, but solely to restore the Union with all the rights of the people and of the States unimpaired; and whereas in every war, especially in every war of invasion, and most particularly if it be a civil war between portions of the same country, the object of it ought to be clearly defined, and the terms distinctly stated upon which hostilities will cease, and the advancing armies of the Government should carry the Constitution and laws in one hand while they hold the sword in the other, so that the invaded party may have its choice between the two: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the President be required to make known, by public proclamation or otherwise, to all the country that whenever any State now in insurrection shall submit herself to the authority of the Federal Government as defined in the Constitution, all hostilities against her shall cease, and such State shall be protected from all external interference with her local laws and institutions, and her people shall be guaranteed in the full enjoyment of all those rights which the Federal Constitution gave them."

"Mr. STEVENS moved to lay the preamble and resolution on the table.

"Mr. DAWSON demanded the yeas and nays.

"The yeas and nays were ordered.

"The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 56; as follows:

"YEAS.—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. "So the preamble and resolution were laid upon the table."

It is thus seen that, under the lead of the chairman of Ways and Means, my colleague [Mr. MOOREHEAD] voted to lay these resolutions upon the table. By that vote he has declared that the war should not terminate though the people of the South should lay down their arms and submit to the authority of the Government. Although the war has lasted for nearly three years, and has spread death and desolation in its path, though it has broken up our industry, burdened us with mighty debts, shingled us with taxation, and demoralized our people; though it threatens the overthrow of our republican system and the substitution of a despotism in its place, yet he refuses by his vote to adopt the only basis upon which peace and order and stability can be again secured. His policy means abolition, subjugation, and extermination. Fresh hecatombs must be offered to appease his insatiable appetite for blood.

It is my solemn conviction that it is only upon the basis of those resolutions that this struggle can be brought to a peaceful and successful termination. To this conclusion we must come at last. Fanaticism and evil men may delay this result, and the country may have to be exhausted by the fires of civil war ere it becomes a reality.

When the world, as related by the sacred historian, was buried under the deluge, and Noah and his family were the sole survivors of the human race, it will be recollected that the dove was sent forth from the ark for some token of the reappearance of the land. After traversing for many days the waste of waters she found no rest for the sole of her foot, and returned again to Noah. A second time she was sent forth, and this time she brought back the olive-branch, the harbinger of certain subsidence of the waters. A third time she was sent for encouraging indications, and this time she returned no more, for the waters had retired to their recesses in the great deep, and the world was redeemed from the curse. Let the friends of constitutional government derive encouragement from the lesson. The substance of the resolutions may yet, like the dove, find amid the deluge of domestic troubles a secure resting place, and restore a nation from the grasp of dissolution.

My colleague, in the conclusion of his speech, says, "With the rebellion thus suppressed" the great country shall become the "asylum of the down-trodden and oppressed of every nation." Here we join hands in cordial agreement. I only regret the memory as well as the record of the fact that my colleague, although the son of an Irishman, joined the Know-Nothing lodge, and engaged in the crusade to deprive Irishmen of the rights of citizenship, and Catholics of their religious liberties. The Germans, too, he aimed to make the victims of his vengeance. But the countrymen of Emmett and Curran and Grattan still live, and are marching in thousands by the side of the hardy German, carrying the flag of the Union through blood and fire to defend for him that home from which he would have excluded them.

My colleague for the greater part of his life has been a Democrat, at least in profession. In those days abolitionism was powerless and he was opposed to it. It comes with an ill grace from him now, indeed. It is a slander to say that the Democratic party has sympathy with the rebellion. It is a slander repeated by the lowest as well as those favored with position.

It has been conceded by members of the Democratic party that there was provocation for the rebellion but no justification. In my remarks of the 24th of February I characterized secession as treason. I endeavored to show that, as a legitimate result of the State rights doctrine, secession and nullification have no warrant in the Constitution. Yet my colleague, with great facility of conclusion, pronounces this the doctrine of John C. Calhoun. He has sadly changed since the days when he was a Democrat and claims to have been the friend of General Cass; the days when he prospered on the patronage of that great organization whose policy and patriotism upheld this Government for three quarters of a century, and which is still willing to shield it and save it or perish in the effort. Then he believed that if ever abolitionism got the Government in its hands the country would rush headlong to ruin. Now he gloats over the fulfillment of the prophecy. Now he votes to give this Hall for a British enemy of the Union to lecture in, and assists to degrade the nation by approving a eulogy on John Brown, the traitor and the murderer. When he bows down in homage to George Thompson, the man who for thirty years has been plotting the destruction of this Republic, he should be careful how he applies the word disloyal and make no reference to General Cass, the patriot who gave his days and nights during all that time to the safety of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, the motives of the Democratic party require no defense. It has ever been the party of freedom and of progress, ever the defender of the Constitution, the laws, and the union of the States. At the present moment that great old party, covered all over with truth, like the armor of Achilles, may well say, "Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just." That great party clings to the Constitution, and does not change its principles nor its independence for the favor of a President who is but temporarily in power. The one it regards merely as a man, the sun of whose official life is fast going down, and soon there will be an end of his power and importance. The other, the Constitution, is the Magna Charta of their liberties, in which is stored the hopes of the present and of millions to come after us, and in the preservation of which is centered the interests of the people of every clime.

I will now yield a part of my time to my colleague [Mr. MOORHEAD] to reply to what I have said, if he desires to do so.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a certain degree of satisfaction to the learned remarks of my distinguished colleague, [Mr. DAWSON.] It is true, he has made some allusion to my unlearned effort, and has stated that he likes to see such subjects treated in a statesmanlike manner. I have always given my colleague a good deal of credit as being one of the statesmen of the age, and I am glad that he has come up to that high standard on this occasion, even if I failed to do so.

My colleague has indulged in very bad associations. He speaks of former associations with me and with other gentlemen in supporting this Government. But I am sorry to say that he abandoned such associations, and that about the time this great fabric was beginning to crumble, and this Union to fall to pieces, his close, familiar, and distinguished associates in the city of Washington were—whom do you suppose, Mr. Speaker? John C. Breckinridge, R. M. T. Hunter, Jesse D. Bright, and Jefferson Davis. I do not think I need tell the House who these gentlemen are. But I would ask, where are they now? John C. Breckinridge, one of my colleague's closest and most distinguished friends, is a general in the rebel army. R. M. T. Hunter, who was his model patriot and statesman, is a representative in the confederate senate. Jesse D. Bright, perhaps my colleague's bosom friend, was expelled from the Senate of the United States. I need not say anything about Jefferson Davis. The House knows who he is and where he is.

I say, therefore, that my colleague has fallen into bad associations. I do not think him bad at heart or disloyal. I have hopes of him yet. I had great hopes of him when I made that speech which seems to have affected him so much. I had great hopes that the teachings of that speech, when taken home and studied over by him as I knew it would be, would bring him back to the true faith, and I regret to find, from his remarks here to-night, that it has not done so; yet I have faith in the political salvation of men, as I have in their religious salvation:

"For while the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return." [Laughter.]

And although my colleague's political sins are many, yet still I have hopes that he will return to the support of the Government of the country. My colleague spoke of my being a demagogue, and then, to my utter surprise, and I think to the surprise of the House, he introduced the subject of a resolution which he offered here to increase the pay of the soldiers and to pay them in gold, when he knew that the Treasury was unable to meet such a draft upon it.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir, I did not; but to pay them in gold or its equivalent.

Mr. MOORHEAD. He charged me with being a demagogue; and yet he introduced that resolution here, showing that it emanated from him, and that he wanted the credit of it. And what has been my colleague's course here during the session? Endeavoring to cripple the operations of the Treasury. What was his course no longer ago than last evening? After opposing the internal revenue bill here, we find on the final vote some thirty-three members voting in the negative, and my distinguished colleague was one of them.

Mr. DAWSON. I stated distinctly this evening, and stated when I introduced the resolution, proposing to pay the soldiers in gold or its equivalent, that I introduced it in obedience to the instructions of the Democratic party.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Then you do not make a merit of it yourself; you disclaim it.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir; I do not disclaim it.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The House understood you to disclaim it.

Mr. DAWSON. By no means. As to the tax bill to which the gentleman refers, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] stated in the House to-day that it was so mangled that he almost wished he had been a Locofoco that he could have voted against it.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I want my colleague either to take the responsibility of it, or to disclaim it. If he disclaims it I will let him off.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir. I introduced it in obedience to the instructions of the Democratic party, and it met my own approval. Indeed I approve it fully, and I cannot in justice appropriate to myself all the credit of its introduction.

Mr. MOORHEAD. My colleague charges me also with having been in a Know-Nothing lodge. So far as I have any knowledge of the gentlemen who went to such places, I never knew a disloyal man among them. I have shown who were my colleague's political associates, and I am told that there is a Golden Circle association; whether he or they belong to it I do not know.

Mr. DAWSON. I know nothing of it.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do not think my colleague does. But I have shown the associations he has kept, and I think the loyalty of these bosom friends of his is not above suspicion. And while they are fighting against us in the South, I regret to say that my distinguished colleague, whom I have loved as much as any man on this floor, is, I will not exactly say aiding them, but doing nothing to sustain the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have some thoughts on the state of the Union, and the process of bringing back to our system the wandering stars which have shot so madly from their orbits, that I would have desired to ventilate on the occasion of the discussion here of the resolution for the amendment of the joint resolution of July, 1862, in relation to the extent of the forfeiture for treason against the Government. I was not so fortunate as to agree with a majority of my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee, either as to the meaning of the Constitution or the curative virtues of the amendment. I would have preferred to vote for the absolute repeal of that disabling feature on grounds outside of the constitutional provision in regard to cases of judicial attainder, and upon considerations looking to the final settlement of the great internecine struggle which has cast us loose from our ordinary moorings, and suggested so many new and dark problems of State for our solution. I thought the question of the times was involved in that discussion, as it widened, and deepened, and swept within its current—and that too by an inevitable and inexorable logic—the great considerations of the status of the rebel States, and the means whereby the broken column and the crumbling arch were to be restored, and the fragments of the shattered urn gathered up and reunited, so as to give back, if possible, its original strength along with its original perfume. It struck me that these were questions which must be first settled before we could legislate understandingly or safely upon almost any others. They were not to be postponed or evaded. We could not escape or ignore them by burying our heads in the sand like the ostrich. They met us on the very threshold at the organization of this House. They have confronted us from day to day, at every turn, in the reports of committees, where sound conclusions have been sometimes reached—by a very indifferent logic, of course—from unsound premises, and erroneous conclusions sustained here, almost without discussion, in apparent unconsciousness of the dangers with which they were pregnant. It seemed to me that we were at sea, drifting without rudder or compass at the mercy of the winds and currents. I wished a reckoning of our position. I desired some landmark, some safe anchorage to which we might grapple, some common center, at least, about which we might gravitate in orbits "centric or eccentric," as our several idiosyncrasies might prompt. I proposed, therefore, to try the experiment in a modest and suggestive way only, as becomes any man who is called upon to deal with such questions as these, of indicating a star by which we might possibly navigate in safety. While I waited, however—as I always prefer to do—to hear what others might have to say, the doors were closed upon me, and the debate arrested by the operation of the previous question. It occurred to me then that I might possibly generalize my notions in such a way as to render them acceptable to a majority of this House, as I have accordingly attempted to do in a series of resolutions which I have had the honor to spread upon your records. This bill, with the amendment offered this evening by my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] by way of substitute therefor, comes in opportunely as a practical measure, resting, as I think, upon the same general principles, and enabling me to develop the leading idea of those resolutions in the remarks which I propose to make, in a somewhat desultory way, and without reference to its details, upon the relations established by the war, and the rights and duties bearing upon the question of reconstruction that have grown out of it.

And first, as to the status of the rebel States, and the law which is to govern our relations and intercourse, and sit as umpire in the progress and adjustment of the pending controversy.

These States are either in the Union, or they are not. Some people may think it makes no practical difference how we conclude on this point while the war is flagrant. That is not my judgment. It has seemed to me that all the irresolution, all the unsteadiness in our counsels, all the doubt and hesitation and delay, all the apparent obtuseness and obliquity of the moral sense, and many of the differences between good and loyal men here, were mainly referable to the fact of the failure to settle this great question, and settle it correctly, in advance. The war was inaugurated on the theory that they were in, when the great fact of war, which individuals cannot wage in the social state, and peoples do not wage upon themselves, was a proclamation that they were out. The Democrats of the North were willing to accept the fact that they were out, without war—to adopt the principle of the laissez-nous faire—the “let us alone” of the rebel authorities, and to treat with them upon the idea of a reconstruction, upon that kind of compromise which involves generally a traffic in principles, and that sort of mutuality where all is demand on the one side and concession on the other; where everything is surrendered and nothing obtained, or even stipulated for in the way of equivalent; to treat, in short, either for their return, or for the privilege of going out along with them, and leaving New England in the cold. They were willing to waive the right and the treason absolutely, and declined the alternative of war on the ground that the obligation was an imperfect one, whose performance depended upon the mere will of the contracting parties, and could not be enforced. With them it was peaceful secession, with reconstruction by treaty. The ruling thought was, of course, to spare, to save, to do as little harm as possible to those who were not our enemies, but our brethren—sisters, perhaps, I should say, albeit a little “wayward,” whose anger was to be kissed away—or sweethearts, rather, who were to be mollified into tenderness by dulcet phrases and costly love tokens, or hugged into quietude by the anaconda process of compression, or the sublime mysteries of strategy. The rebels were Democrats, whom it would be a sin to kill, and a greater sin to rob of their sacred property in slaves. Better a hundred thousand free white northern youth should die, than one negro slave should be lost to his proprietor, or employed in arms against him. To carry out this policy we wanted conservative generals who would be sure to hurt nobody, and saw men made heroes—by newspaper process, as great men are now made since that manufacture seems to have passed out of the hands of Providence—not because they fought, and fought successfully, but because they would not fight at all. We wanted generals who had constitutional scruples about the right of invading the sacred soil of a sovereign State; who had “kind regards” for the worst and meanest of felons, and were ready to grant paroles of honor to men who, by an act of treason intensified by ingratitude and perjury, had basely deserted the flag they were sworn to defend, as no more Swiss, no soldier of fortune who hired out his steel, could have done without a deep stain upon his escutcheon. But while we were dealing with the heresies and subtleties of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798, those fruitful sources of our present woes, instead of striking at once at the heart of the rebellion, that rebellion, thus nursed and cherished and rocked and dandled by ourselves, was swelling in volume, and organizing and hardening into constance behind the storm-cloud which was gathering and blackening and muttering its thunders within sight and hearing of this very Capitol, where an American Congress was legislating under its shadow. But the light which was struck out from the collision of hostile bayonets, struggling up through the haze in which we were enveloped, began to dawn slowly upon the country. It was soon reflected back upon these Chambers, and statesmen began to feel that they were in the presence of a great fact that could not be conjured down by empiricism, or reasoned down except by the logic of artillery. But still they hesitated to accept the fact, and the law of the last session, halting between the two opinions—beginning with the idea of treason and ending in the alternative of war—although right in itself, was but the expression of the lingering doubt whether these States were still in the Union or out of it.

How does the case then stand upon the facts? It cannot be questioned, I think, that in this view the severance is or has been as complete—the spes recuperandi, the mere hope of recovery, excepted—as if our forces had been withdrawn, and their independence recognized. They have seized our property and expelled us from their territories. They have declined the Federal jurisdiction, and ceased to live under the Federal law. They have altered their constitutions of government, and transferred their allegiance to a foreign power. They have invaded our soil. They have claimed and exercised, with the consent of the great Powers of Europe, the rights of belligerents upon the ocean. Under the stern logic of facts we have assented to all this, by releasing the crews of their privateers, instead of dealing with them as pirates, and exchanging prisoners captured on land, instead of hanging them as traitors. We have distinguished between the mere guerrilla and the commissioned soldier of the confederacy. We have blockaded their ports. Treating them as a government de facto, and therefore entitled to the allegiance of all its citizens, we have allowed them to shoot as deserters, without retaliation, the unwilling conscripts who have fled to our arms for the protection which we were bound to give them; we have interdicted commercial intercourse with them on the part of the citizens of the loyal States; and we have put them by our legislation, one and all, without distinction as to loyalty, under the ban of the Union, as alien enemies. Nor have we been guilty of any inconsistency herein. The revolt was not of individuals, to be dealt with by the ordinary process of law, like the whisky insurrection, with which it has been improperly compared. It rose at once to the dimensions of a civil war. It was the result of the corporate, political action of organized communities, sweeping the reluctant and the innocent into its impetuous current, and then merging the individuality—dissolving, as I think, the very life—of these communities, in the revolutionary act of compounding them into a separate and independent nationality. As such we have treated with it in the matter of exchanges, and ignored accordingly the members of which it was composed. We could not do otherwise under the law to which the insurgents successfully appealed, when they repudiated the authority of any common superior, and carried their case before that dread tribunal of nations, where the sword is the arbiter, and the voice of God and humanity, thundering out of the smoke and carnage of the battle-field, is the only one that can be listened to in the adjustment of the controversy.

And now let us inquire for a moment how the public law of Christendom, as declared in the opinions of the publicists; and the practice of enlightened nations, squares with the great facts to which I have referred.

It will be found, I think, that the most eminent of these writers are agreed in the opinion that the parties to a civil war, having no common judge, or common superior on earth, “must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies,” and that “when a nation becomes divided into two parties absolutely independent, and no longer acknowledging a common superior, the State is dissolved, and the war between the two parties stands on the same ground, in every respect, as a public war between two different nations.” This is the language of Vattel, (pp. 425, 427,) and the learned Barbeyrac, in his notes on the treatise of Grotius, (Book 3, cap. 6, sec. 27,) affirms the doctrine by the remark that “in case of the rising of a considerable part of the State against the sovereign, as for an alleged violation of the fundamental law of the nation, the Government is dissolved, and the State divided into two distinct, independent bodies; and much more does that take place in the civil wars of a republican State, in which the war immediately, of itself, dissolves the sovereignty that subsists solely in the union of its members.”

It is in direct antagonism therefore to the law which governs now, as to the facts, to say that these States are still in the Union as they were before. The theory that this Union was indissoluble refers only to the right, to its organic law, and to the purposes of the men who welded these States together; but never was intended to imply that it could not be ruptured by violence, as it has unquestionably been, leaving to the wronged and adhering States their remedy for the breach; not by enforcing a specific performance, which is impossible, but by the recovery of the territory which is ours by the contract, and the expulsion of the delinquents, with the forfeiture of all their rights in and under the Union, from which they have withdrawn. To say with a gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] that this is an admission of the right to secede, is to confound the fact, which is one thing, with the right, which is another. To assert with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] that this is a concession of their independence, which would authorize their recognition by foreign Powers, is to forget that we have rights which no violation of the contract by the other party can destroy. It would be just as sensible to insist that a judgment of outlawry was a release of the traitor from his allegiance, and authorized the Government to which he fled, to espouse his quarrel and adopt him as its citizen.

Upon this question of the forfeiture of political rights some further light may be borrowed from the practice of nations in the application of the jus postliminii, which refers, according to Grotius and Bynkershoek, as well to cases of territorial recapture where a whole community is involved, as to those where the goods of a subject once seized as prize of war are afterwards retaken from the hands of the captors. And here I think it will be found that even the provinces of a confederation which have been wrested from it by an enemy have not always been reinstated in their original privileges, as reason would seem to adjudge that they ought to be.

Thus the inhabitants of the district of Drenthe were in 1580 admitted into the confederation of Utrecht, but their country was afterwards invaded and occupied by the Spaniards. After the enemy had withdrawn and evacuated their territory, although it seemed clear to Bynkershoek that they had recovered all their former rights by virtue of the law of postliminy, nevertheless, although they several times petitioned the States General to be readmitted into the Union, no order was taken, and afterwards, in 1650, when their deputies attended at a meeting of the States, they were refused admittance.

Again, the provinces of Guelderland, Utrecht, and Overysseel were taken by the French and afterwards recovered. Bynkershoek remarks thereupon, that while they were in the power of the enemy they certainly were not entitled to their former rights as confederates, and on that account their delegates were very properly ordered not to attend any longer at the meetings of the States General; but when they came again into the possession of the States they were readmitted by a decree of that body, restoring them to their former municipal and confederate rights, except that Guelderland was deprived of one vote in the assembly, and several other conditions were imposed, one of which was that they should swear anew to the articles of the confederation as if they were admitted for the first time.

These, however, were cases of seizure and occupation by an enemy; ours, of a voluntary abdication of Federal rights and an organized resistance by governmental action to the Federal law. There is no case here, therefore, for the application of the law of postliminy. Some of these States, on the contrary, constructed out of Territories purchased by this Government, were lifted from the posture of subject and dependent provinces upon the platform of the Union, on the condition of obedience to its laws, and by their voluntary abdication of the privileges so conferred have, as it seems to me, by an inevitable logic, lapsed back again into the territorial condition. There is no ground upon which it can be claimed that any of them have been the victims of a public enemy, who has wrested them from the possession of their local governments. The action was corporate and social. It was the local governments themselves that sinned. Where they have been recaptured the local Gov-errors have fled, the local organizations have been dissolved, and their territories are now under military occupation by the armies of the Union, or under provisional governors appointed by the Executive. This fact alone, as it seems to me, involves the admission that they are no longer in the Union. If they are, that occupation is unlawful. If their governments are dissolved, however, they must, of course, be reconstituted under the auspices of the conquering power, and that not by the Executive, but by the Legislature of the Union, whose sword he bears, and which only, consistently with the genius of our institutions, the past practice of the Government, and the letter as well as spirit of the Constitution, can venture to determine what use shall be made of the territories conquered by it, and when and upon what terms they shall be readmitted into full communion as members of this Government. It is not certainly the military power that is to reorganize, and modify, and breathe new life into their defunct constitutions. Until the end of subjugation is achieved and the resistance entirely overcome, so as to give place safely to the reestablishment of the civil authority, a military occupation is indispensable, of course. When that period arrives, the sword must be sheathed, and the Territory return to the direction of the law-making power, which will prescribe the rule for its government, and allow to its people the privilege of reorganizing under republican forms. I call it Territory and invoke the law that governs there, because I know of no intermediate condition. To permit any executive officer to declare its law, and set it in motion, and place it under the control of a minority—a mere tithe of its citizens—with power to send delegates to Congress with representation unimpaired and unaffected—even though he should reenact a part of its abrogated constitution—would be, as I think, a monstrous anomaly, a violation of fundamental principles, and a precedent fraught with great danger to republican liberty. Here is the dilemma. To come back into the Union, it must either be born anew or come back with all its rights unimpaired, except those material ones which have been destroyed in the progress of the war. There is, I think, no middle ground, as there is no power either here or elsewhere to prescribe terms which shall abridge the rights or privileges of a State that has not been out of the Union, or returns to it in virtue of its original title.

When I suggest, however, that these States are out, it is with this important qualification, that they are out in point of fact, with a forfeiture of all their franchises as members thereof, whenever the issue of battle shall have been decided against them; but subjects of it still—members, if you choose—in legal contemplation, so far as regards their obligations and duties under the Constitution, and our right to visit them with punishment for the delinquency, proportioned to the magnitude of their offense. They are in for correction, but not for heirship; just like the unnatural child who has attempted the crime of parricide, and only succeeded in dyeing his murderous hands in the blood of his loyal brethren. It is bad logic to infer that because they are out without our consent, and have forfeited their rights thereby, that fact must be attended with a like forfeiture of our own. Nor would I, as already intimated, be understood as admitting that they are out as to foreign Powers, who must respect our title, although our possession may be ousted, and treat the contest in all respects as a domestic one. No American of the right spirit would allow even a question of this sort to enter into our diplomatic correspondence with foreign Powers, or consent to compromise our dignity and self-respect, which are at last the best security of nations, by uncovering the maternal bosom to the rude and insulting gaze of the stranger, and inviting his interference, either by misrepresenting the aims of our loyal citizens, or beseechingly deprecating his displeasure. I trust that our just pride as a people will not be again wounded by the production of another book like the diplomatic confessions of 1862.

It is suggested, however, by a gentleman from New York, on the other side of the House, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] that while we on this side are claiming to be for the Union, the enunciation of these doctrines by my able colleague [Mr. STE-VENS] amounts to a declaration that we are no longer a Union party. The meaning of this, if it means anything, is, that because the rebel States are out, without any agency of ours, but with a large share of the responsibility on the heads of those who, like the gentleman himself, encouraged the defection by their servility or by the assurance that they were opposed to coercion—as they oppose it now—and taught them to believe that they could go out with perfect impunity, and that New York and Pennsylvania would go out along with them—the mere statement of the fact that they were out is evidence that the party of the Administration on this floor is not in favor of the preservation of the Union! Well, we are in favor, at all events, of preserving all that is left of it, and intend, with the blessing of God, to win back the residue, and pass it through the fire until it shall come out purged of the malignant element that has unfitted it for freedom. But what does the honorable gentleman himself, what do those who vote with him really think on this subject? Does he, do they believe that the rebel States are not out? If he does not look upon them as a new and independent power in the commonwealth of nations why does he propose to treat with them, not with the revolting States singly, but with “the authorities at Richmond?” How is it that in his own resolution he proposes, in totidem verbis, the “offer to the insurgents of an opportunity to return to the Union?” Who are the “authorities at Richmond?” Will he inform us whether they are a people known to our Constitution, or how these States are to return to the Union if they were never out of it? His tongue confesses it unwittingly—I will not say like Balaam’s, who blessed when he intended to curse—but just as did that of the Louisiana claimant who, professing to rest on the same doctrine, stood before this House unconsciously testifying in the same way. He stands, therefore, self-condemned by his own logic, as no Union man. I will allow him, however, the advantage of the admission that it is but a slipshod logic that cannot distinguish between the law and the fact. But that is true of himself and his party which he unjustly charges upon my colleague. The difference is just this, that although the rebels have spurned and spit upon their northern auxiliaries, rejected all their overtures, and declared that they will no longer associate with them upon any terms, and are not willing that they should even come “betwixt the wind and their nobility,” he wishes to treat for the privilege of serving them, while we propose to fight for the purpose of chastising them into submission. This may be the result only of a difference of taste; but all history attests that there always are, as there always will be, men who love to wear the livery of a master, and are uncomfortable without it; who regard the collar as a badge of distinction, and would, at all events, rather carry it than quarrel with it. No wonder, therefore, at the opinion so often expressed by men of this sort in relation to the black man, that he would neither run away, nor bear arms against his master or anybody else. They did him injustice in supposing that he was like themselves. Pompey, who was an involuntary slave, is tending toward the north star with a musket in his hand, while his white non-combatant substitute, a voluntary slave, is rushing southward with the olive-branch in his hand, into the patriarchal arms.

The objection rests, however, as I suppose, upon the remark that our right to deal with the rebel States after they shall have been reduced to submission by force of arms is not a question under the Constitution but outside of it. I desire to say, once for all, that I do not concur in this opinion, because I find the war power in the Constitution with all its incidental consequences. If it is not there, the case is without remedy.

The doctrine of my colleague, that these States are out of the Union, may seem at first blush extreme. Some people may think it radical, but it is none the less palatable to me on that account. War is a radical disease, and radical diseases are only to be treated by radical means. One earnest and decided man is worth, in times like these, a regiment of temporizers; and that is precisely the reason why the inherent weakness and poverty of the insurgents have been able to match the overwhelming numbers and resources of the North. These are no times for what are falsely called conservative men, just because they are wedded to old abuses, and only hug them the closer when they have proved most destructive. I like bold thinkers and operators. Timid counsels have ruined many a State; they have never saved one, and never will. It may be a paradox, but if conservatism has ever operated to save a nation in such a crisis as ours, it has only been, as here, by acting as the dead-weight upon the plowshare, which has retarded its progress, but made it run so deep into the virgin soil as to make its work a radical one. The man who is ahead of his contemporaries is always denounced as a daring and dangerous innovator, and happy if he is not martyred as the apostle of a new faith for the singularity of his opinions. I beg gentlemen to reflect, however, whether there is any solid ground short of this on which they can put down their feet with safety. The “middle passage”—it was the same, I believe, in which the negro was heaved overboard—the “medio tutissimus ibis”—the path of traffic and of compromise—is not the one which we can hold safely in a storm like this. If these States are in the Union, with all their rights and privileges unimpaired, they may return to-morrow, even without submission, after being conquered in the field, to conquer their conquerors in the councils of the nation. The most accomplished of the Roman poets remarks that “conquered Greece subdued her barbarian conqueror, and introduced the arts into unpolished Latium.” The contrary will be the case here. The barbarian will come back into your Halls. The northern Democrat will rush into his arms. The two elements, like kindred drops, by an attraction a good deal stronger than that of miscigenation, will melt incontinently into one. The old bargain will be renewed—“Give us the spoils, and you may take the honors and the power, and rob the northern soldier, the sick and the maimed, the widows and the orphans of the gallant dead, of the miserable pittance which this Government is pledged to provide for them.” The proclamation of freedom will be revoked; your acts of Congress repealed; your debt repudiated unless you will assume theirs; and yourselves, perhaps, ejected from these Halls. The result is already foreshadowed in the events of the present Congress, wherein—not to speak of other of your past experiments in dealing with that element—a signer of the secession ordinance of Louisiana, permitted to walk the streets of this capital, and enter this Hall, as others were permitted, less than three years ago, to go out of it, unquestioned, was allowed to vote upon a bogus certificate of a bogus governor, and to vote negatively with the Democracy upon the qualifications of the members of Congress now representing the loyal State of Maryland. And the effect will be, that for all your great expenditures and all your bloody sacrifices, you will have won back, not peace, but a master—the “old master,” in negro phraseology—who governed you before—as turbulent, as vindictive, and as ferocious as ever. If they had chosen to remain with us, under the idea that they were not out, they might, by their superior tact and address, and their habitual control of the northern Democrats, have so embarrassed us as to render it utterly impossible to carry on a war against them. If they had consented to return in answer to the prayers of their bereaved friends, or to the message sent through Count Mercier to Richmond, about which an adjourned question of veracity is still, I believe, depending between very friendly belligerents, who exchange hostile messages in the improved shape of invitations to State dinners, we should have been lost. I have always regarded it as a special providence that the arrogance engendered by their ownership in men, both white and black, and the contempt with which they looked upon their vassals here, should have prevented them from retaining or returning to their places in Congress, or even holding out the idea that a compromise was possible. Say that they are in the Union as before, and all your sacrifices have been idle, and all the blood spilled by you has sunk into the earth in vain. Bring them back, and you cannot even bind them by gratitude, or purge them by oaths, of which they make no account, as the whole history of the rebellion, which began in perjury, abundantly shows—which are like the ribbons that were insultingly stretched by the Parisian mob in front of the Tuilleries to protect the ill-fated king and queen of France—and which grave Senators have so recently denied your power to prescribe. The President has dealt kindly with the neutrals. Has he propitiated any of them? Our predecessors here have followed the example. Look at the facts attending our organization, and say whether even confidence and charity are followed by either gratitude or loyalty. No, you must throw the dissevered fragments, the "disiecta membra" of this great Government, into a caldron, with a hot fire beneath, and you may evaporate the virus, but not otherwise.

Taking them, however, to be out, or that the case has passed from under the municipal into the domain of public law, what is the authority which that law gives us over the rights and property of an enemy?

Before entering on this question, however, I desire to say a few words in relation to the supplementary resolution which we have been endeavoring to amend. I would have been glad, as I have already stated, to vote for its unconditional repeal, for the reason that the confiscation and distribution of the great baronial possessions of the rebel leaders were, in my judgment, an essential element in any feasible plan of reconstruction, and that there were other means under the Constitution than the very inadequate one of the judicial attainder, to reach the estates of those who had broken the covenant between the Government and people. That, as it seems to me, was the opinion of the men who framed the original act of 1862. It is tolerably clear, I think, from the history of the resolution by which it was unfortunately supplemented, that it was not in accordance with the sentiments of that Congress—as I think it is not with the opinion of the present one, or of a majority of the people whom it represents. It was thrown in only, as I understand it, to remove the scruples of the Executive, and to make the best bargain that could be had at that time. That was eighteen months ago. But nothing was ever said more truly than that "times change, and we along with them," even to our material framework, which we shift off as well as our opinions. The world does move—as Galileo still insisted even when he was obliged to recant his astronomical heresies—although it sometimes moves slowly. The President moves too, and slowly also, as he needs must, who is called upon "to bear upon his shoulders the weight of mightiest monarchies." Everything moves—except some of our generals—because war is a great teacher, and thought quickens and ripens rapidly under the fires of revolution. Even our reluctant and unsympathizing friends on the other side are hurried along by the resistless current that sweeps our statesmen like straws upon its surface. Nay, even some of my own Republican auxiliaries on this side have been drifting with the tide into waters too deep to have been even searched by the plummet of conservatism. But a little over three years ago, as I can testify, he was a bold man, as he was sure to be a badly abused one, who would have invoked coercion by force of arms, and ventured to hint at the possibility of the negro, as the soldier who was to be thrown at last, like the sword of Brennus, as the make-weight into the scale. Two years ago there was scarcely a Republican in this House who would have voted for the latter proposition. One year ago every gentleman on the other side would have revolted at it, as they had done before the bombardment of Sumter against coercion. Six months ago the unarmed and defenseless negro was flying like a hunted stag and flying for his life before a cowardly and brutal mob in the streets of the very metropolis of the western hemisphere. Two years ago the dark-skinned child of the tropics was struggling slowly up to the unwonted privilege of cracking his whip over a Federal mule-team, to the horror of all political ethnologists and unbelieving conservatives, who howled denunciations at the Pathfinder of the West, and shouted hosannas to the loiterer at Manassas, and the author and promulgator of Order "No. 3." Now Scipio (Africanus) has a musket in his hand, and stands revealed as a soldier and a man, of higher physical and moral type than his persecutors themselves, in the light of the fiery surge that swept the trenches of Fort Wagner, and under the iron storm that flashed from the blazing ramparts of Port Hudson. The flesh that fed and crisped and crackled in the flames of a metropolitan auto da fé, has turned out to be human, and the blood that was licked up by the devouring element, to be as red and warm as our own, the physiologists and philosophers to the contrary notwithstanding. And now behold the miracle! But yesterday, as it were, only forty-one members of the negro-hating and negro-disparaging party on this floor—hating him in the name of Democracy as a freeman, but loving him too much as a slave to peril his valuable life—could be brought to vote against buckling the harness of the Union on his back, and anointing him as the soldier of the great Republic. Yes, the world does move, and the Executive along with it. Looking as he does now from a different standpoint from that occupied by him eighteen months ago, I would not despair of his approval of a bill to repeal absolutely the unfortunate, emasculating, and, as I think, ill-advised joint resolution of 1862. With all his habitual caution, yielding slowly to his strong convictions of duty and taking no step backward, he has made even greater strides than this. I have confidence in his judgment, as the nation has in his integrity. I have sometimes thought that he was a little slow in a case where promptitude was worth armies, although I could well appreciate the sense of responsibility that must necessarily weigh upon the man who holds a trust the most responsible and novel that has been cast upon any man in the world's history. I dread nothing but the excess of that conservative element which is so ill-suited to occasions like the present. These are times when men cannot afford to doubt, and fear cannot be safely allowed a place in public counsels. The aphorism of Junius is but the translation of the thought of a greater than himself:

"Our doubts are traitors,
That make us lose the good we oft might win,
By fearing to attempt."

While I would have voted, however, for the repeal of the supplementary resolution, it was not to that portion of the act providing the punishment of treason in the ordinary forums that I would have looked for such a remedy as the case seemed to me to demand. With every disposition to allow the fullest effect to the argument that looks in what might be called the radical direction, and claims that the forfeiture may be, in cases of attainder under the Constitution, of the whole estate in lands, and with the knowledge that a controlling reason for the change in the English law, which we had copied, was to be found in the tendency of the earlier practice to break up the estates and families of the great nobility and accumulate their possessions in the hands of the Crown, I could not permit myself to be beguiled by my wishes into the belief that the framers of the Constitution intended anything but what they have so obviously said. Taking as my guide the plain language of that instrument, the state of the law in England and of the prevailing public opinion there and here at the time of its adoption, together with the contemporaneous exposition which it received at the hands of the men who shared so largely in its preparation and advocacy, and the construction given to the disputed clause by all the commentators, without a single exception, so far as I am advised, I cannot bring myself to doubt at this late day as to its meaning and purpose, however much they may run counter to my own inclinations. To yield to them, with my strong convictions, would be to involve me in an act of infidelity as well to my profession as to my legislative trust, by making the wish and not the judgment "father to the thought." I must take the Constitution as I find it written, in spite of the supposed absurdity of authorizing a forfeiture for life in the case of a crime whose usual penalty is death, and where the very attainder, which is a legal and social death, determines that part of the punishment at the very point where it begins. If ingenious gentlemen here had adverted to the process of outlawry, so familiar to British jurisprudence in precisely such cases, and not entirely unknown to our own, or to the possibility of annexing a punishment less than that of death to the highest of crimes, they would not, perhaps, have considered the reductio ad absurdum as quite so complete as they seemed to think it. If we are to punish those who flee from justice into other lands by judicial process, we shall have to draw from the lumber rooms of the profession the old machinery of the exigent. That we may come to treat the highest of crimes as worthy only of the lightest of punishments is not improbable when we find it not only dealt with as eminently chivalrous and respectable, but absolutely rewarded, by allowing its perpetrators to vote with the minority in the organization of the great council of the nation itself, and granting funeral honors to their families, without even a rebuke.

With this reading of the disputed clause of the Constitution reluctantly conceded, and even under the opposite hypothesis—supposing it to be the true one—I can see nothing practical in the attainder by judicial process, and no remedy therein for present or prospective evils, in the infliction of punishment upon the guilty. The Constitution provides that "the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed;" and again, that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury;" and further, that "in all criminal prosecutions the offender shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed." How, then, are you to try, how convict under such limitations as these, where your jurisdiction is ousted, where you are without courts, and where the jury of the vicinage—the peers of the delinquent—are the very partners of his guilt? It would be the merest of mockeries to attempt it. If the arch-apostate himself were to stalk again to-morrow into the Senate Chamber of this nation, reasserting his rights, and reclaiming his abdicated seat in that body, you might arrest him, it is true, but there is no jurisdiction this side of the Potomac—that river of oblivion which sweeps around your capital walls—that could take cognizance of his manifold crimes. These salutary guards which have been borrowed from Magna Charta and thrown around the person of the criminal were not intended for a condition of things like the present. They suppose a state of universal peace, where the law shall speak its potential voice in all its forums, and through all its accredited organs, and not a condition of things where its oracles are silenced, and its priests driven from their very altars. The maxims of peace are not suited to a condition of war. It has run into a proverb that the laws are silent amid the tumult of arms. Where the ordinary jurisdiction has been declined and no common superior is recognized, the case has passed, ex necessitate, into a higher tribunal by the election of the recusant himself, and must be left to the arbitrament which he has chosen, with all the consequences of a judgment there. It has not passed, however, beyond the domain of the Constitution, as the language of my learned and able colleague [Mr. STEVENS] would seem to import. The men who framed that instrument foresaw the exigency with their usual perspicacity, and with their usual wisdom have provided for it, as I think, abundantly. If they have not, then the late Attorney General was right in declaring that there was no warrant for waging this war against the rebellious States, and wrong in presenting himself and his party at the recent elections in Pennsylvania as the advocates of its vigorous prosecution; and then there is no authority for shooting down a rebel on a battle-field. Those who insist that there shall be no punishment for the traitor except by the process of judicial attainder intend that he shall not be punished at all; mean, if they know whereof they speak, entire immunity as well to him as to his wife and children for all his crimes.

I make no account, therefore, of the first four sections of the act of 1862, which, by the way, involve no forfeiture except of property in slaves. True, they impose fines which may result, as it was no doubt intended they should do, in the divestiture of the fee, but whether those fines are in conflict or not with that provision of the Constitution which declares "that excessive fines shall not be imposed or cruel and unusual punishments inflicted," I shall not stop to inquire, for the reason already suggested, of the utter impracticability of making that portion of the law effective in its application to the guilty parties.

Upon the remaining sections of that act, however—always excepting its expatriation clause, whose wisdom at a time when the country so much wants soldiers for its armies and laborers for its fields is not any more obvious to me than that of the repeal of the edict of Nantes or the expulsion of the Moors from Spain—I could have planted myself with assured confidence. I find nothing there that looks to an attainder, nothing that even touches the person, nothing but authority to seize enemies' property and carry it into court for condemnation by a proceeding in rem—against the thing itself—as lawful prize of war. The question of treason is practically adjourned, although not absolutely waived, by the posture of the belligerents. The framers of that law have obviously looked to this as the alternative, well knowing that, although it is a maxim of the common law that there is no wrong without a remedy, there was no remedy here if this one failed.

And this leads me back to the question what is the authority that the public law, which is the law of the case, and pro hac vice the law of the Constitution, gives us over the rights and property of an enemy? And on this point Bynkershoek, of whom Chancellor Kent remarks in Griswold vs. Waddington, (16 Johnston, 438), that he is "one of the most distinguished writers on public law, and that his treatise on the law of war has been more quoted and relied upon as authority in Europe and America than that of any other writer," says that "if we take for our guide nature, that great teacher of the law of nations, we shall find that anything is lawful against an enemy," (p. 2); and further, that a nation that has injured another is considered, with everything that belongs to it, as being confiscated to the nation that receives the injury, (p. 4); and also that "if we follow the strict law of war, even immovables may be sold and their proceeds lodged in the public treasury, as is done with movables, though throughout almost all Europe immovables are only registered, that the treasury may receive during the war their rents and profits, and at the termination of the war, the immovables themselves are by treaty restored to their former owners." The same doctrine is laid down by Wildman, (vol. 2, p. 9); and in the case of Brown vs. The United States, (8 Cranch, 110,) the broad principle was assumed that war gave the sovereign full right to take the property of the enemy wherever found, and that the mitigations of this rigid rule, which the wise and humane policy of modern times has brought into practice, may more or less affect the exercise of the right, but cannot impair the right itself. It has never been disputed, however, that the property of the sovereign may be confiscated, and this on the ground that public wars are wars only between sovereigns.

And now let us look at the practice.

On the 2d of April, 1599, the States General issued an edict with regard to all kinds of property, wherever found, which is in these words: "We declare lawful prize all persons and goods"—the word bona in the civil law including every kind of property, but chiefly applicable to real estate—"situate or being under the jurisdiction of the King of Spain, wherever the same may be taken."

And again, the States General, on the 14th of July, 1584, declared the people of Bruges and Vrye, who had gone over to the Spaniards, to be their enemies, and ordered all their goods, actions, and credits, public as well as private, to be confiscated. And afterwards, when the people of Venloo had also gone over to the Spaniards, the Earl of Leicester, by his edict of July 9, 1586, declared them guilty of the crime of high treason, and ordered all their goods, movable and immovable, and all their actions and credits, to be confiscated. "Nor must it be believed," says Bynkershoek, "that these things were decreed concerning those of Bruges, Vrye, and Venloo, merely because they were not so much enemies, as traitors."

It seems, then, that though the strict law which authorizes the seizure of everything, has been modified by the usages of nearly all Europe, so as to restore it by treaty in the cases cited—which by the way are more than five hundred years after the Norman conquest—the practice was otherwise in one of the most liberal, enlightened, and republican nations of that continent, as it certainly was during the earlier ages of republican Rome. There is as much difference, however, between usage and law, as there is between generosity and justice, in dealing with the affairs of nations.

In the conquests of ancient times, however, even individuals lost their lands. "Nor is it a matter of surprise," remarks Vattel, "that in the early ages of Rome such a custom should have prevailed. The wars of that era were carried on between popular republics and communities. The State possessed very little, and the quarrel was in reality the common cause of all the citizens. But at present one sovereign wars against another sovereign, and not against unarmed citizens," (p. 388.)

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] states the rule which rests upon this idea, and distinguishes between the sovereign and the subject, without reference, however, to the question whether the citizen is armed or not, as he is unquestionably in the present quarrel. He does not deny, if I have correctly understood him, that the property of the sovereign himself may be lawfully taken. In the same speech, however, he declares, and rightly, too, that the sovereignty here is in the people. By his own logic, therefore, the property of individuals may be lawfully taken in a war between republican States which, as Vattel remarks, is in reality the common cause of all the citizens.

But we are not yet done with Vattel. He says further:

"But a conqueror who has taken up arms not only against the sovereign but against the nation herself, and whose intention it is to subdue a fierce and savage people, and once for all to reduce an obstinate enemy, may with justice lay burdens on the conquered nation, both as a compensation for the expenses of the war and as a punishment." (Ibid., 389.) "He may, according to the degree of indolence apparent in their disposition, govern them with a tighter rein, so as to curb and subdue their impetuous spirit; he may even, if necessary, keep them for some time in a kind of slavery."

And again: "Although," as he suggests, "towns and countries should not be deprived by their conqueror of their liberties, privileges, and immunities on account of his quarrel with their sovereign," he adds:

"Nevertheless, if the inhabitants have been personally guilty of any crime against him, he may, by way of punishment, deprive them of their rights and privileges. This he may also do if the inhabitants have taken up arms against him and have thus directly become his enemies. In that case he owes them no more than what is due from a humane and equitable conqueror to his vanquished foes. Should he merely and simply incorporate them with his former State, they will have no cause of complaint." (Ibid., 387.)

And further:

"The whole right of the conqueror is derived from justifiable self-defense, which comprehends the support and prosecution of his rights. When therefore he has totally subdued a hostile nation, he undoubtedly may in the first place do himself justice respecting the object which has given rise to the war, and indemnify himself for the expenses and dangers he has sustained by it. He may, according to the exigency of the case, subject the nation to punishment by way of example. He may even, if prudence requires, render her incapable of doing mischief with the same ease in future. Some princes have contented themselves with imposing a tribute on the conquered nation, others with depriving her of some of her rights—taking from her a province, or erecting fortresses to keep her in awe." (Ibid., 388.) "But if he has to do with a perfidious, restless, and dangerous enemy, he may by way of punishment deprive him of some of his towns or provinces, and keep them to serve as a barrier to his own dominions. Nothing is more allowable than to weaken an enemy who has rendered himself suspected and formidable. The lawful end of punishment is future security." (Ibid., 384.)

Grotius remarks, however, that "in civil wars, be they great or small, there is no change of property but by the sentence of a judge;" but the learned Barbeyrac, in a note on this passage, says that the civilian Ulpian distinguishes between a real war and a civil war, on the ground that the former is made between those who are enemies, and animated by the spirit of enemies, which prompts them to endeavor the ruin of each other's States; whereas in a civil war, however pernicious it often proves to a State, both parties are supposed to intend the preservation of the State. The one is only for saving it in one manner, and the other in another. So that they are not enemies, (inter quos jura captivitatium aut postliminium fuerunt, &c.,) and every person of the two parties continues always a citizen of the State so divided.

The result of all these authorities, then, is that the present is not a civil war only, but a real war; that by the law of nature and of nations in such cases, the treatment of the conquered depends on the particular circumstances of the case; that everything is lawful; that everything belonging to the offending party is confiscated; that the practice of nations has authorized the forfeiture even of the real estate of individuals; that this was more especially authorized in quarrels between republics; that where the quarrel is not with the sovereign, but with the nation, and the intention is to subdue a fierce and savage people, the conqueror may lay burdens on them, not only by way of compensation but of punishment; that if they have been personally guilty of any crime, and have taken up arms against him, he may deprive them of their rights, and owes them no more than what humanity and equity require; that he may do himself justice respecting the object which has given rise to the war, and indemnify himself for the expense and damage he has sustained; that he may subject his enemies to punishment; and that he may render them incapable of further mischief. Indemnity, security, and punishment are all, therefore, means of self-defense which may be legitimately used.

And now let us inquire whether the forfeiture of the estates and property of the traitors—of those who have been actually in arms against us—whether they consist of lands or slaves, is required for these purposes. If it be, there is an end of the question. I have no desire, individually, that anything shall be done for purposes of vengeance only. "Vae victis" is not the maxim of a humane conqueror. "Percere subjectis, debellare superbos" is the rule by which I would be governed. I would not exclude the idea of mercy. I agree with the great poet of human nature that

"It becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown:
And earthly power then shows likest God's,
When mercy seasons justice."

I am not clear, however, as to the wisdom of a proclamation of amnesty in advance as a measure of pacification, without limits as to time, and where submission after conquest, and when it is no longer a virtue but a necessity, is to be rewarded with the same impunity as a voluntary return to duty before that time. But what is the offense, how much have we suffered from it, and how is its recurrence to be prevented?

I think I may safely say that human history presents no parallel to this rebellion. Since the revolt of the rebel angels there has been no example of an insurrection so wanton, so wicked, so utterly causeless, and so indescritably ferocious and demoniac as the present. It was not the case of the oppression of a Government whose weight had borne heavily upon the people. It was none of a violation of the fundamental law. The object was not redress, like that of our Revolution, but destruction. It was a rebellion against the majority rule for the purpose not of reforming, but of overthrowing the Government, and erecting upon its ruins another of an oligarchic cast, whose corner-stone was property in man. It was the product of a system which threw all the lands of the South into the hands of a few men. It involved an act of aggravated treason against a humane, paternal, and unoffending Government. It has been conducted with a degree of inhumanity that has no example except in barbarian wars. It has involved to us an enormous expenditure of money and of blood. Its suppression has become impossible without removing the cause of strife, and disabling our enemy by liberating his slaves, and arming them against him. It cannot be repaired. There is no reparation possible that would be commensurate with the injury. Can you breathe new life into the bones that ornament the necks and fingers of southern dames, or bleach unburied, without even the humble privilege of a grave, on southern battle-fields? Can you reclothe them with the comely vesture that has been given to the vultures of the southern skies? Who shall restore the shattered limb; who fill the vacant chair at the family fireside; who give back the husband and the father, or dry the tears of the widow and the orphan? What trump, but that of the dread archangel, who gathers the tribes of the earth for the last solemn judgment, shall awaken the gallant dead who sleep in bloody garments in their beds of glory, from their deep repose? Mock not the grief that is unutterable by the suggestion of indemnity or reparation. "Give me back my legions!" was the passionate exclamation of the Roman Augustus, when a swift messenger brought to him the tidings of the slaughter of Varus and his brave companions in the forests of Germany. "Give me back my children!" is the wailing cry that will burst from the bosom of the American mother, who weeps like Rachel for her first-born, by the waters of the Merrimac and the Ohio—or mock me not with the idea of reparation. There is no reparation for it, as there can be no punishment; except in the divestiture of the rights and the seizure of the estates of the guilty leaders. There is no security except in the distribution of the latter, and the complete exorcism of the hell-born and hell-deserving spirit that has wrought all this world-wide ruin.

These things are necessary. Is there anything in the law of nature to prevent them? Gentlemen object that to seize the inheritance would be to visit the sins of the guilty upon the innocent. They plead for the wife whose counsels have driven the husband into rebellion. They weep crocodile tears for the offspring who have been taught to spit upon the flag of their country, who are without title until the decease of a parent who may happen to die intestate, and upon whom no law of nature, but only the law which he has violated, would in that case have devolved the succession. The widow and the children of those, however, who have fallen in the effort to suppress this unholy rebellion have no share in their sympathies. The chances of war may strip them of their inheritance, but that makes no difference with them. They take no account of the fact that nature and Providence have alike decreed that the sins of the fathers, and even their misfortunes, shall be visited upon their children, and that the law which authorizes the sale of the estate for the debts of the former has everywhere affirmed its justice. The misfortunes of a northern man and his death in righteous battle at the hands of a southern assassin, may reduce his offspring to beggary. All this is right; but to allow the family of the traitor who has dealt a foul blow at the social state, and stricken down all the securities of property, to suffer, is regarded as a great injustice. The felon-brood may run its plowshare over the bones of the loyal martyr, while his children are perhaps eating the bread of charity in their northern homes, and it is all right, because the former are the salt of the earth, and a just punishment would only exasperate them into a new rebellion. Let them rebel. A just poverty will render their efforts harmless, and, by teaching them the value and respectability of labor, make them only wiser and better men. With my consent they shall never trample upon the relics of a northern soldier. I would carve out inheritances for his children upon the soil that his sword has ransomed, and his blood baptized and fertilized. God's justice demands it, and the heart and conscience of the American people will say, Amen.

But gentlemen here insist that we cannot subdue the revolted States, and ask triumphantly where there is an independent Government with ten millions of people, maintaining itself for three years, that has ever been conquered? What do they mean by this language? Do they intend that we shall not conquer them if they can prevent it? Why do they insist on exaggerating the numbers and prowess and resources of the enemy, and ignoring the facts of history, to show that subjugation is impossible? Do they participate in the feeling which they have done so much to inspire, that one of this barbarian rabble which claims to belong to the master race, and rejoices to hear itself called a nation of Cavaliers by degenerate spirits on this floor, is equal to at least six northern freemen with all the advantages of an unbounded credit and a high civilization? When they say here, and say to the country, that twenty-three million white men with four million blacks, all battling for liberty, and with these great advantages in the struggle, are unable to subdue less than four millions of their own race, without credit or resources, and with no higher inspiration than slavery, they libel the people of the North, by declaring in effect that they are not worthy to be free. But what do they propose in view of these opinions, supposing them to be true? They say that they wish to preserve the Union, but that this is not to be accomplished by fighting for it. They desire to treat for its restoration. Their nostrums are, in the language of a gentleman from Indiana, "conciliation and concession." Well, the former has been tried under border State counsels. We carried on the war for eighteen months on the principle of doing as little harm as possible to our enemy. They have declared, however, again and again that they will only treat on the footing of their entire independence. Negotiation admits the fact of secession, if not the right, and involves only the alternatives of recognition or reconstruction on such terms as they may choose to dictate. Do gentlemen here propose to avoid dismemberment and preserve the Union by going into the confederacy? Is this the concession that is to be the peace-maker? Is this the errand on which we are to send ambassadors to pass under the Caudine yoke? No. Gentlemen here may humble themselves to the dust, and confess their unworthiness in the presence of this superior race, but they have mistaken their masters, the people, if they suppose that they have any idea of falling into the barefooted procession of mendicants which is endeavoring to find its way South, in order to kiss the black stone at the Mecca of treason, to which they turn so reverentially in their speeches here. The people are high-spirited, if their servants are not. They know that if we have not whipped the rebels it is only because we have taken counsel from the men who thought we could not. They intend to clear up this aspersion on their manhood by showing that they can not only subjugate the rebels in the South, but that they can do the same, if necessary, with their sympathizers in the North. They have made up their minds to chastise the self-abasing thought out of those who have entertained it, and to preserve this Union at any sacrifice, and woe to him who ventures to gainsay their decision!

But then there is a difference of blood, which renders conquest, and would, by the same logic, render a harmonious reunion, impossible. Gentlemen on the other side insist upon distinguishing, to their own disadvantage, between the North and South in this particular. They tell us that the latter are a nation of Cavaliers, while we are only Puritans or Quakers or Pennsylvania Dutch. Well, if it were true, and they were twice as numerous as they are, there is nothing in the facts of history to warrant the servile reiteration here, of the Richmond vaunt that they cannot be conquered, and will die in the last ditch, if necessary. The little island of Great Britain holds in bondage the Celt of Ireland and the hundred millions of India, while the Manchou Tartar dominates over three hundred and fifty million Chinese. Alexander left the world as a legacy to his generals, and the Ottoman still sits upon the Bosphorus, and sways his scepter over the imperial city of the East. But it is not true. Gentlemen on the other side are as much out, I think, in their ethnology as in their history. There is no distinction of blood, and none of habit or opinion, except that which must prevail between a higher civilization and a lower one. If they mean that the men who colonized the South were a superior variety of the same stock, they speak in ignorance of the fact that the New England Pilgrims were the very highest and purest type of the genuine Englishman, abandoning high social positions and comfortable homes, in the quest of liberty in the New World, while the colonists of the South were, with a few exceptions, a motley and miscellaneous herd of mere adventurers, some flying from their creditors at home, and others rejected by the stomach of the Old World, and vomited per force upon our shores. If they mean that they are of the class which believes in the divine right of kings, in the idea of an exclusive caste, and that free society is a failure, then they are, perhaps, right. But these opinions were not imported by them. They are of indigenous growth. They are the legitimate offspring of the institution which turns the man into a chattel, and makes him the property of his fellow. They are the results of a social system that ignores the idea of republican equality, and cannot possibly exist, as it never yet has existed, in any other than an essentially aristocratic State, which it must necessarily engender, if it does not find it ready-made. In this sense of the word they are indeed a sort of bastard Cavaliers—with this difference, however—that the type of the class was a pattern of knightly faith, who honored and worshipped his God, his lady, and his king; while this, the counterfeit presentment, is a sort of Jothan Wild—half highwayman and half footpad—rejoicing in treason, murder, perjury, and robbery, and signaling his faith and gallantry by lynching Methodist preachers, selling or burning negroes, or hunting them with blood-hounds, and persecuting helpless and unoffending Yankee school-masters. And yet there is not a miserable sand-hiller in the Carolinas who does not claim, upon northern testimony, such as we listen to here, a lineal descent from the companions of the Conqueror, and strut and swagger with an air even more lordly than the sans-culotte Mosquito king, or the equally ambitious and pretentious native of the Gold Coast, who, in complete destitution of all nether integuments, buttons up his superior man, and treads the deck of a man-of-war in the regimental coat of a British officer.

There is one fact I admit, and it is the only one that does seem to indicate an ethnological difference, and that is that the newly invented Cavalier, like the Frenchman and the Spaniard and the other dark-skinned races of southern Europe, crosses readily with the black man, as the Teuton rarely does with either the black man or any of the Celtic tribes, whose politics, ignoring generally the individual man, know no Government without a king, as their religion knows no Church without a pope. The blood of these two great families of man, flowing side by side in parallel currents for more than a thousand years in France, has never intermingled, and the example of the French and Spanish settlements in Louisiana, Florida, and the Canadas, is evidence that they do not intermingle here, but that the Latin races, like the Indian, are dying out under the shadow of the paler Northman. I leave the negro, however, and his place in nature and the social scale to the ethnologists like the gentleman from Ohio, only advising further researches in this new and interesting branch of political science. I am not personally averse to these speculations. I do not know whether the question of politics may not turn out at last to be no more than a question of ethnology. Setting the darker races aside, I have been sometimes tempted to think that I could almost determine a priori from the physiognomies around me here the political complexions of the men to whom they respectively belonged. On this hypothesis I should have put the gentleman from Ohio just where I find him.

I do not, however, insist upon the fact just mentioned as conclusive upon the point of consanguinity, and am still willing to confess, if their friends here will consider it no disparagement to the chivalry, that we belong to the same family. I would not underrate the stock either in its courage or capabilities. They are just as good in that respect as ourselves; and no better. That we do not harmonize is only attributable to the institution that makes them fierce and proud and barbarous, and haters of everything that savors of democracy. Take that away, and we shall run together again like two globules of mercury. Take that away, and there never was a people more homogeneous than ourselves, with the exception of the one disturbing element, the Celtic Irishman, who, with high courage and quick and generous impulses, if he cannot be absorbed—or, if gentlemen on the other side prefer the etymological hybrid, miscegenated—will probably be subdued into habits of republican obedience under the instruction of the Yankee schoolmaster. Take that away, and we shall have no one cause of discord left.

Rather, however, than do this simple thing—demanded as well on grounds of consistency as of security—gentleman on the other side, who admire the Cavalier and dislike the Puritan, would prefer to treat with the former at the expense of the latter. In the Cincinnati convention of 1856, a delegate from Pennsylvania declared that in case of a separation that State would go with the South. New York was expected to take the same direction, and upon these assurances the South went out. The programme was that the pestilent Puritan, who would think and talk at all hazards, because he claimed it as his birthright, must be excluded. There was no place in any plan of reconstruction for him. New England was to be left out in the cold.

Leave out New England in the cold! Well, I am no Yankee. No drop of my blood has ever filtered through that stratum of humanity. I claim, however, to be a man. I think I love liberty above all things. I know that I can respect and admire courage, and constancy, and high thought, and heroic achievement, wherever I may find them. I would not quarrel even with an overstrung philanthropy. I can always excuse the errors that lean on the side of virtue, and find fanaticism much more readily in that devil-worship of slavery, that would be willing to sacrifice not only all New England but even the Union itself upon its horrid altars, than in those noble spirits whose sin is only their excessive love for man. I may speak, therefore, without prejudice.

Leave out New England in the cold! I doubt whether even this would chill her brave heart, or quiet its tumultuous throbbings for humanity. Though no ardent southern sun has quickened her pulses, or kindled her blood, into lava, no frigid neutrality has ever frozen her into stone when the interests of liberty appealed to her for protection. She has been ever faithful to the memory of the great idea which brought her founders across the ocean, as the only colony that landed in this newly discovered hemisphere upon any other errand than the search for gold. I cannot forget that it was this proscribed race that inaugurated the Revolution, by forging in their capital the thunderbolts that smote the tyranny of England, and dyeing their garments with its first blood upon the commons of Lexington. Leave out New England in the cold! You may look unkindly upon her, but you cannot freeze her into apathy any more than you can put out the light of her eyes, or arrest the missionary thought which she has launched over a continent. It was not New England that stood shivering in cold indifference when the boom of the first rebel gun in Charleston harbor thrilled along her rock-bound coast. Taking no thought of cost or consequences, she rushed down like an avalanche to avenge the insulted flag of our fathers, and Massachusetts was glorified by a second baptism when the blood of her sons dyed the paving-stones of the city of Baltimore. I would it had been my own great State, whose drum-beat was the first that waked an echo in these Halls, which had won the honor of that sacrifice. But it was not so ordained.

Mr. KELLEY. With the permission of my colleague I will remark that five companies of Pennsylvania troops came through Baltimore on the 18th of April, a day preceding the appearance of the sixth Massachusetts in that city, and the blood of some of them was shed, though not unto death, in the streets of that city. He may therefore truthfully claim that the first blood shed in this war was that of Pennsylvanians.

Mr. STROUSE. Allow me to say that the first blood shed was the blood of a negro from my district who accompanied the first companies that came here for the defense of the capital.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, the first man that bled in this war was a negro by the name of Nicholas Biddle, a constituent of my colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. STROUSE. I did not say he was a constituent of mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Leave out Massachusetts in the cold! What matters it that no tropical sun has fevered her northern blood into the delirium of treason? I know no trait of tenderness more touching and more human than that with which she received back to her arms the bodies of her lifeless children. "Handle them tenderly," was the message of her loyal Governor. Massachusetts desired to look once more upon the faces of her martyred sons, "marr'd as they were by traitors." She lifted gently the sable pall that covered them. She gave them a soldier's burial and a soldier's farewell; and then, like David of old when he was informed that the child of his affections had ceased to live, she rose to her feet, dashed the tear-drop from her eye, and in twenty days her iron-clad battalions were crowning the heights, and her guns frowning destruction over the streets of the rebel city. Shut out Massachusetts in the cold! Yes. You may blot her out from the map of the continent; you may bring back the glacial epoch, when the Arctic ice-drift that has deposited so many monuments on her soil swept over her buried surface—when the polar bear, perhaps, paced the driving flocks, and the walrus frolicked among the tumbling icebergs—but you cannot sink her deep enough to drown the memory of Lexington and Concord, or bury the summit of the tall column that lifts its head over the first of our battle-fields. "With her," in the language of her great son, "the past at least is secure."

The muse of history has flung her story upon the world's canvas in tints that will not fade and cannot die.

But while we are told by gentlemen on the other side that we cannot conquer the South we are somewhat inconsistently charged in almost the same breath with a desire to protract the war for the purpose of perpetuating our own power, and asked imperiously how long it is to continue, and when and how it is to end. Allow me to say, in the first place, that the prolongation of the war is not the means which a rational man would adopt to secure the ascendancy of the Republican party. No administration in any free country has ever been strong enough to stand up successfully in the face of a long and expensive war, where results have proved incommensurate with means, and enormous armies that wanted to fight were compelled to stagnate in inglorious repose. None has been strong enough to carry on its shoulders many such generals as the unready captain who is the idol of the Democracy, or him who was just half an hour too late at Williamsport. No rebellion was ever put down by heroes of the Fabian type or instrumentalities like the spade. No country is rich enough to hold such masses of men inactive for indefinite periods of time, and under the command of generals who fortify when they ought to attack, and turn away whenever the enemy turns upon them. If there is anything I dread and deplore it is the tenacity with which such men are retained after repeated failures. If there is anything which gentlemen on the opposite side desire it is to see this struggle protracted under the auspices of just such leaders, who have invariably been their especial favorites, until the patience of the country is exhausted and its credit entirely ruined. I think I understand them. They want no Grants or Butlers; but they know that another McClellan will arm them with the argument that a Republican Administration is inadequate to the times. They do not want this war to terminate until the next presidential election.

To the question, however, how long it is to continue, an apt response might readily be found in the stormy exordium of the Roman orator when he drove the infamous Catiline from the hall of its august senate: "How long, O Catiline, wilt thou abuse our patience? How long wilt thy unbridled audacity parade itself insultingly here?" That, however, would savor too much of the Yankee by answering one question with another. Allow me then to respond a little more directly that it will continue just so long as the interrogator and his confederates here and elsewhere shall continue successfully to embarrass the Government in its prosecution, and to encourage protracted resistance by assurances so often repeated on this floor, and so eagerly caught up and reiterated by the rebel presses, that we cannot conquer the insurgents. The last hope of the rebels is confessedly in the success of their sympathizers here.

But these gentlemen, the neutrals of the border and the conservatives of the North, Arcadian all, have, I think, about performed their mission. They have done, not the work they intended, but the one they have been put upon by the great Ruler of nations. It was a bloody work, but it was, perhaps, a necessary one. A blow struck at the heart of the rebellion at its outset, in the spirit of the proclamation of Fremont, would probably have made an end of it for the time being, while it preserved its cause. The conservative statesmen were wanted to make the remedy radical and sure, by prolonging and exasperating the strife, and intensifying and universalizing the very partial abolition feeling of the North. It was the voice of Jehovah that spake from the iron throats of those engines that hurled their defiant missiles against our flag at Sumter, just as the same voice thundered from the clouds and darkness of Sinai, when it promulgated to the world the great law of humanity. It was the great proclamation of freedom to the oppressed, anteceding that of the President by nearly two years, that pealed in the ears of the lordly chivalry who held high carnival on that memorable day on the boulevards of Charleston. The light that blazed from the muzzles of those guns flashed over the American firmament with a radiance like that which flooded chaos at the fiat of Omnipotence on the first morning of creation. Thinking people saw it and rejoiced. It was "the beginning of the end" of the long agony under which this nation had been sweating, as it were, great drops of blood. The war had become a necessity, which politicians were powerless either to postpone or avert. Though no abolitionist—till then—I saw it and rejoiced along with them. I thanked God, as I do now, that by an act of sublime justice, such as the pen of inspiration had never recorded and the genius of the drama never imagined, He had put out the eyes of the slave-owner and guided his own hands to the pillars of the temple which protected him; that He had made him drunk with arrogance, and decreed a transcendent suicide, by making himself the Nemesis, the instrument of the great work, which no merely human agencies could have accomplished. But that work would have been imperfect without more; and, by an act of justice equally sublime, He called into counsel the statesmen of the border, along with the advocates of human bondage in the North, and neutrality and conservatism stood hand in hand by the bedside of the sufferer, helping it into eternity, and mistaking all the while—like the lachrymose and lugubrious gentleman from Indiana—in the sepulchral gloom of that chamber of mortality, the unburied and offensive corpse over which he still sobs, for the image of a dead or dying Union. If the border States, if Kentucky especially has suffered, as she is claimed to have done, if her dwellings have been desolated and her soil drenched with the blood of her people, she has to thank her statesmen, as we of the free States do for all the sacrifices it has cost us to save the negro, while we were throwing away the priceless jewels of the North. If, instead of a neutrality which was only another name for treason—which the law of Solon would have denounced as the worst of crimes, and the fierce genius of Dante would have gibbeted in immortal and withering verse—if, instead of denying to the General Government and even to her own citizens, the privilege of organizing troops upon her soil, she had but opened her arms to a deliverer, a hundred thousand northern bayonets would have belted her round as with a wall of fire, and no hostile foot would ever have left a mark upon her soil. She chose the other part. Neutrality flushed slowly into the sickly and livid hue, the pale, disastrous twilight of conservatism, and sat upon her chest and ours until its pulses were almost hushed; and, as a consequence of all this, the bravest of her sons have died ignobly in the effort to destroy the Union of their fathers, and the most honored of her names have gone down in darkness among the nameless and undistinguished dead, and found and now sleep in felons' graves, unknelt, uncoffined—"unwept, unhonored, and unsung."

But what is to be the end? Who doubts it that trusts in Providence and knows that God is just? In the darkest hour of our trial, when the gallant bark that bears our fortunes had disappeared among the mountain billows that threatened to engulf it, and the lowering clouds shrouded in temporary darkness the glorious constellation of our fathers—when all monarchical Europe clapped its hands and sang psalms of joy as the great Republic reeled and staggered under the felon blows that were so treacherously aimed at her life by the hands of her own unnatural children—I, for one, never doubted or faltered. I knew that its timbers might be strained and its prow dip deeply in the trough of the sea, but I read "resurgam" on its keel. I had a faith that it must come up again, with the old flag—that God-blessed banner of our fathers, type of regenerated humanity, symbol of hope to the nation—still flying at its peak, its only stain washed out, like the star that guided the magi over the plains of Bethlehem, to light the oppressed of the Old World to a knowledge of their rights and capabilities. If it might be permitted to the great captain who conquered the liberties of Rome to say to the trembling pilot, "Why fear you? you carry Cæsar," how much more may we—with such a freight as no vessel ever bore since the ark of the patriarch rocked upon the heaving tides of the deluge, or grounded upon the lofty summits of Ararat—say to the trembling cowards who despair of the Republic, and even yet sit down and wring their hands like women over the impossibility of saving it, "O ye of little faith! Up, if ye are men! A world's hopes are staked upon your manhood!" Yes, there is no throb of this great heart that does not pulsate through the nations as they stand at gaze, looking with sus-pendent breath upon the swaying fortunes of this Titanic struggle. It is the great battle of the ages. It is universal humanity in its last death-wrestle with the powers of despotism. It is a narrow view of this controversy to suppose it a question of freedom to the negro only. The chain that binds four millions black men and as many white, both North and South, reaches not only to far distant Africa, but grasps in its iron links the men of all climes and complexions, from the green island that hangs at the belt of Britain to the gorges of the snowy Caucasus—from the Hindoo who bathes in the Ganges to the Kalmuck who pastures his flocks upon the steppes of Tartary.

I trust we shall not either ignore or underrate our mission. We are in the midst of a new experiment upon the grandest theater that the world ever saw. God has so fashioned this country as to make it an indissoluble unit. What He has so joined together all the powers of earth and hell cannot rend asunder. The man who would consent to divide it upon any terms is like the false mother who was willing to take the mutilated half of the child. The individual who would treat for its severance, or even send an embassy to those who insist that nothing short of this will satisfy them—if an American—is a man I cannot comprehend. I do not claim any more natural sensibility than other men, but when the dome of this Capitol first rose before me in the spring-time of life, I looked upon it with a feeling to which no words of mine could give expression. It was not the colossal pile of masonry—it was not the Doric column, or the storied architrave, or the frescoed wall, or the tessellated floor, or any of the wonders of Grecian or Italian art, which the last few years have so multiplied around us. It was the great thought of the Union, embodied—it was the great fact of the Union, idealized in stone; it was the starry ensign that fluttered over these Halls where the nation's Representatives were assembled; it was the reflection that there, under that banner, in these seats, and hanging in these galleries, were congregated the representative men of half a continent—from the icy lakes of the North to the orange groves of Louisiana—from the men who hunted the moose on the hills of the Aroostook to those who chased the buffalo over the great prairies of the West; men who never met elsewhere, but were here commingled in common brotherhood, in devotion to the one great idea for the development of which this vast continent seems to have been specially reserved.

Away with the jargon of art in such a presence as this! Blood, pulse, and heart confessed the power of that overmastering thought. It was a part of the education of the boy; and as I come back now, in the maturity of years, to take my seat in these Halls—enlarged and beautified as they have been—as one of the Representatives of a domain which dwarfs the empire of the Macedonian; to realize that yonder imperial bird, which stoops over your head—the sea-eagle of the vikings—a little rapacious perhaps at times—has swept within almost a generation, with a pinion stronger than that of the eagle of the Caesars, over a region almost as wide as any that ever owned their sway, while the establishments of the Old World have paled with affright at the rush of its mighty plumes; blood, pulse, and heart still recognize the sublime idea that was responded to by the bounding pulse of boyhood. God of our fathers! what an inheritance for humanity, and what a theater for the sublimest of its developments, and what a trust too for us who have been summoned here in the hour of the nation's agony to witness the new birth that is to be the resurrection to a new and better life! And who is the degenerate American in this great assemblage that would even hold counsel with those that would imagine its dismemberment? Who is it that, in view of the past fate of all who have faltered in the hour of the nation's trial, and of the resistless current that is now drifting the feeble and the faint-hearted into oblivion, will be foolhardy enough to attempt to stem that avalanche of opinion which has just swept down from the White mountains of New Hampshire, and will strew all the other States with monuments of the public wrath in the wreck that it is making of the anti-war party of the North? Thank God! the dark hour has passed. The skirts of this mighty storm are drawing off. The fields that have been watered by its bloody shower will soon be green again. We shall come out of this war with a development of muscle and manhood that will shame our former degeneracy and make the world tremble at our power. We shall have passed the ordeal that was to try us as a nation, when we shall have walked the burning plowshare of revolution—as we shall walk it—with our garments unsinged, and demonstrated—as we shall demonstrate—under trials that would have shaken down the proudest monarchies of Europe, the intelligent, affectionate, and unwavering loyalty of a self-governing people, and the sublime energy and indestructible vitality of the republican idea. Our Government will be no longer an experiment, but a fact of history; and we shall resume our no longer questionable rank among the great Powers of the earth, as first among our peers, the great Republic of the Western Hemisphere, one and indivisible.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is one of serious importance, and involves principles that controvert and overthrow all our preconceived ideas of the admission of States into this Union, and ought not to be adopted without due deliberation. I believe it to be an utter subversion of the Constitution; that we have no warrant or justification whatever for it, in that instrument, even by giving it the most latitudinarian construction. In my opinion it embraces a plan that can never be enforced except by the military arm; and it is only the precursor of the establishment of a despotism, instead of the republican form of government upon which we have so long been accustomed to pride ourselves.

The proposed plan and that of the President are fraught with so many objections that prudence would dictate their abandonment. I believe the great question is not the reconstruction of State constitutions, when we have not a foothold in one of those that seceded that could be retained for a day upon the withdrawal of our armies; and, with the exception of Tennessee and probably Arkansas, the portions we occupy in every other are but a small fraction of the whole State.

But, sir, let me first recur to the past. It is but a few years since an American citizen could look upon the broad map of his country, and with a laudable pride truthfully exclaim, "It is the only free one upon the globe!" Our commerce penetrated every sea, and there was no nation so presumptuous as to dare with impunity interfere with our flag. Agriculture, manufactures, in fact all the industrial callings, teemed with their painstaking devotees. There was a general distribution of employments, each avocation providing for its proportion of the workers of our country. The rich prairies and the once dense forests gave unmistakable evidence of the industry, patience, and perseverance of our people, and the churches and school-houses afforded proof of their virtue and intelligence. To the eye of the traveler all this betokened that ours was indeed a happy country, and only needed prudence in our rulers, and patriotism, conciliation, and a due attention to the requirements of our Constitution and the genius of our Government among all classes to make those enjoyments perpetual. Then we had comparatively no national debt, and the Government was wholly supported without resort to taxation or levying money upon the States. Then the rights of each individual, however humble, were respected, and no infringement thereof, except by due course of law, was tolerated. If illegally incarcerated, the habeas corpus was a remedy, and a denial of the writ would not have been for a moment permitted. The freedom of elections was another of the rights of which our people were justly proud; and any illegal interference therewith by the strong arm of an Administration would have aroused, without distinction of party, the entire population. All these matters were the birthright and the pride of our citizens, and they had fondly cherished the opinion that no power could arise that would dare strike a blow at those privileges, dear-bought and inborn in the American heart, and which they deemed they cherished as their life-blood, and would protect at every sacrifice. Then, too, the national and the State governments had their respective powers properly defined, and each was considered sovereign in its sphere. Our Constitution was held sacred, and its support and maintenance the pride as well as the duty of every friend of freedom. It was "no North and no South," the Union, and the whole Union. Happy but unfortunate delusion! How changed, however, the scene!

But three years have passed, and our citizens are incarcerated for months in loathsome dungeons, and then discharged, even without their offense or the cause of the arrest having been made known. The elective franchise has been interfered with; and free-born citizens have been compelled to abstain from the exercise of the rights of suffrage, or vote at the instigation of the bayonet for the person prescribed. The writ of habeas corpus has been denied, the freedom of speech interfered with, and our rights as freemen imperiled; the whole industrial pursuits of the country diverted, our commerce nearly banished from the ocean, a debt already counted by thousands of millions of dollars incurred, taxation to meet our expenses imposed and to be imposed in every imaginable form, and to an unlimited extent, and yet our resources not sufficient by hundreds of millions of dollars to defray our annual current expenses. We have also a bloody, intestine war, and a divided country.

The historic annals of no nation present such a rapid change as ours. We have descended from the height of prosperity to the depths of a profound abyss, where we find ourselves without a guide, and no apparent way of escaping. The prospect before us may indeed appal the stoutest heart; and to extricate our country requires far wiser counsels and more stability of purpose than has been manifested by those who now have charge of the administration of our affairs. It is now over three years since the accession of Mr. Lincoln to the presidential chair; and we can well pause and take a brief retrospect of the past, review his changing policy, and learn, if we can, the fortune the future has in store for our country. This ought to be done with all sincerity and fairness, but with such freedom as the subject requires. The times demand such a course; and Mr. Lincoln or any other individual is comparatively of no consequence when the "life of the nation," to borrow a hackneyed expression, is at stake.

During this Administration its peculiar devotees have endeavored to make the terms "Administration" and "Government" synonymous, and to charge the person as either a traitor or a rebel sympathizer who had the temerity to canvass the wisdom of any of the acts adopted by the dominant party or to doubt their expediency. Since the rising of the star of Fremont these terms have become less common; and by this slight diversion in their ranks reason has partially resumed her throne, and an intelligent and discerning people have dissipated the gossamer web with which the demagogue surrounded his specious reasoning, and they have learned that the "Administration" is composed of those servants, elected for the time being to execute the laws of their country, amenable, like the mass of that people, to those laws and responsible for any violation.

Our country would indeed be in a sad condition if in the three centuries' progress since the days of the Tudors we could not have the privilege of canvassing the acts of our rulers. It was then said by men like Lord Bacon "that the royal prerogative was not to be canvassed nor disputed nor examined; that absolute princes, such as the sovereigns of England, were a species of divinity; that it was in vain to attempt trying the queen's hands by laws and statutes," and "that God hath given that power to absolute princes which He attributes to Himself." And Mr. Secretary Cecil, with all the zeal of some of our modern administrative zealots, exclaimed, "Before I would speak and give consent to a case that should debase the prerogative or abridge it, I would wish that my tongue were cut out of my head."

This doctrine of the days of Elizabeth is especially commended to those blind devotees that deprecate any canvassing the acts of the present Administration; but to that class of our citizens who cherish the memory of our revolutionary fathers, and are intent upon the preservation of their constitutional rights, it is as odious as that of its correlative, which requires for the present Executive entire immunity from discussion. It should be our pride to receive lessons from the historic past, and profit by them when applicable to our own case, and those base sycophants who would sap the foundations of our liberty, and pave the way for the introduction into this country of the arbitrary code of despotism of the sixteenth century, that our enlightened English brethren long since discarded, should receive the execrations of freemen.

That Administration that will not bear to have its acts discussed in the press and by the people is unworthy of a free people's support; and when discussion is interfered with, and a quiet acquiescence follows, the liberties of the people are rapidly waning, and it will soon require a herculean effort to rescue them from total destruction. Though the attempt may be intermitted, yet if irresponsible power have been once exercised, and quietly though temporarily submitted to by a subdued people, there is no surety upon the recurrence of a supposed necessity when it becomes indispensable to prolong an Administration that like arbitrary power may not be again grasped. In times like these, with the evidences of an implicit obedience by a portion of the military to the more than imperial behests of the Executive, it behooves us to be doubly active in the preservation of these rights.

We hear it daily bruited, both in this House and in the Administration press, that we have much denunciation of them, and none for the rebellion. The Democracy of this country have no sympathy or favor for the rebellion. In all their acts and speeches they have evinced as sincere devotion to the Union as have the peculiar friends in the majority. They have rightly deprecated the cause that has precipitated the war upon us, and tried to fix the divided responsibility where it belongs, yet they have given the Administration every constitutional aid in bringing it to an honorable issue, with our Union and our Constitution preserved intact. We have voted men and money for that purpose; we have encouraged the enlistment of our friends in our gallant Army, and have bid them God-speed and a glorious success in their efforts to restore the whole Union. Have the Republicans done more than this? Is it necessary now to continue mere shouting? Will denunciation insure success? Will words frighten the rebel army? Experience teaches the reverse. Sacred history informs us that the walls of an ancient city were destroyed by the blowing of rams' horns, and the majority seem to be of the opinion that success will crown their miserable parody of a like feat. I have ever believed that patriotic action was superior to denunciation; and if the party in power had omitted the latter, and in good faith devoted themselves and the country wholly to a restoration and preservation of the Union, that happy consummation would long since have been realized.

But, sir, we have one thing to console us. No conservative speaker, no conservative paper has advocated the doctrine of secession. We have not, like President Lincoln, told the people of the South that they, "being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing Government and form one that suits them better." And I would recommend my friend from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] in his next edition of his laudations of Mr. Lincoln to incorporate this, that our President may not be interfered with in his copyright title as one of the original advocates of the doctrine of secession. We have not, like distinguished Senators and others holding high offices and high places in the confidence of the Administration, advocated a dissolution of the Union; but have ever, as in 1813-14, when a band of traitors assembled at Hartford for that purpose, and in 1830, when South Carolina attempted to nullify the laws, stood by the Government and endeavored to preserve it and our Constitution as our fathers made them. We have ever wished, and I trust we will continue so to do, to preserve that country and that sacred instrument both from enemies and traitors within and without. Our record in this respect is one of which any party might be proud; and when pseudo-patriots arise in our midst and arrogate to themselves all the Unionism and all the loyalty of the country, with such a history as their leaders present, we may well pause and inquire the causes of their strange conversion.

I could occupy more than my hour in brief selections from the public speeches of these gentlemen showing that the Union they favor is not the Union of Washington and Madison, but a new one of their own devising; and prove that if their wish cannot be obtained they will not only prevent that consummation, the restoring our old Union, but will aid in forming another. They take to their bosoms and cherish men whose boast it is they have devoted their lives to a destruction of the old Union—men who have proclaimed that our "Constitution was a covenant with death and an agreement with hell." The Helpers and the Giddings and their pestilent coworkers in dissension and disunion occupy high positions, while the consistent patriot, who will not give his assent to every act of the Administration and approve its usurpations of despotic power, is denounced as a traitor!

I will not on this occasion attempt to enumerate the various encroachments upon the liberties of the people and the palpable violations of the Constitution of which the dominant party have been guilty. I know it is claimed because that portion of our once prosperous Union now in rebellion have discarded that instrument that we are also justifiable in departing from its conditions. I believe, sir, that our Constitution contained sufficient to enable any Administration to protect this Government from the attack of every enemy without adding to or departing from any of its provisions. To make our Government respected requires stability in its administration. The citizen should derive his knowledge of his own and his rulers' duties from the written and the established laws of the country; nor under any circumstances should a departure therefrom be permitted. If Mr. Lincoln, as he and his friends claim they have a right to do, for any cause, transcends the limitations provided for the performance of his constitutional duties in one respect, he may in another. It matters little how praiseworthy his motives or how honest his intentions, the act is none the less a violation of the Constitution he has sworn to "preserve, protect, and defend." The argument because the South have done the same is of no avail; and the consequence is, if the doctrine prevail, we have no guarantee whatever for our protection. The violation of to-day is a precedent for to-morrow; and it will require but a few years for our people, if they submit as quietly in the future as they have in the immediate past to a power based, not upon a written Constitution, with the terms of which they are familiar, but upon the varying whims and caprices of that individual who is fortunate enough to fill the presidential chair, to reconcile themselves to a kingly power.

Criminations and recriminations now will not atone for the past; but I believe no exigency has arisen in our history to render any infraction of this kind necessary or that afforded even a palliation. But we are told if we will only aid now in putting down the rebellion, upon the return of peace all will be well, and we can live once more in a reunited country purged of every foul blot upon her escutcheon. Such language as this is an insult to the conservative men. Never have they swerved in their devotion to the Union, and in the first half of Mr. Lincoln's administration they gave him, in all his consistent and constitutional efforts in that behalf, as earnest a support as did his own chosen followers. True, they did not approve his principles nor of the manner in which he was administering the affairs of the nation, but upon the great question of no disintegration of our Republic there was then, as there is now, no division of sentiment. The vacillating course of the Administration has served to disgust even the warmest of its radical friends, and can it be supposed that those who are in favor of consistency and a constitutional Administration, can approvingly follow in all the meanderings of the Executive? Besides, does an acquiescence in or an approval of the prosecution energetically of the war for a restoration of the Union, or the giving every constitutional aid compatible for that object, render it incumbent upon us to adhere under all circumstances to such an Administration as we now have? Such has not been the practice heretofore, and I trust it will never be so long as a vestige of the rights of free discussion and freedom of opinion remains. A blind adhesion to such doctrines would be but the forerunner of a blotting out of those great principles we have been taught to venerate.

At the commencement of hostilities it was distinctly avowed that the war was not upon the local institutions of any portion of the country, but to retain the unity of the whole, and when that was accomplished strife would cease.

Mr. Lincoln gave repeated assurances of his intentions in his various public papers, and it will be well to refer to them. In his inaugural he said:

"Apprehension seems to exist among the people of the southern States that by the accession of a Republican Administration their property and their peace and personal security are to be endangered. There has never been any reasonable cause for such apprehension. Indeed, the most ample evidence to the contrary has all the while existed, and been open to their inspection. It is found in nearly all the public speeches of him who now addresses you. I do but quote from one of those speeches when I declare that 'I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so.' Those who nominated and elected me did so with full knowledge that I had made this and many similar declarations, and had never recanted them. And more than this: they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution which I now read:

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to the balance of power, on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend; and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

This was a voluntary pledge of the present Executive upon his induction to office. On the 4th of July following, in his message to Congress, he announced to the country that

"Let there be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the Government toward the southern States after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say it will be his purpose then as ever to be guided by the Constitution and the laws; and that he probably will have no different understanding of the powers and duties of the Federal Government relatively to the rights of the States and the people, under the Constitution, than that expressed in his inaugural address. He desires to preserve the Government, that it may be administered for all as it was administered by the men who made it. Loyal citizens everywhere have the right to claim this of their Government, and the Government has no right to withhold or neglect it. It is not perceived that in giving it there is any coercion, any conquest, or any subjugation in any just sense of those terms."

And again, in December, 1861, in his annual message he reiterated those sentiments as follows:

"The inaugural address at the beginning of this Administration, and the message to Congress at the late special session, were both mainly devoted to the domestic controversy, out of which the insurrection and consequent war have sprung. Nothing now occurs to add or subtract to or from the principles or general purposes stated and expressed in those documents."

In July, 1862, an almost unanimous Congress passed the Crittenden resolutions, which were approved by the President, again reiterating the like objects for the prosecution of the war; and I fearlessly assert that if no change in the programme had been made, the rebellion would ere this have ceased. What these changes have been is too fearfully evident. Fanatical radicalism has gained the ascendancy, and the war for the last eighteen months has been prosecuted, not for the restoration of the Union, but for the destruction of the South; and in the blow aimed at them we believe it is the intention that all the reserved rights of the States of the Union be obliterated, and a vast centralized Government formed.

If this war had simply been prosecuted only for a restoration of the Union a hundred thousand lives would have been saved, and $1,000,000,000 would be deducted from our national debt. I am not one of those who would stop to count the cost of preserving our Union in any war. Every man owes a debt to his country, and we should stand by that country under every circumstance, correcting what is amiss, but with a firm determination to preserve the nation at all hazards. And let the consequences be what they may, the property and lives of every individual should be freely granted to give success to the effort for that purpose.

Sir, I have been in favor of the adopting of such energetic measures in the prosecution of this war as would soonest terminate the unnatural conflict, restore harmony throughout the land, and save the nation from the incubus of an intolerable debt, and the awful destruction of its sons.

The question now arises whether wisdom and patriotism do not require an entire change of policy, and a return to the original avowed object; to abandon all plans of reconstruction which only tend to intensify hate and put further off the day of peace. I am aware to the enthusiastic there is sweet music in the catch-words hourly used on this floor, of the "life of the nation" and the "removing all causes of the war," but, sir, they are not employed with any intention of settling our difficulties, but to prevent all settlement prior to utter extermination. That it was intended that the amnesty proclamation of last December would hasten the end of this strife, I do not believe. We are told that nearly every southern paper published it, and it only nerved them to the performance of more earnest deeds.

I do not propose to examine in detail either the amnesty proclamation and the reconstruction plan therein set forth, nor the bill this House has under consideration. Both, I believe, are more intended to obtain votes from those reconstructed States to perpetuate the present party than for any purpose of restoring the States to the Union. I assume, too, if that policy is persisted in, this war has but commenced, and our people should resign themselves to the continued conflict until utter financial and physical exhaustion result.

It is well for us before we adopt any other schemes to examine our present condition, that we may better judge of the propriety of a measure that will crystallize the South into a determined opposition to any future union with us.

We have the authority of the President as late as July, 1861, for saying that "it might be questioned whether there is to-day a majority of the legally qualified voters of any State, except perhaps South Carolina, in favor of disunion," and in the same message he recommended Congress, that the war might be a short and decisive one, to place at his control for the work at least four hundred thousand men and four hundred million dollars. That number of men and this sum of money have been increased, the former over five-fold and the latter nearly tenfold, and to-day, by the vacillation, the waywardness, the insane interference, the blunderings, and the corruption of the Administration, final success and peace are not apparent.

I insist, sir, that the Administration have never appreciated the power of the enemy, but have had a too overweening confidence in itself, and that it has adopted ultra paper fulminations when it ought to have relied upon the stern realities of war, with the sword in one hand to subdue the armed forces of the South, and the olive-branch in the other, to welcome any recusant and repentant State that was ready to return to its allegiance and submit to the requirements of the Constitution. By the census of 1860 there were in those States now in rebellion about three million white males, and in the free States about nine million. There were also nearly two million male slaves in the South, which for most practical purposes were as available and efficient as the whites. Then the proportion of numbers was, as near as may be, two to one. The people of the South were upon their own soil, acclimated, and they had been educated to believe their rights were invaded and that this war was one of invasion and extermination. It requires but a little imagination to judge where the odds would be when these millions of people were engaged in a war on their own soil, nerved to the belief that their property, their lives, and their children, their household gods, and their altars depended upon their success. True, they were laboring under a hallucination, but Mr. Lincoln and his advisers are responsible for changing the original object of the war, and aiding the rebel leaders in educating a now almost unanimous South in this delusion.

I have fondly cherished the hope that our armies might speedily be successful. To attain success I would have put forth every effort and submitted to any sacrifice; but, sir, with the policy of the President and Congress before me to be persisted in, that day is in the far distant future. We have little means of knowing the casualties of war in the South, but it is probably no greater proportionally than ours, and by the natural increase of population and the greater facility for moving their forces, they can continue them in the future numerically as available as in the past. We know the expense of our own transportation and the necessity of having large armies inert to guard the various posts and fortifications. We have learned the power of endurance of the southern people, and these various facts ought to afford sufficient inducement for us to adopt wise and humane measures to recall them to their allegiance.

It is estimated that over a quarter of a million northern lives have been lost by reason of this war. Their blood has fertilized many a hard-fought battle-field, and their bones lie bleaching in every rebel State. Not a northern household but that mourns some near and dear friend who has thus been sacrificed upon the altar of his country. The habiliments of mourning meet us at every step, and we are momentarily admonished of the grief of the mothers, wives, and friends, weeping and wailing for those who will return no more. One fifth of the male population has gone forth, thus making any future calls fall with redoubled effect upon those remaining. Last year hundreds of fields were uncultivated for the want of laborers, and this year thousands of acres of our rich lands will go unplowed and no crops be produced, because the calls to arms have taken away the young.

But, sir, the extravagant action of the past has entailed upon us a fearful national debt. It has been our pride that this bane of the Old World has found no lodgment in America. How we have exulted in the proud satisfaction that while England has a debt of $4,000,000,000 we were free from the incubus! This was three years ago. How stands the record now? You will pardon me if I go somewhat into detail in this matter, because it is one that concerns every property-holder or tax-payer, and every patriot in the country, and appeals to us to pause before we devise any means so odious as this pretended reconstruction, that will assuredly force us to double if not quadruple our present gigantic debt. Let us view its progress. By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, page 47, it will be seen that on March 4, 1861, our total outstanding indebtedness was $68,482,686 19. By referring to the same page it was stated on the 30th of September, 1863, $1,222,113,559 86. The estimate of the Secretary (page 8) fixes the public debt July 1, 1864, at $1,656,956,641 44. This is only for forty months since the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln, and shows an increase of debt over and above all the enormous taxes levied in every conceivable way of over forty-one million dollars per month.

But this does not cover all the indebtedness. Already has Congress had two deficiency bills of about one hundred and ten million dollars to act upon, neither of which are considered in the report. This was for only a few items connected with the War Department, but it was so much increase of our debt. Time will not permit me to enter into any minute specification. The unsettled items, if all provided for, would make the debt on the 30th of July next over three billion dollars. If we could stop here, we might still have hope. But there are claims springing up in every direction for damage done by our forces to the property of loyal men, and in numerous instances for the absolute destruction of such property to prevent its falling into the hands of the rebels. The principle that in all such cases the loss must be borne by Government is too well settled to be now discussed; and though we may put off the evil day, and refuse now to pay or liquidate this class of claims, that pay day must come.

From the Potomac around to the Mississippi, through Arizona, and in fact from nearly every quarter where our armies have been, these claims must arise. One recently came before the Court of Claims from the far-off Territory of Arizona, and Judge Wilmot delivered the able opinion of the court, fixing the claimant's damage, in that single case, at $41,530, and held the United States liable. He said:

"We hold in this case that the property was destroyed by the rightful order of the commanding officer, and upon an urgent and pressing necessity, and to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy, and those hostile to the United States; that it was a taking for public use, and that the Government is bound under the Constitution to make just compensation to the owner."

Judge Wilmot cannot be accused of having any prejudices adverse to the Administration, and this opinion of his will warm into life a startling array of like claims that will be presented for adjustment. Their names will be legion, and must amount to untold millions.

But, sir, the official document shows that for the first forty months of this Administration the expenditures exceeded all its receipts, except from loans, at the rate of over forty-one million dollars per month. I believe the real facts are that they exceeded over seventy millions per month.

For the next fiscal year we have the estimate of expenditures, nearly $752,000,000, and the total receipts to be only $207,000,000, leaving an estimated increase of debt of $544,978,548 93.

I know, sir, that this is a dull subject, but it is an exciting one when the pay day comes; and, as this enormous sum of money must be paid, it is a duty incumbent upon us to examine it in all its aspects. We are making a fearful legacy for posterity; but we ought not to shrink from a full gaze at our terrible folly or criminal extravagance. I will not now inquire where this money has gone, or how it has been spent. The reports of your numerous investigating committees in the last Congress showed that corruption was rampant in every direction. It is useless to particularize. We have not learned from experience; and the result of our three years' experiment of Republicanism will be a mortgage upon our national domain, upon the firesides, the earnings, ay, the heart's blood of our sturdy yeomanry, when all outstanding claims are liquidated, of over three thousand million dollars. We cannot escape it; but, sir, by proper economy, a proper management of our military forces, an honest desire to end this war, with our Constitution and the rights of the States and the people intact, over one half of that vast outlay might have been saved, our Union restored, and peace brought once more to our distracted country.

Radicalism must have its way. "Delenda est Carthago" has been the war-cry from that side of the House, and their leaders have feared that the war would end before they had satisfied their vengeance upon the South. To create delusive hopes throughout the States in rebellion, they have proclaimed that the conservatives in the North sympathized with the South, thus, by a refined species of political dissembling, endeavoring to incite a disturbance here, while encouraging the enemy with these false statements to persist in their contest, and thus enable the rebel leaders to force the people to become a unit in deadly opposition to our Government.

But, sir, we have the enormous national debt upon our hands, and it must be paid. We have been accustomed to boast of our prosperity and to refer to the tables produced from our decennial census returns as an evidence of this fact. I wish to educe a few lessons from the same source. In my calculations I shall assume our national debt to be on June 30, 1864, only $2,000,000,000, which I believe, with all due deference, is not two thirds the actual sum. In the preliminary report of the eighth census, page 195, the total true value of all the real and personal estate of the entire country is put at $16,159,616,068. In this sum is included the value of nearly four million slaves, as estimated prior to the war. Putting these at the very low estimate of $400 each, $1,600,000,000 is to be deducted. If this approximates correctness, and it was as near as could be attained, our national debt at this low estimate would now equal one seventh of all the real and personal property in the States and Territories in our Union in 1860.

The Secretary estimates the increase of the debt for the current year at over $588,000,000, nearly $50,000,000 per month; and for the ensuing year at the sum of $544,978,548 93, giving, according to his estimate in the official report, a liquidated debt in July, 1865, of $2,232,000,000. Taking these figures, if we should then be so fortunate as to have a restored Union, and this debt, no portion of which rests upon an estimated or problematic basis, but upon stern facts, and is now $1,000,000,000 less than the actual sum, be fairly apportioned pro rata according to the representation of all the States in this House, it would be over $9,250,000 for each congressional district in the Union "as it was." Nine and one quarter million dollars debt for each congressional district in the entire Union! The very idea is appalling. Is it possible by any imposition of taxes to make the hardy yeomanry of the West, who have felled the dense forests or reclaimed the rich prairies, take from their hard earnings sufficient to pay even the interest upon this enormous sum? Why, sir, at six per cent. the interest will be $550,000 annually for each congressional district, provided we can include the now rebellious States and all the Territories. But instead of having two hundred and forty-one congressional districts repre-

the world was money squandered as it has been by

THIRTY EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, MAY 2, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 125.

Yet, sir, with our armies occupying only the outskirts of the rebellious States, a million men standing in hostile array, our very authority scouted within cannon-shot of this Capitol, and no indication that a single rebellious State wishes to return, we are endeavoring to reconstruct and form anew governments for those States. It is well known that the people of the South pride themselves more upon their State rights principles than the people of any other section of the Union. We have caused the entire mass of the South to believe that we are warring upon their institutions, and this opinion they have formed mostly from our acts. Let us pass this bill, and the proof to them and to the world is positive, and we shall nerve our enemies to desperation, and God only knows how the conflict will end. We have no means to squander in Utopian schemes. We have been endeavoring by our action this winter to make our country a vast negro poor-house and a negro primary school, and now, with the result of the President's political campaign in Florida, and the disgraceful butchery at Olustee before us, we ought to pause and cast aside experiments and devote ourselves to the stern realities of the war and the salvation of our country. When the rebellion is subdued it will then be time for political quacks to administer their nostrums.

In this connection, to prove that patriotism is not the inspiring motive of this proposed reconstruction, I have a few facts to relate of an incident in Michigan. On the 3d of November last an election was to be held for city officers in Detroit; and as that city furnishes two Republican Senators in the other branch of this body it was necessary for that party to carry the election. At the time companies of the provost guard were stationed in Detroit. These were soldiers of the volunteer force in the service of the United States drawn from all parts of the country.

To aid in the project, and give a quasi-legal character to the proceedings, and it may be to initiate a system and furnish a plan for like voting in the reconstructed States, the following was procured:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
DETROIT, MICHIGAN, October 23, 1863.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your request for my opinion as to the question whether the soldiers now in the barracks in your ward are entitled to have their names registered and to vote there. The military post is the home of the soldier; the law compels him to abide there, no matter where his wife and children dwell, or where he exercises his calling in time of peace. A soldier, in contemplation of law, is without family or calling outside of camp. He cannot go where his family is, and would be disfranchised were it not that his residence is held to be where the military order fixes it. In my opinion the married as well as the single soldier is entitled to be registered and to vote. The provision of the constitution of Michigan, article seven, section five, refers, I think, to the service of the United States in the regular and not in the volunteer army. It is to be interpreted with reference to the state of things existing in 1850, when the constitution was formed and when the existence of a volunteer army, such as there is now in the country, was not anticipated.

As to the other question, volume twelve United States Statutes, page 597, provides that any alien of the age of twenty-one years, who has enlisted in the United States Army, and has been honorably discharged, may be admitted a citizen without any previous declaration of intention. I think that the requirement of article seven of the constitution of Michigan as to declaration of intention is satisfied by proof of a compliance with United States statute referred to, that is to say, that the fact of enlistment and discharge is equivalent to the ordinary declaration of intention.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALFRED RUSSELL,
United States District Attorney.

The intention of the persons interested in this communication is too apparent. It will be noticed that it bears date October 23, 1863. November 2 and 3 the following orders were issued:

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES MILITARY COMMANDER,
DETROIT, November 2, 1863.

Lieutenant JOHN VAN STAN, Detroit Barracks:

Your friends in town expect activity from you to-morrow. Senator Howard spoke to me about you. Soldiers can be allowed to visit the nearest polls in small squads to cast their votes, and return immediately, in order that others may go.

Truly yours,

J. R. SMITH,
Lieutenant Colonel.

DETROIT BARRACKS, November 3, 1863.

Sir: This being the day of the annual election in this State, in obedience to orders issued by Lieutenant Colonel J. R. Smith, military commander, you will detail good, efficient non-commissioned officers to take charge of detachments of such members of the provost guard as are voters, to escort them to the polls of the several wards of which they may be voters, that they may have the privilege of exercising the rights belonging to every American citizen, and, when they shall have so cast their votes, return them to camp; and here allow me to suggest that, while your commander would not attempt to dictate the manner in which the members of the provost guard shall vote, I may, perhaps, say that it is very desirable, in fact, our duty, to sustain the Administration both by word and deed.

E. D. ROBINSON,
Captain Commanding Michigan Provost Guard.
Lieutenant JOHN T. VAN STAN, Michigan Provost Guard.

Officers of the day will pass Lieutenant Van Stan, with such members of the provost guard as he may designate, during the day, until six o'clock this p. m.

E. D. ROBINSON,
Captain Commanding Michigan Provost Guard.

These orders, and the opinion, form a curious commentary upon the purity of elections, and give us an impressive lesson of what we may expect where the civil and military authorities combine to overthrow the voice of the people. The district attorney of Michigan is not a law officer of the State, nor is he the official adviser of the board of registration or election. There are officers designated by the State laws upon whom is devolved this duty to advise, yet we find a letter directed to a board in the tenth ward of Detroit advising a nullifying the laws of the State. Then we have the military commandant issuing his order requiring "activity," and announcing that Senator HOWARD "spoke to me about you." This was followed by an order from a subordinate requiring the soldiers to be "escorted" to the polls in "squads" under charge of three officers, and, "after voting, to be returned to camp!" And to cap the climax of this attempt to trample upon the rights of the freedmen of Detroit, the soldiers are very gravely informed, "it is their duty to sustain the Administration, both by word and deed!"

Ordinary language is inadequate to properly comment upon these proceedings. I will not speculate upon the length of time necessary, if such a course be persisted in without opposition, for our liberties to be obliterated. The ballot-box becomes a stupendous farce, a free election a "presidential joke."

Let us apply this case to the bill under consideration. A registration of the votes is required, and if one tenth of those registered take the oath the election can be held. Now, suppose some facile district attorney should decide that the soldiers "not in the regular Army" who have been in a State for a given length of time were citizens, and could be registered, take the oath, and vote. There are thousands of our volunteer forces in many of the seceded States who have resided there over two years. Their "home" is the military post, and if any question arises as to the legality of their rights, this opportune decision from Michigan is in point, and the fact is accomplished.

I will dwell no longer upon this subject. The principles involved in the bill are of too serious a nature to permit it to pass with less than I have said. I am no friend of the rebellion or of the rebel States. I fervently desire to see our armies successful, the Union restored, and peace and harmony once more prevail. I do not belong to that class of individuals who believe that we can have peace without a decisive, overwhelming victory, nor do I suppose it can be obtained if the present policy of the Administration be persisted in. I am in favor of rendering every constitutional aid to sustain, encourage, and reinforce our gallant Army now marshaled under our flag, and I have voted for every measure having in view that object. I shall continue so to do. However much of vacillation or incompetency may curse and impede our progress toward victory, we should not abandon our brave soldiery nor despair of the Republic, nor forsake it in this its hour of direst need. The day of peace may be distant, but the nation's honor is with us; and whatever may be the character of the Administration, our solemn duty is to stand by the Government and protect and preserve it, that its administration may pass into the keeping of wiser, more patriotic and energetic counsels, with the Constitution in a condition to be restored to its original purity.

Mr. THAYER obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. CRAVENS, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at fifty minutes past nine o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 30, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer three different memorials from women of Dryden, New York, asking Congress at the earliest practicable day to pass an act emancipating all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor. I move that they be referred to the committee on slavery and freedmen.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of M. W. Galt & Brothers, and as I am told nearly all the persons who own or occupy stores and dwellings on Pennsylvania avenue and the streets adjacent thereto, constituting the principal business part of the city of Washington, who represent that very few appropriations have been made by the city councils for these localities, but that large amounts have been annually expended for the improvement of the suburbs of the city. They therefore pray Congress to pass a law requiring the paving, draining, cleaning, and watering of the avenue and the streets adjacent thereto under the control of a competent engineer, the expenses thereof to be defrayed by the property-holders. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Big Lawrence, Brown county, and a petition of citizens of Little Lawrence, Oconto county, Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a tri-weekly mail route from the northern terminus of the Northwestern railroad at Fort Howard, to Stiles, Oconto county, Wisconsin; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the city of Green Bay, Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a tri-weekly mail route from the Northwestern railroad at Green Bay, to Stiles, Oconto county, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 262) to provide for the greater efficiency of the civil service of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. As there is no committee of the body that might properly take the subject of this bill into consideration, I shall ask that it lie upon the table, and be printed. The object of the bill is to provide a competitive system of examination in the civil service of the United States.

The bill was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 48) concerning appointments in the military service; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to hear the resolution read at length.

The Secretary read it. It provides that no officer of the regular or volunteer forces, whose appointment is required by law to be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall have resigned his commission, and whose resignation shall have been accepted, shall be entitled to hold or exercise command in those forces until again appointed thereto by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but the President may fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

Mr. WILSON. I move the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF COLORED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, a copy of any opinion by the Attorney General on the rights of colored persons in the Army or volunteer service of the United States, together with the accompanying papers.

Mr. POWELL. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over.

ARMORED VESSELS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That three thousand extra copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, relating to armored vessels, be printed for the use of the Senate.

SAN RAMON LAND GRANT.

Mr. HARDING. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 371) for the relief of the settlers upon certain lands in California, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass. It is a short bill, and I will ask for its immediate consideration; I think it will excite no discussion whatever.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that any and all persons claiming, whether as preëmptors or settlers, or under any grant or title, any of the lands included within the exterior boundaries of a certain grant for the rancho San Ramon, situate in the county of Contra Costa, in California, made to Bartolo Pacheco and Mariana Castro by Don Jose Figueroa, Governor of Upper California, on or about the 10th of June, 1833, and which claim, or two leagues thereof, has been confirmed by the district court of the United States in separate moieties, one in the name of Horace W. Carpenter, and the other in the name of Rafael Soto de Pacheco and others, by a decree of the court made and entered on or about the 4th of June, 1862, shall have the right in all courts to contest the correctness of the location of the lands so confirmed, within those exterior boundaries, notwithstanding any official or approved survey thereof now made or hereafter to be made under the decrees of confirmation, and notwithstanding any stipulation or consent given by the district attorney of the United States authorizing such locations. In case it shall be found that the United States have title to any of the lands within those exterior boundaries, which have been settled upon and improved by any person, in good faith, under a bona fide claim of title, such occupant, and each settler upon the lands so situated, is to be entitled to enter and receive a patent for one hundred and sixty acres of land, including his improvements, upon payment, at the proper land office, of the Government price of $1 25 per acre, and proving that he was one of the actual and bona fide settlers on the lands and had made improvements thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON. This seems to be an effort to reverse a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HARDING. I do not so understand it. The two leagues were authorized by the district attorney to be taken or surveyed within the exterior boundaries of the grant which embraced some six leagues, and the survey is in this shape, [exhibiting a map to the Senate.] The survey has not been passed upon by the district court, but is on file in the clerk's office. I do not understand that it has been passed upon by the court.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill again.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Oregon will find on looking at the act passed in July, 1862, I think, that persons who have an interest in the location of grants which have been confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, or by the district court where there is no appeal, have a right to intervene on the question of location. The very object of the act of 1862 was to settle the correctness of the location as between all contesting claimants. Now for aught that I can know, or for aught that the Senator can know unless he has got a telegram to-day, the district judge below may have confirmed the survey.

The honorable member gives me a slip from a newspaper which I suppose has been some twenty or thirty days in getting here.

Mr. HARDING. Thirty.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has been thirty days in getting here, and in the mean time the survey may have been acted upon, and we should therefore be doing what I think, even if we have the power to do it, is quite bad in point of policy.

These Mexican grants in California are generally grants of lands within certain external boundaries. The rule which governs at common law, as the Senate is perfectly aware, is that the physical external boundaries govern the course of the distance and govern the location. If the grant, therefore, professes to be a grant included within certain external boundaries, although it is represented to contain only one league or two leagues, and in point of fact it includes twenty leagues, the grantee is entitled to the whole twenty; but the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Fossatt, decided, the question being directly presented there, that the true construction of a Mexican grant, which in that particular was to be governed by the Mexican law, was that the course and the distance of the outer boundary were not to be considered as paramount in controlling the construction of the grant or in ascertaining the quantity of the land granted, but that the party under a grant of that description was entitled only to hold the quantity of land called for in the grant, and that the only effect of calling for the exterior boundaries was that he was obliged to locate that quantity within those exterior boundaries.

In this case, as I understand it, there are two leagues to which the grantee is entitled under a grant by boundaries which may include some fifteen or twenty leagues, or whatever may be the quantity the boundaries will include. This grant is brought up here and is confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is a decision only affirming the validity of the grant. It does not give to the grantee any specific portion of the land included within the external boundaries. It is necessary under the act of 1851 and the act of 1862 that the decision should go back to the district court, and that the survey should be made there by the surveyor general.

As the law stood originally, before the act of 1862 was passed, there was no mode in which any person claiming an interest in having that survey correctly made could interfere at all. Justice, it may be supposed, was secure by the act of 1851, providing that the judgments in these cases should only be conclusive as against the United States and the claimant. But in order to settle the whole dispute in controversy, the act of 1862 was passed, and that act provides that any person who may have and can show to the court that he has an interest in the survey of the grant has a right to intervene and contest any survey that has been made, if he thinks that it operates prejudicially to his interest and satisfies the court he has an interest.

Now, for aught I know, the preëmptors, or those claiming to be preëmptors by virtue of actual possession in this case, may have gone before the court below and contested the correctness of this survey, and the survey may have been confirmed. If so, we are legislating away, if we pass this measure, what is now the title of the grantee without giving him an opportunity to be heard, and contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court, as that decision is carried out by the district court. If the decision of the district court has been already pronounced and is erroneous, and these adversary claimants have made themselves parties to the proceeding, as they were authorized to do, as I have just stated, under the act of 1862, they can bring it up to the Supreme Court and have the controversy decided there. That was done in the case of Fossatt at the last term. Fossatt claimed under a title, the validity of which was not disputed, to be entitled to what was called the New Almaden quicksilver mine. Whether he was or was not, depended on the manner in which his land was to be located. There was another grant issued to a man by the name of Berreyesa, and the holders under that grant insisted upon it that the true location of that grant, which was prior in point of time to Fossatt's, was to include the New Almaden mine; and if they had succeeded in that they would have been the owners of that mine. That question was tried here in the Supreme Court, and the court decided that the true construction of these two conflicting contentious grants, Berreyesa's being the elder and Fossatt's the younger, was to give to the junior tract the mine, because the true running of the elder tract did not include the mine; and that settled the dispute.

It would seem to me, and I submit it to the honorable member from Oregon, that what he is now about to do would be precisely what would be done if this was proposed: Fossatt has got the mine by a decision of the Supreme Court; there are a great many other persons who claim that the mine is really upon public land, and they may be in possession. Suppose they were to come in here and ask us to pass a law saying that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States giving the land to Fossatt should not be conclusive, but that they might prosecute their claims as against Fossatt. That would be in direct conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court, and unjust as it seems to me in point of fact; certainly it would be inexpedient in regard to policy.

I submit, therefore, to the honorable member that perhaps it would be better to let the bill lie on the table until we can ascertain more particularly what is to be the operation of it. These lands are very valuable, I suppose, though I know nothing about this tract, and never heard of it before; but these lands in California are valuable, and there has always been a contest between the grantee and what are called squatters. California was settled early by every variety of an enterprising population. There was nobody there hardly who could tell what lands were granted and what lands were not granted, or what were the bounds of the granted lands; and men would take possession of everything which in point of fact was not in the actual possession of somebody else. That has produced a conflict between what are called squatters and those who are called grantees, and it was with a view to settle all those disputes as rapidly as Congress supposed justice required they should be settled that the act of 1862 was passed.

Mr. HARDING. It appears to me that a statement of this case should satisfy the Senate of the propriety of passing this bill.

The claimants under this Mexican grant brought suit in the United States district court, or rather a suit was brought in the United States district court, the claimants being one party, and the United States, represented by the district attorney, another party. The claim was for two leagues. The two leagues had been marked and the boundaries affixed, as it was ascertained in the court, and the court made a decree granting to the claimants two leagues of land by the boundaries. From that decree the claimants appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. After the appeal was taken the district attorney of the United States, in consideration that the claimants would abandon their appeal, consented that the claimants might locate their two leagues of land anywhere within the exterior bounds, or the bounds which they originally claimed. In accordance with that stipulation the claimants went on and made their survey, something like eleven miles in length, I think, running around all the points of the hills and taking all the arable land that could be reached, by taking the two leagues and extending them out into all sorts of shapes and forms. It is if the marks on this paper [exhibiting a map] can be seen as represented there, perfectly spider-shaped.

The Senator from Maryland, as I think, applies his argument to cases between different Spanish claimants; and the act to which he refers relates to claimants under Spanish grants, and not to cases between claimants and settlers on the public lands under the laws of the United States. Am I correct?

Mr. JOHNSON. It includes everybody.

Mr. HARDING. The persons who desire to contest this grant are settlers on the land which they supposed to be Government or public land. They ask now the privilege of contesting the right of these Spanish claimants or Mexican grantees to that part without the two leagues. They are not claimants under a Mexican grant. They have no right to the land except as preëmptors. They cannot preëmpt until the land is surveyed and brought into market; and the land cannot be surveyed and brought into market, as I understand it, until this Mexican grant is disposed of. Therefore it is necessary to pass this bill to give them the right to preëmpt and settle the boundaries of this claim. That is the whole matter, as I understand it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know whether that Mexican grant has been confirmed.

Mr. HARDING. The survey has been filed in the district court, and the district court at the last dates had not confirmed the survey.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is still an open question, then.

Mr. CONNESS. I will begin by responding to the remark of the Senator from Maine. I heard him say that it was still an open question. It is not an open question in this, that the United States district attorney has stipulated that part of the case valuable to these settlers away, and which comprehends their rights. This is simply a case involving the question of whether certain settlers upon the land in question may go into court and reopen what was stipulated away against them by the United States district attorney.

Let me present the case so that I think I can make it understood. This land claim is located in what is known as Contra Costa county in California; it is a hilly or mountainous district lying east of the city of San Francisco and across that bay. The larger portion of the country is mountainous and hilly land, the smaller portion of it valley land. In many instances the valley land is found in very small nooks made by the ravines that run down from the mountains at their termination. The grantees in this case were determined by the United States courts to be entitled to two leagues of land. The next question involved was where those two leagues of land should be located. As stated by the Senator from Oregon while an appeal was pending to the Supreme Court of the United States, involving a question of title, the grantees entered into an agreement with the district attorney who was prosecuting the case on the part of the United States, that if they would withdraw their appeal he would agree on the part of the United States that the grantees might locate their two leagues of land wherever they saw fit. The result has been that they have located their two leagues of land in a form that is not only inconsistent with all ideas of public surveys, but they have drawn their net about the settlement of every man living within miles of where their land should be located. Wherever they found a valuable settlement, an improved piece of property, there they ran their survey out and took it in, and I have before me here the tracings of a map which requires only to be looked at to establish its fraudulent character. It is an outrage upon those men so gross that it bears the stamp and impress of fraud upon its face. These men, upon whose efforts the prosperity of our country rests, are to be despoiled and deprived of their valuable holdings and homes by the stipulation and agreement of the United States district attorney, not now in office, made without their consent, without their being parties to it, and every valuable acre of land in the vicinity is to be taken up by these parties, and the valueless hills and mountains left to the Government.

The idea connected with all these questions of the location of land within the exterior boundaries alluded to, is that when the land is located it shall be located within a compact body; that the parties shall take it for better or for worse; that they shall take a part of the mountains and a part of the valleys; that they shall not run it into angles wherever they find a man's holding or his settlement improved by his labor, which they have done in this case.

The bill before us is not a general act; it is a special act applicable to a special case where a gross and outrageous wrong has been perpetrated. The general principles involved in the question of the location of lands within the exterior boundaries of these Spanish grants will be properly in discussion when the bill that I introduced in this body, and which now is upon our table, shall be taken up, which I will move very shortly. But this bill involves the simple question whether these people shall be allowed to go into court, notwithstanding the stipulation made by the district attorney against them; by which they are despoiled of their homes, and reopen the case and get an honest and fair adjudication of it. I will not continue to waste the morning hour further upon this question, but hope the Senate will pass the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I stated just now I have not the slightest knowledge of this particular case, but reading the paper which the honorable member from Oregon gave me I am satisfied that the policy of a measure like this bill is very objectionable. This I suppose is from a California paper.

Mr. HARDING. The Alta.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Alta. It is headed "The Slander Refuted."

"THE SLANDER REFUTED.—This is the dignified heading of a communication in yesterday's Alta in defense of Judge Hoffman, signed by J. B. Crockett. After quoting our strictures on the outrageous survey of the San Ramon grant, now on file in the United States district court, he proceeds to refute what he is pleased to term a 'slander,' but in reality succeeded in making a stronger case against Judge Hoffman than we did ourselves. He says:

"A stipulation was entered into between the United States district attorney and the claimant, Carpenter, by which the latter abandoned his appeal from the decree limiting the quantity to two leagues, in consideration of which the district attorney, on behalf of the United States, consented that Carpenter might select and locate the two leagues anywhere within the exterior limits of the general tract. A decree was entered, founded on this stipulation."

Now, the Senate will see that so far the United States, as represented by the district attorney, and the claimant are dealing with the public lands of the United States, or rather with lands which would be the lands of the United States but for this grant. It can operate only, therefore, if permitted to operate at all, upon such lands as belong to the United States. That is all. Now, it seems from what I have read that the decision of the district court limited the quantity that the claimant insisted upon it that he was entitled to under the circumstances of that case, he claiming a larger quantity than the quantity stipulated for in the grant.

Mr. CONNESS. I never knew one of these claimants that did not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well, then, there are two parties. The claimant says in this case, (I assume that now by way of illustration,) "I am entitled under my grant to four leagues;" the district attorney says, "You are entitled to but two;" the district judge decides that he is entitled to but two; but he takes an appeal from that decision to the Supreme Court of the United States. How that appeal would result nobody could tell. It might have been successfully prosecuted, and the United States would have lost four leagues of the lands that they claimed. In that state of the controversy the district attorney, in behalf of the United States, says to the claimant, "Abandon your appeal, admit that you are entitled only to two leagues, and you may locate your two leagues upon any part of the lands within the outer limits of the grant that belong to the United States." That is all. "Go anywhere within these exterior limits." In one sense he had a right to go anywhere within the exterior limits.

The honorable member from California says that where the quantity called for is less than the quantity included in the exterior limits, the quantity called for must be located together in a body. I do not know any law that requires it to be located in a body. The practice may be to give such a location as will make the two leagues one body of land. I do not understand that this survey—I have not looked at the survey—does not give to the grantee two leagues in one body. It may not be in the body that the honorable Senator thinks would be right; but it is in the body. It is not in one form, it is in another form; but there is no intervening land between the land laid out to the claimant by the survey under the stipulation and the land belonging to the United States or belonging to any other claimant.

In the first place, then, this would seem to have been a valid agreement as between the United States and the claimant. But how does it stand? This paper goes on to say, after denouncing Judge Hoffman for having sanctioned that stipulation:

"We ask what right has Judge Hoffman to countenance, by his decree, stipulations that would warrant so outrageous a survey? On what ground of right or justice could he have traded off the homes of settlers who were never before included in the grant in consideration of the pretended concessions of Carpenter? We are told that Judge Hoffman has not yet passed upon this survey; indeed, Mr. Crockett avers that it has in no manner been brought to his attention hitherto. It is true that he has not as yet passed on the survey; but that it has been before him Mr. Crockett himself must be aware; for some time in January he himself appeared before the court on behalf of the conflicting Romero grant, and objected to the survey. But the main point of objection to Judge Hoffman's action in the matter is, that he should by solemn decree have justified and indorsed the stipulations on which this survey is based; that instead of requiring Carpenter to take his land in a compact mass, he should have authorized him to run the most unnatural lines over a vast extent of country in order to gobble up the farms of men who were never before presumed to be on the San Ramon grant."

The case then is this: the survey is before the district court unacted on. Have not these parties a remedy if they think proper to avail themselves of it? Let us see what are the provisions of the act of 1862, to which I adverted just now. After saying in what manner the surveys were to be made, it provides:

"Provided, however, That all parties claiming interest under preemption, settlement, or other right or title derived from the United States, shall not be permitted to intervene severally, but the rights and interests of said parties shall be represented by the district attorney of the United States, intervening in the name of the United States, aided by counsel acting for said parties jointly, if they think proper to employ such counsel."

So that every man, whether he claims a right or an interest under a preemption title, under a settlement without any preemption title, or by any "other right or title" in the language of the act, is at liberty to go before the court and contest the survey.

Mr. HARDING. I do not understand it so. "Shall not be permitted to intervene" is the language.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member has read it hastily. That is not my case, for I have had occasion to read it very often. In the case of persons claiming under the United States, they are not permitted to intervene separately, but they may intervene collectively, and they are at liberty to employ counsel, and it is the business of the district attorney of the United States to represent them, too, it being the purpose of the Government, of course, to see that justice is done between conflicting claimants.

Mr. CONNESS. These settlers are not conflicting claimants in any sense.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why not? If they are not, it is because they have no rights.

Mr. COWAN. They are no claimants. They only propose to come in in case the United States shall be found to have title.

Mr. JOHNSON. They may come in in behalf of the United States. This bill goes far beyond the act of 1862. The second section of this bill provides:

That in case it shall be found that the United States have title to any of said lands within said exterior boundaries, which have been settled upon and improved by any person, in good faith, under a bona fide claim of title, such occupant, and each settler upon said lands so situated, shall be entitled to enter and receive a patent for one hundred and sixty acres of land, including his improvements, upon payment, at the proper land office, of the Government price of $1 25 per acre, and proving that he was one of the actual and bona fide settlers on said lands and had made improvements thereon before the passage of this act.

This assumes that the lands to be operated upon by the second section of this bill are public lands, and not the lands of the individual claimant; and the question is now a question between the United States and the particular claimant under this Mexican title, what portion of the lands within the exterior boundaries is the claimant under the Mexican title entitled to. That depends upon the true location of the Mexican title. If it is not truly located by the district judge, let them go before the district judge and prove it. If the district judge decides against these settlers let them prosecute on appeal. That act gives an appeal. But how can you know, how do we know but that is a correct location? How do we know that the district attorney who represented the United States had not a right to enter into that stipulation on behalf of the United States? That is a question to be decided upon judicially. If he had the right, then the grantee is entitled to all the lands included within the survey made according to that stipulation. But you are now about to legislate wholly regardless of the fact whether the district attorney had the right or not, and wholly regardless also of the fact whether independent of such stipulation that survey would have been a correct survey.

As I have before stated, I have not the slightest knowledge of the particular claim or the claimant, but it seems to me that this bill is in effect a direct interference with the judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDING. Let us have a vote.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well.

Mr. COWAN. I think there is some misapprehension, perhaps, about the facts here, as there is no report accompanying this bill, and I should be somewhat sorry to see it pass exactly in this form. As I understand the circumstances, the claimants named here sought to recover eight leagues of land, and obtained a judgment therefor, from which the United States appealed; and then a compromise was effected between the district attorney of the United States and the claimants, by which the claimants agreed to take two leagues.

Mr. HARDING. The claimant appealed, not the United States.

Mr. COWAN. That is not the information I have. I am instructed to say that the United States appealed, and that is the difficulty—

Mr. JOHNSON. I will state to the honorable member, with his permission, that, as I collect from these papers, the first controversy between the United States and the claimant was whether the claimant had any title at all, whether his grant was a good one. The United States appealed from the decision that it was a good title, and the Supreme Court sustained the title, decided that the grant was valid. They sent it down to the district court, and the stipulation was then entered into in consequence of the district judge having decided that he was entitled to only two leagues. From that decision the claimant appealed; and in order to induce him to abandon his appeal, the district attorney said, in behalf of the United States, "If you will agree to take only two leagues, and abandon your appeal, you may locate your two leagues on any of the public lands within the outer boundaries."

Mr. COWAN. That is the way I understood the Senator to make the statement before; and I am instructed by a party who claims to have some interest here to say that the case is different. If this compromise was made on behalf of the United States by the proper officer, and made without any fraud, I should think it ought to be respected; and it would be mischievous to allow these people who have no claim, who only pretend to have a claim in behalf of the United States, to go into court and involve the real owners in additional litigation. As I understand, there is no law to be repealed by this bill, which is said to be mischievous in its operation, or which has operated to prevent these men from enjoying any rights that they have ever heretofore had; but it is simply to allow them to get behind a decree of the court, and compel the owners to try the case over again. If that be the case, and that is the way it looks to me at the present time, I shall be obliged to vote against this proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. I will only occupy a few moments of time—

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish the Senator would meet this point: why it is that these people cannot come in under the act of 1862.

Mr. CONNESS. Because they have no rights.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly.

Mr. CONNESS. Exactly. The Senator laughs. I wish, without wishing the Senator any harm, that he had had some of the experience of these parties.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the member allude to me as laughing?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was not laughing at the Senator.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not understand the Senator as laughing at me.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was laughing at something else.

Mr. CONNESS. All right; there is no harm done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must at this time call up the special order of the day.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will be informally laid aside.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am satisfied that it will be almost impossible to get a vote now without considerable discussion. Some Senators want to look into this matter, and I think it had better lie over. I have no objection to the bill myself, but I prefer now going on with the special order.

Mr. CONNESS. These bills in relation to our country lie over week after week, and the session is drawing to a close. I think I can appeal to the Senator from Ohio and say to him that I show no disposition in this body to shirk the consideration of public questions, questions of great public interest, and we rarely occupy much of the time of this body. We are now on this subject; I think we can get a vote on it in a very few minutes. It is a very clear case. I was simply about to address myself to the point that the stipulation entered into by the district attorney in this case—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to interrupt the Senator from California unless a motion be made to lay aside the special order.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the special order lie over until a vote be taken on this subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator desires it, I have no objection that the special order shall lie over informally in order to test the point whether this bill will take much time.

Mr. CONNESS. I am willing to waive discussion and let the vote be taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then let the special order be laid aside without any formal vote, by unanimous consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest, though I do not wish to interfere in this matter, that it may be as well to let this bill be disposed of. I am rather unwell to-day, and I do not think from the indications we can make much progress with the special order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to pass over the special order informally for a few minutes to see whether the Senator from California can get through with the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I am willing to have a vote taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to laying aside the special order to dispose of this bill? The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is still before the Senate, and the Senator from California is entitled to the floor upon it.

Mr. CONNESS. I am willing to waive all further discussion, and let the vote be taken.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading. It was read the third time; and Mr. HARDING called for the yeas and nays on its passage, and they were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the roll is called I wish to say that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. TEN Eyck] has been called home to New Jersey in consequence of the sickness of one of the members of his family, his daughter, and he requested me to State the fact as explaining his absence from the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cardie, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Cowan, Hendricks, and Johnson—4.

So the bill was passed.

LAND GRANT TO A MINNESOTA RAILROAD.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands, and to have it considered at this time. The House of Representatives made several amendments to Senate bill No. 31, making a grant of land to the Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Company, in the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior. Those amendments were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and the committee now recommend that the Senate concur in the House amendments with amendments; and as I suppose there will be no dispute about it, I ask that the report be acted on now.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 31, with amendments proposed by the House of Representatives, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report the same, with the following recommendation:

1. That the Senate concur in the first amendment with an amendment, so as to read, "Strike out after the word 'the,' in line three, all to the word 'so,' in line twenty-four, and insert in lieu thereof the words 'State of Minnesota for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad in said State from the city of St. Paul to the head of Lake Superior,' every alternate section of public land of the United States, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of the said railroad, on the line thereof, within the State of Minnesota; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold, appropriated, reserved, or otherwise disposed of any sections, or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to select from the lands of the United States nearest to the lines of sections above specified in alternate sections or parts thereof."

2. That the Senate concur in amendments two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, and twelve.

3. That the Senate concur in the thirteenth amendment with an amendment, so as to read "Strike out the word 'ten' and insert the word 'eight' in lieu thereof."

4. That the Senate concur in the fourteenth amendment.

5. That the Senate concur in the fifteenth amendment with an amendment, so as to read:

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any railroad which may hereafter be constructed from any point on the bay of Superior, in the State of Wisconsin, shall be permitted to connect with the said railroad, for the construction of which the said lands are hereby granted, at any point which may be selected by the president and directors of said railroad company so permitted to connect their said road, and the said railroad company so permitted to connect shall have the right and privilege to transport or have transported over the track of said railroad for the construction of which the said lands are hereby granted, all or any of its cars, passengers, or freights, and the said railroad company controlling the said road for the construction of which the said lands are hereby granted shall have the same right and privilege to transport or have transported all or any of its cars, freights, or passengers over the track of the said railroad of the company so permitted to connect, and said transportation shall be paid by the railroad company using to the railroad company according the same at the usual rates or charges which may be imposed by the said company upon all other cars, freights, or passengers.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear some explanation of those amendments from the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senator from Michigan will not object.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to know what we are voting upon.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senate bill made a grant of lands to a railroad company organized by the Legislature of Minnesota. The House of Representatives struck out the name of the company and inserted the name of the State, so that the grant will go to the State of Minnesota and not to the company. There is another amendment which is incomplete, probably owing to an inadvertence in the other House. I refer to the provision requiring the land outside of the ten miles granted to make up deficiencies within the ten miles, to be taken in alternate sections. By some oversight in drawing the amendment in the House of Representatives, the provision as to alternate sections was omitted, so that the grant would be a solid grant outside of the ten miles, unless the amendment that the committee now propose to the House amendment be adopted.

The eighth section, which the House of Representatives proposes as the last amendment, contemplates that the grant shall be made to the company; but if the Senate shall adopt the first amendment of that House, changing the grant from the company to the State, then of course there should be a change in the eighth section to make it correspond with the body of the bill.

I think I have now stated the substance of the amendments proposed by the Senate committee to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the whole report together, unless some Senator desires a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the present bill as reported by the Committee on Public Lands allows the State of Minnesota to dispose of these lands to any other company except the one which is mentioned in the Senate bill.

Mr. HARLAN. If the amendment shall be concurred in by the Senate the grant will be to the State of Minnesota, and will be under the control of the Legislature of Minnesota.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is satisfactory to us.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

The report was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will now be taken up.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will so far indulge us as to allow the formal amendments of the Committee on Finance to the bank bill to be acted on, and then I shall ask nothing further to-day on that subject. I do not think it will take more than a few minutes to go through with those amendments.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is very important for the interests of my State that we should have an executive session of about five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can have it after a while.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If the Senator from Ohio desires to press his bill, I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to have action on the amendment I offered last night to the bank bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CHANDLER to the amendment of the Committee on Finance to the forty-first section. The committee's amendment was to strike out the following clause in the forty-first section of the bill:

And nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the taxation by States of the capital stock of banks organized under this act, the same as the property of other moneyed corporations, for State or municipal purposes; but no State shall impose any tax upon such associations, or their capital, circulation, dividends, or business, at a higher rate of taxation than shall be imposed by such State upon the same amount of moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State: Provided, That no State tax shall be imposed on any part of the capital stock of such association invested in the bonds of the United States deposited as security for its circulation.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And in lieu of all other taxes, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and in case of default in the payment thereof by any associations, the duties aforesaid may be collected in the manner provided for the collection of United States duties of other corporations, or the Treasurer may reserve the amount of said duties out of the interest as it may become due on the bonds deposited with him by such defaulting association. And it shall be the duty of each association within ten days from the 1st days of January and July of each year, to make a return under the oath of its president or cashier to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its notes in circulation, and of the average amount of its deposits, and of the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds for the six months next preceding said 1st days of January and July as aforesaid; and in default of such return, and for each default thereof, each defaulting association shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $25, to be collected either out of the interest as it may become due on such association on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, or, at his option, in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the law of the United States; and in case of such default the amount of the duties to be paid by such association shall be assessed upon the amount of notes delivered to such association by the Comptroller of the Currency, and upon the higher amount of its deposits and capital stock, to be ascertained in such other manner as the Treasurer may deem best: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the market value of the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate, from being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of all taxes imposed by or under State authority for State, county, or municipal purposes, but not at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State. And all the remedies provided by State laws for the collection of such taxes shall be applicable thereto: Provided, Also, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed.

The amendment of Mr. CHANDLER was after the word "best" and before the proviso to insert:

Provided, That all taxes, State, county, and municipal, shall not exceed the amount of taxes assessed by the State upon its local banks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that his amendment does not come in at the proper place, because as he has it the exception would come before the subject-matter to which it is a limitation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, then, let it be put at the end of the proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would come in better at the end of the section.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, let it be put there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is covered now, however, by a previous provision that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than the taxation on moneys in the hands of individual citizens; but I see the object is to prevent a State making a different rule to favor its local banks.

Mr. CHANDLER. Precisely; that is the object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I prefer that the Senator should withhold that until we come into the Senate. I should like to look further into it.

Mr. CHANDLER. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Finance I withdraw the amendment now, but I shall renew it when the bill comes into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan being withdrawn, the question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section forty-four, which provides for the transfer of State banks to the national system, to strike out in lines thirty-four, thirty-five, and thirty-six the words "$100,000 nor less than $200,000 if in a city of more than fifty thousand inhabitants;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That no such association shall have a less capital than the amount prescribed for banking associations under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "currency," in line eighteen of section forty-six, to insert the words "retaining a copy thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nineteen of section forty-six, to strike out "and," after "default;" and in line twenty, before the word "notice," to strike out "his," and after "notice" to insert "by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the word "equal," before "amount," in line twenty-four of section forty-seven.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifty-three, line eight, after the words "United States" to insert the words "in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency;" so that it will read:

That if the directors of any association shall knowingly violate, or knowingly permit any of the officers, agents, or servants of the association to violate any of the provisions of this act, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the association derived from this act shall be thereby forfeited. Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency, before the association shall be declared dissolved.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should suppose it was doubtful whether under the amendment proposed by the committee it would not be necessary to bring the suit in the name of the United States. That, I understand, is not the purpose. I propose, therefore, to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "Comptroller of the Currency" the words "in his proper name."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that would be the effect of the committee's amendment. He would have to bring it in his name with the description of his office.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the amendment of the committee as amended by inserting after the word "name" the words "or by some other person."

Mr. SHERMAN. What is that for?

Mr. HENDERSON. The object of my amendment is to permit any other person to go into court and allege that the bank has violated its charter, and ask that the charter be forfeited. The Comptroller of the Currency may not be so well advised on that subject as individuals.

Mr. SHERMAN. That certainly would be very hard indeed. By this section, wherever any bank has violated the provisions of the act, it is made the official duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to commence the suit. I do not think the Government should subject the bank to the suit of every individual.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee as amended, after the word "name" to insert "or by some other person."

Mr. HENDERSON. In lieu of those words I will move to insert the words "or by some other person having an interest."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so modified.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will read this section in connection with the preceding sections I do not think he will insist upon his amendment. It is made the duty of the Comptroller very peremptorily, under a severe penalty, for any violation of this act, to close these banks; but it was felt to be unjust to allow this authority to close the banks unless in pursuance of judicial proceedings; and therefore the duty is imposed on the Comptroller of the Currency to commence proceedings in order to ascertain and place beyond doubt the commission of the act of violation or bankruptcy. If you extend that power beyond the Comptroller of the Currency it would be very hard.

Mr. JOHNSON. There might be a dozen suits at the same time for the same purpose, and thus cause the bank a great deal of trouble. The general rule is, as the Senate of course are aware, that a corporation can only be declared forfeited by some special provisions of the franchise. If the amendment is adopted it appears to me there might be several suits brought on at the same time to establish the same fact, and they might not always be decided in the same way. Some of them might be decided in favor of the bank and some against the bank.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not at all desirous to have inserted in the bill any new or strange provision. It is the case in my State now that any individual may go into court, and, by a declaration, set out the fact that any corporation in the State has violated its franchises and ask what is intended to be asked here only by the Comptroller of the Currency. If the Senator having this bill in charge will look at this section, he will see that some other parties than the Comptroller of the Currency might know of a violation of the provisions of this act much better than the Comptroller himself. For instance, there is a provision in this bill saying that a certain rate of interest, and no more, shall be charged. How will the Comptroller of the Currency know whether these banks have charged more than the regular rate of interest or not upon their local loans? How will the Comptroller of the Currency know whether they have charged more than the usual rate of exchange between one point and another? Those facts cannot possibly be known under any report the banks are required to make to the Comptroller. The individuals from whom money has been extorted in the shape of interest or unreasonable exchange would be a great deal more likely to understand the violation on the part of the corporation than the Comptroller himself. In fact, the Comptroller cannot possibly know—it is out of his power—whether these violations have been made or not. The section now reads:

That if the directors of any association shall knowingly violate, or knowingly permit any of the officers, agents, or servants of the association to violate any of the provisions of this act, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the association derived from this act shall be thereby forfeited. Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency.

I desire to add the words "or by some other person having an interest." I do not think it very likely that parties will go into court and ask that the franchises of one of these corporations shall be forfeited unless he has some good reason for it; and I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the reports required to be made by the banks under this law are certainly very inadequate to enable the community to understand the condition of the banks.

I do not know to what extent banks may be incorporated under this bill. The Senate will recollect that it is not only banks of circulation that may be incorporated. Every savings bank, every bank doing a business by paying and selling bills of exchange and receiving money on deposit, may commence business under the provisions of this bill. In fact, every savings bank and every insurance company throughout this country may be organized under the provisions of this bill. In my State insurance companies are permitted to do a banking business such as is described in this bill. They receive money on deposit, loan money at interest, and sometimes discount bills. Why cannot they be incorporated under this bill? It is not absolutely essential that they shall issue paper; but all the banking capital of this country may be incorporated under this bill. It is true that not over $300,000,000 may be issued as a circulation; but all the banking capital of the United States may be incorporated under this bill. It will put beyond any surveillance or control of the States an immense amount of capital; and I think we ought to be a little careful and guarded in the adoption of any measure whatever that shall put this immense amount of capital beyond our control. So far as the reports of these banks are concerned, I do not look upon them as amounting to anything at all.

I might instance many other violations of their franchises by these banks that might take place, and by which the community might be greatly outraged and wronged; and when was it that capital ever failed to inflict those wrongs on a community when it could? It has always been done, and I suppose always will be. I think we ought to guard this measure so that any one in the community in which these banks are incorporated may, at any time upon a violation of the provisions of their charter, go into court and ask that their privileges be forfeited. I think it is nothing but a reasonable provision. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator from Ohio desires it, that the party who comes into court and asks that the privileges of the bank be forfeited, if he fails to prosecute his suit successfully, shall be required to pay the costs. I think it is nothing but proper that he should do so. That would be the case without a provision to that effect. That will be a sufficient restraint upon individuals. They will not be likely to go into the courts of the United States and ask for the forfeiture of the charter of a bank unless they have a case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do think this is capacious—I will withdraw that, as it may be considered an unpleasant word—but I do think that this is not a time to make small points on a bill of this kind. It seems to me this amendment would not have been offered if the Senator had read the four or five preceding sections—

Mr. HENDERSON. I have read them very carefully.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the banks commit any violation whatever of the provisions of this act, they forfeit their charters. The fifty-second section of the bill provides:

That all transfer of the notes, bonds, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt owing to any association, or of deposits to its credit; all assignments of mortgages, sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor; all deposits of money, bullion, or other valuable thing for its use, or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors; and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void.

Then the next section, which is the one under consideration, goes on to provide that if they shall do anything inconsistent with the provisions of this act it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to commence a suit to set aside their franchise. It declares that the effect of any violation of the act shall be to forfeit their entire franchise and all their property, and requires the Comptroller to appoint a receiver, seize upon their assets, and commence a suit to ascertain whether the act of bankruptcy has been committed. To subject these banks to suits by everybody who is disposed to annoy them I think would be an attack upon the system that would be entirely unjustifiable. It is made the official duty of the Comptroller to commence these suits, and that is all that ought to be asked. I think, therefore, that the amendment of the committee which was intended to guard the public very carefully should be allowed to stand.

I might show that this proposed amendment was an absurd proposition. There might be fifty or one hundred suits pending under it at the same time in different tribunals. The judgment of those tribunals might be diverse. Some might direct the appointment of a receiver; some might not. Some might declare that the act of bankruptcy was excusable; some that there was no act of bankruptcy; some that an act of bankruptcy had occurred. They may select different charges, different accusations. There must be some one whose duty it shall be to commence this suit. It seems to me, therefore, a proposition of this kind ought not to receive the assent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question upon the amendment to the amendment as amended, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I shall not call for a division upon it now, but I give notice that I shall offer it in the Senate.

The amendment of the committee as amended was adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he will not allow this bill to go over until Monday at one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are no other important amendments, I think, and we may as well read the bill through to-day, and then I shall have no objection.

The next amendment was in section fifty-nine, line twenty-two, after the word "and" to strike out the words "to be."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section sixty-one, line seventeen, after the word "third" to strike out the words "to suggest."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section sixty-one, line twenty-one, after the word "fourth" to strike out the words "to report."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next and last amendment of the committee was in section sixty-four, line two, to strike out the words "reserves the right" and insert the word "may;" and after the word "time" to strike out the word "to;" so that the section will read:

That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. I hope not. We can have an executive session in a few minutes; but I desire to have action now on two or three important things that I think we ought to act upon. There is a conference report and a small bill which I want passed. I move that this bill be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it lie over informally, because I wish it to remain as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. No, sir. I desire to have an executive session.

Mr. WILSON. We can get an executive session in a few moments.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I insist on my motion, to test the sense of the Senate.

Mr. COWAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ANTHONY answered to his name.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. As my object is likely to be defeated by the call of the yeas and nays, I will, with the consent of the Senate, withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be withdrawn only by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the call of the roll having commenced.

Mr. GRIMES and Mr. DAVIS. I object. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the call will proceed.

The Secretary concluded the calling of the roll. Mr. FOOT. There is no quorum and no probability of securing the attendance of a quorum, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no announcement of the vote showing that there is no quorum.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will inquire, if such is the result of the vote, is it not proper that that result be announced? Otherwise, if we adjourn now, the call will begin when we meet again where we leave off to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It should be announced undoubtedly, and the motion to adjourn is not in order until it is announced.

The result was then announced—yeas 18, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Ransley, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilson—17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. What does the vote lack of a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the question on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 30, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, Mr. Prayer by Row. F. H. HEDGE, D. D., of Brookline, Massachusetts.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LCRETIA M. PERRY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Lucretia M. Perry, widow of Thomas Perry, United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PRINTING OF EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to report from the Committee on Commerce two important communications from the State and Treasury Departments relating to our foreign commercial relations, which I ask to have printed and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the communications were recommitted and ordered to be printed.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS, from the select committee on the Pacific railroad, by unanimous consent, reported a bill to amend the act chartering the Union Pacific Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the consent of the House for leave to report the bill back at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that the Union or People's Pacific railroad?

Mr. STEVENS. The Union Pacific railroad. There being no objection, leave was accordingly granted.

CHARGES AGAINST TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Whereas in the House of Representatives, on the 23d instant, Hon. FRANCIS P. BLAIR, JR., made the following declarations, as reported in the Globe:

"Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, (resuming.) Now I propose to show that the Secretary of the Treasury, with all the commerce of the country in his hands, with the collection of our foreign revenues and of the vast internal revenues in his hands, is using these abandoned plantations and grasping at all power and patronage for the purpose of providing a fund to carry on his war against the Administration which gave him place."

"Nobody is simple enough to believe that the distinguished Secretary has really retired from the canvass for the nomination for the Presidency, although he has written a letter declining to be a candidate. That letter was written because the 'strictly private' circular of the Pomeroy committee unearthed his underground and underhand intrigue against the President. It was such a disgraceful and disgusting sight to make use of the patronage and power, given him by the President, against his chief, that even Chase got ashamed to occupy such a position publicly. For that reason his letter was written; he wanted to get down under the ground and work there in the dark as he is now doing, and running the Pomeroy machine on the public money as vigorously as ever."

And whereas in the World, a journal published in New York, on the 28th instant, it is declared that developments of the most astounding character have just come to light in the fractional currency and printing bureaus over which Mr. Clark presides; and whereas Hon. JAMES BROOKS, a member of this House, did yesterday in his place repeat the substance of the above charges in the words following, taken at the reporter's desk:

"At an early period of the session I called on the other side of the House in this matter of printing public money, and I gave them an opportunity to correct that great evil, which, because they did not correct, has led to the sacrifice of millions and millions of the public money in the printing bureau of the Treasury of the United States, and to the conversion of the Treasury Department into a house for orgies and bacchanals." Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate and report upon the truth of the allegations above quoted, and of any other allegations which have been or may be made, affecting the integrity of the administration in the Treasury Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that that committee ought to be as large as the largest committees of the House. I will suggest, therefore, that the committee consist of nine members, and that they have leave to report at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept that modification. Mr. BROOKS. I do not desire to object to the resolution, but I object to the recitation in the preamble of my remarks of yesterday as incorrect.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg to say to the gentleman that I have quoted the gentleman's language precisely as given by the reporter for the Globe.

Mr. BROOKS. Let the quotation be read again. I will stand by what I said.

The Clerk read the quotation referred to from the preamble.

Mr. BROOKS. What I said was in substance this:

"Mr. Brooks, after the noise had somewhat subsided, said millions of public money had been in peril of being sacrificed in the Bureau of Printing, and much evil produced by the conversion of the Treasury building into a house of orgies and bacchanals. If the galleries were cleared, so that language could be uttered not fit for female ears, he could show every word he said was true."

I ask the gentleman to conform his preamble to that statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have the exact words of the gentleman, as given by the official reporter at the desk; and I cannot change them.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will give me an opportunity to say what I have to say upon that subject, I will be satisfied.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose, if there be no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. May I be permitted, then, to say what I was deprived of the opportunity of saying yesterday?

Mr. BROOMALL. I object to the gentleman continuing his speech of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the resolution?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object to the resolution. I object to the misrecitation of my remarks in the preamble of the resolution; but I will not stand in the way of the investigation even though it is in part based upon a misrecitation of my own remarks. I accept the recitation, and am ready to go before the country upon it.

There was no objection; and the resolution was introduced and agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to request that I may not be placed on this committee at all.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask to report from the Committee of Ways and Means the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill. They are few, and I shall ask that they be acted on at the present time.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that after these amendments shall be disposed of the House shall take up the ordinary private business of this day, I will raise no objection.

The SPEAKER. This is not private bill day under the order under which the House is now acting.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then with the understanding that this shall be considered as private bill day.

The SPEAKER. The majority of the House can change the order of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to my proposition.

The SPEAKER. Then it is the understanding that these amendments of the Senate shall now be taken up for action.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that this shall be considered as private bill day.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The regular order of business has been called for.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means has the right to report in reference to appropriation bills at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the amendments of the Senate will be read and considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. There will be no difficulty about that. I will not call for the previous question if the gentleman desires to make any remarks.

The amendments of the Senate were read; and those on which separate votes were not asked were concurred in.

The Clerk read the following amendment of the Senate:

Add as follows:

Be it further enacted, That all persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay and emoluments, other than bounty, as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer force of the United States, of the like service, from and after the 1st day of January, 1864; and that every person of color who shall hereafter be mustered into the service shall receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding $100.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the compensation now fixed by law is thirteen dollars per month for a white soldier and ten dollars per month for a colored soldier. This proposition is, from the 1st of January last, to fix the compensation of both classes at the same rate: that both white and colored soldiers shall receive thirteen dollars per month. Of course there can be no misapprehension on the subject. There is no proposition at all to increase the pay and emoluments of white soldiers. The provision is only that the pay of the colored soldier shall be increased from ten dollars to thirteen dollars per month.

That is the effect of the proposed amendment; and while this provision does not give a bounty of $100 to the colored soldier, it gives the President the power to do so if he thinks fit. It is to place the colored soldier on the exact footing of the white soldier in reference to pay, equipments, rations, and in every other respect.

Now, without saying anything of the comparative merits of these two classes of soldiers, without indulging in any remarks on the question whether the African soldier is worth as much to the Government as the white soldier, I desire to call the attention of the House to one fact, ignoring all questions of feeling, of passion and prejudice in favor of the white race and against the black race, and that is, that in placing colored soldiers on the same footing in regard to the monthly pay with the white soldier, you do not, in fact, place the two classes on the same footing as to compensation, for while you make no provision for the support of the wives and children of the white soldier, you actually provide for the support of the wives and children of the colored soldier out of the public Treasury. By this Senate amendment, which you seem resolved to adopt, you raise the pay of the colored troops to exactly the same as the white troops, and yet you pay no attention to the wives and children of the one, and very generously support the wives and children of the other, an actual discrimination in favor of the negro troops. The discrimination is an immense one. You are not equalizing. No, sir; when you furnish the wife and children of the white soldier with daily rations, as you have been doing and are doing for those of the black soldier, and make that your permanent policy, then and not till then it may be pretended that you are placing our soldiers, white and colored, upon exactly the same footing. I am not willing that this proposition shall be misapprehended. You discriminate clearly, and in this, that while you are supporting by rations and in every other way the wives and children of colored soldiers, you furnish no such advantage, no benefits whatever to the wife and child of the white soldier.

Away, then, with this pretense of equalizing; instead of equalizing you are discriminating, discriminating in favor of the colored soldier and against the white soldier. I have said this much: taking your own ground that these two classes of soldiers, as soldiers, are exactly equal. But by no word of mine will I allow the inference to be drawn that I regard these two classes of soldiers as equal, either as soldiers or in any of the qualities which give value to the elements of a republican Government. You cannot make them equal. Since the Government has determined to employ them as soldiers, however unwise the determination, the Government should act justly toward them. If they must be employed, the citizen who has disapproved that policy must still desire that it should not prove unfortunate for his country. Inasmuch as you are determined upon that policy we can but desire to make the services of these colored people as valuable as possible. That does not require any such legislation as this. I do not think they ought to have been employed as soldiers. I think they should have been employed in pursuits to which, by their habits and condition, they are well and manifestly adapted. They could have been so employed in valuable service in every one of your armies; but they have not been so employed. They have not been employed so as to relieve the citizen soldier from oppressive and unaccustomed labor in the hot, sunny fields of the South, a labor congenial to the negro but destructive to the soldier of the North, but you have placed arms in their hands, left them in your camps and abandoned fortifications for many months, while the white soldier has been toiling under the hot and fiery sun of the South, to which they are not accustomed, sacrificing thousands to your visionary idea that "the African is the coming man." I say deliberately, and with some knowledge of the subject, that all the able-bodied colored men whom you have reached by your arms might have been properly employed, and with the general consent of the country, in services and pursuits to which they are adapted, to the relief of your armies, in the building of roads, fortifications, and countless other labors of your armies. But this would not harmonize with your political theories. But this discussion is not necessarily raised by the pending amendment. What I protest against is the discrimination; not a discrimination in favor of white soldiers, but against white soldiers. And no gentleman will tell me that this discrimination does not exist.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Does he assert that this bill discriminates against the white soldier?

Mr. HOLMAN. It does.

Mr. UPSON. Wherein?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have attempted to explain it; while you place the white and colored soldiers, by this bill, upon the same footing as to pay, clothing, equipments, and bounty, you furnish no rations or other support to the wives and children of white soldiers, as you do to the wives and children of colored soldiers. Is not this a manifest and an important discrimination?

Mr. ELIOT. I would like to inquire of the gentleman upon what ground he makes that statement? Where have there been rations furnished by the Government to the wives and children of black soldiers? I want to know whether he means anything more than this, that upon the Mississippi and elsewhere, where our armies have gone, where there have been wives and children of freedmen and fugitives dependent entirely for support, they have been to a certain extent supplied; whether he means to say that the wives and children of black men, as such, have been taken charge of by the Government while their husbands have been paid as soldiers in the field. And if he does mean that, I hope he will let us know the fact. I deny it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The great body of colored soldiers have been drawn together in the Mississippi valley and on the coasts of North and South Carolina. All the way from Memphis to New Orleans, wherever you have established "contraband camps" you have enrolled all able-bodied colored men into your Army as soldiers, and then the remaining body of the colored population thus gathered together into these contraband camps, embracing the women and children, the feeble and infirm, amounting to hundreds of thousands, have been and still are supported by the Government, so far at least as furnishing them with supplies, rations, and superintendence is concerned. And I presume the gentleman from Massachusetts will not question that.

Mr. ELIOT. It amounts only to this: that where in the South, in rebel districts, there have been colored men enrolled, and at the same time contraband camps have existed, and want has been felt among the women and children, there to a certain extent that want has been supplied by the Government. And from that he argues there has been a discrimination made in favor of the black soldiers. I would ask the gentleman whether he would have those women and children who have gone into contraband camps starved for want of aid from the Government. I ask him what he would have done.

Mr. HOLMAN. What would I have done? The gentleman does not understand me as complaining of the fact that the Government has shown a proper regard for humanity toward these unfortunate people. Not at all. I am complaining that while you do supply, as the gentleman frankly admits, the wives and children of these black soldiers so drawn together in the South, from the necessities of the case, you now propose to pay the black soldiers thirteen dollars a month, and the white soldiers the same, while you make no provision whatever for the wife and children of the white soldier. Whether it be the result of a necessary humanity or not the fact remains that you do provide for the wives and children of the blacks in your employment and do not provide for the wife and children of the white soldier. I am not questioning the duty of humanity rendered imperative by your policy, but the actual inequality it produces when you make the pay of the white soldier and black soldier the same, and provide for the wife and child of the one and not of the other.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not admit any such thing. There may have been supplies made, but not to these people as wives of soldiers. Nobody knows whether they are the wives of soldiers or not. They are there in contraband camps and have been supplied, not as wives but as human beings. Now, the distinction is this: that the white soldiers from the loyal States who have left their wives and families at home, are under pay from the Government at the rate of thirteen dollars a month, while their wives and families are in charge of their friends at home, supported by their husbands or their friends at home. On the abandoned plantations these people who are said to be supported by the Government in a large majority of cases are supported by their own labor. In exceptional cases there may have been supplies given to persons who happened to be wives, as far as they can be wives at all, of soldiers enrolled in the Army, but that any such system has been adopted as to supply the wives and children of black soldiers I deny, and the gentleman cannot make it out.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a mere difference in words. The gentleman does not pretend but what supplies have been furnished to these colored people from whom your colored soldiers have been drawn, but they have not been supplied "as the wives and children of the colored soldiers," but only as contrabands. Where is the difference?

Mr. ELIOT. Not more than they have to the wives of whites.

Mr. HOLMAN. White soldiers! I would like to see a dollar that the Government has paid for the support of the wives and children of any white soldiers from my own State or any other.

Mr. ELIOT. Read the correspondence of General Butler.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point I make is this: the gentleman does not pretend but that these bodies of contrabands that have been got together upon the Mississippi and elsewhere, and from which your colored soldiers have been drawn, have not been supported by the bounty of the Government.

Mr. ELIOT. Not as wives.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not as wives! You may not call them wives. They are women and children composing the bodies from which your colored soldiers were drawn.

Mr. ELIOT. Nobody knows whether they are or are not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, what of that? It may not be "as the wives and children" of the colored soldiers that they are supported; but that is a mere begging of the question. You have gathered together at your contraband camps many hundreds of thousands of negroes as your armies have advanced, and from these camps you have enrolled many thousands of negro troops, probably sixty or seventy thousand from these sources alone, and put them into the Army. The balance of these people at these camps, as the gentleman well knows, are provided for out of the Treasury. They are furnished with food and clothing. It is just and proper, I admit. After the Government has adopted the policy of gathering them together from their homes, it could not well do anything else; but does this change the fact that the negro soldiers—I speak of the general rule—have no wives or children to support? If they have any they are provided for by the Government, while the white soldier must provide for his wife and children or leave them to the kindly charity of friends at home.

But the position I have assumed remains, that while these negroes thus gathered together are supplied and supported by the Government directly and immediately, there is no such pretense of compensation in any shape or form to the wives and children of white soldiers. And yet you say there is no discrimination. Again, let me say to the gentleman, that of the white refugees who have come within your lines, driven from their homes by the iron heel of this rebellion, from southwestern Missouri, Arkansas, and middle and eastern Tennessee, North Carolina, and Alabama, thousands and tens of thousands of whom have gone into your service, not one dollar of money has ever been appropriated by the Government for the support of their wives and children. You see them, here and elsewhere, thousands, actual objects of generous commiseration even for the cause in which they have suffered; yet this very bill contains an appropriation of a million and a half of money to the hospital department for the support of these very "contrabands," not blacks employed by the Government, but contrabands in camps who are rendering you no service and entitled to no greater consideration or greater favor even in the eye of humanity than this great body of white Union refugees who have been thus driven from their homes. Yet the contraband suffers from your policy, not because he supports your cause, while the white refugee suffers for his devotion to the Union.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] if a large number of the black soldiers are not slaves, or were not up to the time of the rebellion?

Mr. ELIOT. Does the gentleman inquire of me whether in my judgment a large part of the black soldiers were not slaves?

Mr. GANSON. I supposed that the gentleman was a frank person. I put to him a direct question.

Mr. ELIOT. State it again.

Mr. GANSON. It is whether they were not in a condition of slavery at the time of the rebellion?

Mr. ELIOT. Where?

Mr. GANSON. The black soldiers in our service everywhere.

Mr. ELIOT. Why, if the gentleman asks my opinion about it, I have very little doubt that it is so.

Mr. GANSON. I simply asked the question for information.

Mr. ELIOT. Has not the gentleman the same judgment as I have?

Mr. GANSON. I have not the same information.

Mr. ELIOT. I apprehend that the gentleman has the same means of information.

Mr. GANSON. I asked the question because the gentleman is chairman of the select committee on the Freedmen's Bureau; and I supposed that he had been attending to his duties, and had obtained some information on the subject which persons not upon the committee could not obtain.

Mr. ELIOT. So far as my information goes, I can say to the gentleman that I have no doubt that a very large proportion of the negroes now serving in our armies in the South were, at the beginning of this rebellion, in the condition of slaves.

Mr. GANSON. I now desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the relations that exist between these black soldiers and their women and children are the same in the eyes of the law that exist between white men and their wives and children?

Mr. ELIOT. I should like to know if the gentleman supposes that because I was chairman of that committee I have any means of informing him on that point also. He is mistaken; and I am not going to do it, either.

Mr. GANSON. Then the gentleman does not know as much as I thought he did.

Mr. ELIOT. And the gentleman from New York knows more than he thought he did.

Mr. GANSON. I therefore state that the relations between the white soldiers and their wives and children are not the same as the relations between the black soldiers and their women and children. The children and wives of white soldiers, freemen, can legally contract debts against the heads of the families for the necessities of life. The women and children of slaves can do no such thing. Therefore it is that a portion of the money payable to the black soldier, for bounty and pay, should be, by the Government, secured for the benefit of their women and children.

Mr. ELIOT. That is then on the ground that black soldiers have the same relations to their wives and children as white soldiers have to their wives and children.

Mr. GANSON. On the ground that they have not the same relations; because the women and children of the black soldiers have, in law, no right to contract any debt against the fathers of the children for the necessities of life, whereas the wife and children of the white man have a right, so far as the necessities of life are concerned, to contract a legal obligation against the father and husband.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House believe that, in the sight of God, when a black man marries a black wife, whether at the North or South, he is married to her just as the honorable gentleman and myself are married to our respective wives. In the eyes of slaveholders of the South it is not so. But the opinion of the gentleman from New York, if it is entertained by my honorable friend from Indiana, furnishes an answer to the position taken by the gentleman from Indiana, because if it is true that the relations which exist between black men and their wives is different from those which exist between husbands and wives at the North, then it follows that it is not true that the Government which provides for the support of a certain number of destitute black women and children does supply their wants as the wives and children of black soldiers.

Mr. GANSON. I am very glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts has at last found out that I am in his favor. If he had not so many party prejudices he would have found it out sooner.

Mr. ELIOT. I will be always glad to find that, sir.

Mr. GANSON. We all know that in the ordinary walks of life these black men, even if they have wives and children in the free States, never receive for their labor the same rate of compensation that white men do, because their services are not so valuable.

Mr. ELIOT. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GANSON. I except New England, for I think they may be a little more valuable than white men there.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; the gentleman is wrong again.

Mr. HOLMAN. This discussion, Mr. Speaker, is somewhat technical. I do not care, for the purpose of my argument, what may be the relation between the negroes in your employment to the women and children from whom they were taken. The fact is manifest that in a large body of negroes gathered anywhere, a portion of them men, and a portion women and children, it must be presumed that there is some relation existing between them which approximates to the legal position of husband and wife. I have assumed no other position. If these women and children are the wives of your negro soldiers they are supported by the Government; if they are not, they are supported by the Government. It does not matter which ground you assume; if the negro soldiers have wives and children, they are the women and children you are supporting. The white soldiers have wives and children, and you do not support them. You pay both classes of soldiers the same, and yet you dare to say there is no discrimination, when the one supports his wife and children and the other does not. I see, however, that Mr. Mellen, the general superintendent of contrabands on the Mississippi, as Mr. Chase's agent, is trying to compel a system of marriage among the negroes of his department. I refer to his recent report. That report shows not only the vast number of these negroes who are now living on your bounty, the heavy outlays you are incurring, but the army of officials in your employment, paid out of your Treasury, to superintend the interests of the women and children connected with the black soldiers of your Army; and yet you say there is no discrimination! Whatever may be the relations held by your negro soldiers to this great body of half a million people which this Government is now supporting, and which General Butler and others are so eager to increase, the result is exactly the same. You are supporting them by your bounty.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will allow me to say that what he now states is to some extent true. A great majority of these women and children, however, are not supported by the Government, but by their own labor. It is only those who have been disabled by the treatment they have received in the service they were in before they came within our lines who are supplied with rations by the United States Government. They are the exceptions and not the rule. It is only those who have become disabled by the oppression they have undergone during their whole lives that are to any extent supported by the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman mean that this new form of slavery which has been inaugurated on the Mississippi river and the coast, by which these negroes are placed under new masters in the form of agents and lessees you have placed over them, has had the effect of improving their condition—a form of servitude as revolting as the system you would abolish?

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. And that by that agency the Government is able to provide for them? The gentleman must have known of the appeal which has come here in behalf of these negroes, who are being oppressed by their new masters. The gentleman cannot be ignorant of the fact. He must know as chairman of the Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs of the inauguration of this system of leasing out plantations and of placing these negroes under taskmasters; under masters who have no interest in them or sympathy with them except to obtain the benefit of their labor; and that while doing this, without benefiting the negro, you rather increased than diminished the burdens upon the Government, by throwing constantly on its hands for support numbers of such as were unable to perform labor on account of the cruelty and injustice to which they had been exposed.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman is wrong in his facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman deny the fact? It was not many days ago, certainly not a month, that benevolent gentlemen from the Mississippi valley came here for the purpose of getting the Government to do something for these unfortunate negroes whom your benevolence has placed under the control of men who only seek to aggrandize their fortunes by the unrequited toil of the negroes placed under their control.

Mr. ELIOT. I know very well that there has been iniquity and injustice enough practiced upon these people; but the gentleman is getting away from the point in issue. I admit that injustice has been practiced; but when the gentleman calls upon me to say that there has been there a system of slavery initiated and carried on, I deny it. But the point is, whatever has been the system of labor, whether the Government has been subjected to expense for the support of these people. I ask the gentleman if he can deny that these people have, up to the present time, much more than defrayed the expense of their support. Sir, each one of them has more than repaid the Government for the outlay which has been made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman point to some published record showing that the Government have received back more than their outlay, or any part of their outlay?

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will find, if he will examine the statistics of the western country, very much more has been received by the Government than has been expended upon the contrabands.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman point to some public record that will show that fact? No statistics have reached us showing one cent of return to the Treasury. The gentleman may say that we on this side of the House have not the same facilities for ascertaining all the statistics of the Treasury Department that he has; and therefore I ask him to show some published record to prove that any reimbursements have been made of the vast sums we have expended.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the gentleman if he has read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have run over it.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman must have run over it very hastily if he has not seen this official statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House is familiar with that report. I state this in general terms, and I defy gentlemen to contradict it, that out of the millions you have expended—I do not say improperly or unnecessarily, at least not all of it, in the view of the policy you have inaugurated, for justice and humanity still remain, whatever may be the want of wisdom in your policy—out of the millions you have already expended not a single dollar has come back into the Treasury. Excuse me if I say another thing, that with reference to the handful of colored soldiers you have gathered together from the State of Massachusetts—and it may be true as to the colored soldiers exported from my own State of Indiana to Massachusetts to be organized into regiments to fill your quotas—that while their wives and children are not provided for by the Government, still in reference to the balance of the colored population brought into our lines by your policy, by the encouragement and solicitude of Generals Banks and Butler, and other commanders, I ask whether the great body of them are not now receiving their support at the hands of the Government, without any pretense of any return. I speak of general rules and not of exceptions.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman know that the Government has furnished rations for the families of any of the eight regiments of colored soldiers recruited at Camp William Penn, at Philadelphia?

Mr. HOLMAN. When I mentioned Maryland and Massachusetts I intended to embrace such as were recruited in the States outside of the operations of the Army. They are a mere handful of all our colored troops if the President is right, that one hundred thousand or more of these troops are in the service. The number drawn from Massachusetts, Maryland, New York, and Pennsylvania are a mere handful in comparison.

But I have not spoken in reference to particular cases; I have referred to the immense body of negroes you have gathered together in the advance of your armies, from which you collected the great body of your colored soldiers now under the pay of the Government.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of my friend from Indiana, I wish to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] because he seems to be ignorant upon the subject. I will tell him that the agents of Massachusetts and other States and of the Government are not only in the western States drumming up recruits, but they are going about robbing and plundering—I may say stealing the property of my constituents, and yet he seems not to know it. I have certificates in my possession that troops of the United States have gone to plantations, the property of my constituents and others, and have swept away not only negroes, but stock, cotton, and everything else they could lay their hands upon of value, even household furniture and wearing apparel; a portion of the negroes having been put into the army and the balance of them, women and children, gathered in fields and supported at the expense of the Government of the United States without any law for it. Where is the law for giving rations to these women and children? Yet gentlemen sit complacently in their seats and seek to continue the appropriation for contrabands not in Government employ, which passed this House a few days ago, to legalize this robbery, if you will allow me so to call it, because by the laws of my State and others it is robbery, and men found guilty of the offense are put into the penitentiary or hung.

If gentlemen want to they can see these certificates, sworn to before a magistrate. I hope now that gentlemen will understand that such is the case—that agents are going about stealing and robbing, and that the officials of the Government are sanctioning it. Indeed, gentlemen here seem to be justifying these things. Where is the law, where is the authority to do these things? If the gentleman from Massachusetts will call on me, and wishes to see them, I can show letters from as good and responsible men as are in this House. They state that these things have been transpiring for months past. No wonder, then, that the expenses of the Government have been accumulating, and that they now reach such large figures. It is because of these illegal expenditures of money out of the Treasury of the United States.

According to the report of the adjutant general of Kentucky we have furnished fifty-seven thousand men for the armies of the United States; and while these brave men are fighting the battles of the Union, spilling their blood and leaving their bones to bleach upon southern plains, their wives and children, whom they have left behind them, are plundered and robbed of their property left for their support. It is as true as that I stand upon this floor. I know it to be true. I have suffered myself. I know it to be true, and I dare gentlemen to deny it. I can prove it in any court of justice. I ask nothing for myself, but when the laws of my State are violated and trampled under foot I have the right to protest against it and do now offer my protest against it.

Mr. ELIOT. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] to make certain charges against officers of the Government. I have yet to learn that any statement that officers under the Government have been into his country stealing negroes rests upon truth.

Mr. CLAY. I say it is.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. And I too.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I should think the gentleman from Kentucky would find proper redress in going to the Government.

Mr. CLAY. I have suffered in that way myself, and know the statement to be true.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. And so have I suffered by Benjamin F. Butler. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELIOT. I submit that the gentleman from Kentucky has made clean his breast of the grievance he has suffered. That he has lost negroes, may be true; that any negroes have been stolen by officers of the Government, I deny.

Mr. CLAY. One remark more.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield.

Mr. HARDING. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts was speaking with the consent of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The floor is in possession of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and he yielded it to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ELIOT. All this is outside of the question before the House, and I have nothing more to say upon the matter except to thank the gentleman from Indiana for the opportunity he has given me to interrupt him. Let us confine ourselves to the point. All this is a diversion which does not meet the question which the House is called upon to settle.

Mr. HOLMAN. I differ with the gentleman from Massachusetts as to this being foreign to the question. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, as it is probably within his knowledge, a question bearing upon the main question. It is a well-known fact that more or less colored men have been gathered together under arms in this District and adjacent portions of Virginia and Maryland. I desire to know from the gentleman how large a number of persons, including men, women, and children, are now and have been for months and months past receiving their regular rations at the hands of the Government within the limits of this District and the adjacent portions of Virginia and Maryland.

Mr. ELIOT. All the persons who have been receiving anything have been paying more than they have received.

Mr. HOLMAN. In what way?

Mr. ELIOT. By the proceeds of their services, which proceeds have been paid into the Treasury. If the gentleman will go to the freedmen's camp at Arlington—

Mr. HOLMAN. I know the negroes of this District have been employed as teamsters and as—

Mr. ELIOT. And otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. What I refer to is the women and children, and I want to know how they are employed by the Government.

Mr. ELIOT. I say to the gentleman that the proceeds of the labor of these women and children have gone into the Treasury, and when I last had the opportunity of knowing about it there was from thirty to fifty thousand dollars standing to the credit of that fund.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman refer to some particular record of the revenues received by the Government from these sources? There is a "contraband camp" at Arlington, beyond the Potomac, where I understand thousands of contrabands are gathered together from various parts of Maryland and Virginia, brought in by our troops. A village has been built there at the expense of the Government—quite a city, indeed, substantially built, and inaugurated four or five months ago with some ceremony—for the support and residence of these persons, superintended by many salaried agents. I have seen in the public journals official advertisements for the ordinary and usual supplies for the benefit of this contraband camp. Will the gentleman point out the source of revenue which he refers to as coming to the Government from these persons?

Mr. ELIOT. The services of those parties, women and children.

Mr. HOLMAN. How are they employed?

Mr. ELIOT. Partly upon the land there in raising products which go into the market, partly as teamsters, as the gentleman says, and otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, the gentleman must know that since that village was established there has never been an opportunity of realizing from it one copper. The Government cannot employ those women.

Mr. ELIOT. If he will go there he will now find them engaged working for the Army with their sewing machines furnished to them for that purpose. He will find also an account is kept of the proceeds of their labor, and he will find furthermore a balance of money in their favor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman produce the evidence which will satisfy the House? Some official report? Some statement from officers or agents? We have seen, as a common spectacle, trains of wagons loaded with women and little children brought from their homes in every section of the country, from the most loyal parts of Maryland, and taken into this contraband camp to be supported by the Government; and I would like to know how they are to be a source of revenue. That such a village for many thousands of people, built at great expense, furnished with every appliance for domestic life, and conducted by salaried agents, established four or five months ago, can be a source of revenue, by raising agricultural products or otherwise, to the Government is simply impossible; and until the gentleman can present to the public some evidence of the expenditures and receipts we cannot ignore the evidence which appeals to our senses and experience everywhere around us. The truth is you have not a particle of evidence of even the amount expended, much less of revenue received from any source whatever. The public money is expended, and this House and the country have not and never will have any account of it. In matters of public expenditure and public revenue no mere statement of gentlemen amounts to anything. The people have the right to know from official statements what becomes of their money. If the gentleman will present any such official statement, such as we have for all other expenditures, we will submit to them with pleasure; but none such can be produced, or ever will be. I will now yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that these servants are congregated in camps with no employment whatever. They are brought together by thousands and are now dying with diseases of every description that a man can imagine, and instead of being put to work they are lying there and literally rotting in their filth.

Mr. ELIOT. Let me say to the gentleman that it has been my earnest wish to have a Freedmen's Bureau organized for the purpose of correcting this very evil.

Mr. CLAY. You are just murdering them by thousands. I have information in my possession showing that on some different plantations more than one third of the negroes have died. This is the result of your system. Northern men are sending their agents to that country and by fraud and bribery are enticing away the able-bodied negroes—leaving the women and children to starve—and putting them in the armies of the United States to fill their quota, thereby saving themselves from having to serve. It is literally selling them to the Government of the United States. It amounts to that. For every such negro you put into the Army they save six or seven hundred dollars in their own pockets, for in many places bounties are offered as high as $800; this they pocket and never give to the negro recruit. They give a small bribe to the slave to entice him to leave his master and put him in the Army, and thus save the bounty they would have to give if one of their own citizens should enter the service. In fact, they are selling these negroes to the Government of the United States at an enormous price and saving their own citizens and making money by the operation. You are here now, knowing these things, legalizing these acts. You care no more for the negroes than you do for a hog; not a bit more. You have not half the humanity that the slaveholders have. Your course in this matter is dictated solely by your own interests. You are governed by dollars and cents.

Sir, as a slaveholder I have been scoffed at here and vilified for the last four or five months. I have held my tongue and refrained from answering; but my patience is worn out by this continual abuse of slaveholders. I would rather be a slaveholder than one of you who sit here and legalize this robbery and stealing all over the country. That is what I think about it. I do not profess to belong to the other side of the House, (Republican;) but I must admit that all my feelings and inclinations disposed me to go with them. Why? Because I supposed that they were in favor of sustaining and supporting this Government. We have pledged ourselves to the last man and dollar to go with you to accomplish that purpose. I do not intend to be driven from my purpose. I shall remain firm and steadfast, no matter what you may do; but yet while I pledge you the last dollar, if necessary, I do not mean that you shall come and rob me of my last dollar now, and turn me out on the cold charities of the world. I am willing to give dollar for dollar with you, but I am not willing that you shall come and rob me now. That is what I complain of.

I will just say now, in conclusion, that this system which you have inaugurated is a most abominable one. It is worse than slavery itself. Your agents cheat the negroes out of half their earnings, and rule them with an iron rod. They are worse than any slaveholders in the South. You talk about freedom! Is there any freedom or humanity in taking a negro from his home, where he is well fed and clothed and well treated, and putting him in the charge of an agent whose sole object is gain, and who has no sympathy for him, and will cheat him out of the fruits of his labor? Is that the kind of slavery you wish to inaugurate in this country?

Sir, it is an abominable system, and one which I believe the people of the United States will never consent to. The people will never suffer that kind of slavery to exist in this country. Do you suppose that they will permit the control of all this class of people to be in the hands of the Secretary of War and controlled by him as provided for in your bill which has passed the House, contrary to the constitution and laws of the different States? I hope not. If they do, the Secretary will be the great slave autocrat of the country; he will have more agents and sub-agents under his control, with large salaries drawn from the Treasury of the United States, thereby sucking the very life-blood of the nation, to control and take care of these four million slaves, to furnish them employment, clothing, and food, and provide them with homes upon the abandoned plantations of the South, as is provided for by the gentleman's bill, than there are now slave-owners in all the southern States. I ask nothing for my people but what is guaranteed to them by the Constitution of our country, and I would scorn to ask as a boon that which they are justly entitled to under the laws of the land.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have but another remark to make. A great portion of this discussion of course has not been pertinent to the real issue. There are but two questions presented: first, shall we place these colored soldiers on the same footing with white soldiers as to pay and every other condition of the private soldier? That is the first question presented. There are but two arguments against it. One of them I have presented already—the impolicy and injustice of the Government providing for the women and children of colored soldiers and not for the wives and children of white soldiers. I have thought that the discrimination made of three dollars a month was at the very least a fair discrimination, as you are resolved on employing negroes as soldiers, even admitting that white and black soldiers are equally valuable to the Government, inasmuch as you support the wives and children of the one and not of the other. I have said on this point all I desire to say.

The other question is this, and I come now to what I conceive to be the main question: are we prepared by a solemn act of legislation to place the colored soldier on exactly the same footing with the white soldier? There is the question naked and unvarnished. That is the issue now presented, placing the negro on the same footing exactly with the white private soldier, for you assume that negroes are not equal under any circumstances to white officers. You propose only to equalize the negro with the white private soldier. Gentlemen have to meet that question. It is fairly presented by the pending amendment. It cannot be evaded on this vote. On the yeas and nays which will be taken this House will determine the question so far as this body is concerned whether the negro soldier and the white private soldier are to be put upon an equality; whether the African who has submitted to ages of servitude shall be placed—not in fact but in legislation—on the same high platform of equality, equalized as far as it is in your power to equalize, so far as legislation can do it, with the white soldier proud of his traditional courage. We have seen the spectacle within a few days past of an effort to place these two races on the same footing in the Territory of Montana by an act of Congress the fate of which is still in suspense, and now we see this further step taken to equalize by law the gallant private soldier with the African troops, and then the argument is that a race that has fought for the public safety must enjoy every right of the citizen. Is not this the secret of your policy?

I do not believe that any gentleman who hears my voice to-day thinks that in any of the social, moral, intellectual, or political elements, or so far as moral or even physical courage and endurance are concerned, there is any kind of equality between the two races. There may be such, but I believe that this paradox of equalization is purely political. The one race is famous and has been for uncounted ages, not only for its courage but for those qualities which spring out of moral and physical courage, the great and fundamental principles of progress and civilization. The power which has laid the foundations of empire and has pressed forward the march of civilization develops itself in the white race; while the African, with similar opportunities for progress, with civilization existing on the borders and established within the limits of his continent by the white race for many centuries, has remained absolutely unchanged. To say that these two races are equal in the elements of progress and civilization, that they are equally valuable as soldiers, equal in their influence in controlling and directing events, equal in their capacity to endure, to apprehend, and to comprehend, equal in everything that enters into the high qualities of a soldier—as you propose to do by this bill—is an insult to the universal experience of mankind. The races are not equal in the elements of greatness and power. You cannot make them equal by law; and this attempt to equalize them will not elevate the negro nor add to the courage and manhood and martial spirit of the white men of your Army.

Mr. SHANNON. I rise to a point of order. The only question before the House is: "Shall Americans of European descent rob Americans of African descent of the fruits of their labor?"

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not hear the point made by the gentleman, but judge from the good humor elicited by it that it must have been considered very witty. Sir, the right to bear arms is the peculiar right of the free citizen in a free Republic. It is not so much a duty as a right, the highest right of the citizen. In conferring this right or imposing this duty on the African you do not elevate the white soldier. You do not stimulate him with new impulses of patriotism and honorable ambition. You cannot get rid of the ancient prejudices existing in the Army and everywhere else against a people who have submitted to servitude, not a generation, but for ages, and still submit without an effort to regain their freedom. While there is no reluctance on the part of the Army to see the negro stop the ball which might strike the white soldier down, there is this feeling: that the attempt to place the negro on an absolute legal equality with the white soldier who went to the field of his own free will, who came to the salvation of the country when the first tocsin of alarm was sounded, is an insult to him, an unjust disregard of his sentiments and opinions, of his high appreciation of the right to bear arms for the defense of his country, and a poor recompense for his chivalrous bearing on every field of battle, which only a traditional sense of honor could inspire. If a servile race, servile for submitting for ages to servitude, can at once assume equality with the private soldiers of the most masculine race that ever upheld empire, what becomes of the pride of military glory?

I warn you, Mr. Speaker, I warn gentlemen in their eager haste to equalize the races for unworthy political ends, to break down those barriers which have stood for ages, perhaps reared by prejudice but still actual and real, that in doing this they do not permit their interest in the negro to overshadow their patriotism, and impair if not destroy the martial spirit of our armies; that they do not, in their efforts to encourage black troops, discourage white troops, in their eager efforts to strike down this terrible rebellion, which can only be mastered by the strong grasp and irresistible will of the white race. This is a blow at the private white soldier; if you impair his manly, patriotic spirit, you sap the foundation of your Army.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask him a question? I wish to ask him whether General Jackson, at New Orleans, did not put the negro soldier upon the same footing with the white.

Mr. HOLMAN. That question has been asked so often that I really cannot take the time to answer it.

Mr. PRICE. I want an answer—yes or no.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot yield the floor to the gentleman for any such stereotyped question. It has been asked over and over again on this floor by those who believe the negro at least equal to the white man, and it has been answered as often. I say to the gentleman that General Jackson employed the black man just as he ought to have been employed in this war. He employed him in those acts of physical labor for which he is admirably adapted, especially in a southern climate. On this point there is no ambiguity in history. If you had employed him during this war as your Army reached him in its advance, as he was employed then, in relieving our own gallant soldiers from that extreme physical labor to which they have been subjected under the hot sun of the South, and refrained from making him the corner-stone of your political edifice, the element of your fanatical and impracticable policy, every man in the country would have come up with one voice, and that voice in favor of crushing this rebellion at whatever sacrifice of life and treasure, without question, without qualification. It is by deviating from the policy of those worthier patriots of the past age, of the prudent counsels and practical statesmanship of the earlier and better days of the Republic, by deviating from their conservative wisdom, that these misfortunes have crowded upon us, that the nation trembles in agony. But fanaticism is deaf to every appeal of reason. It exults in its own blindness though it walks in the midst of burning plowshares.

Now, sir, without extending these remarks, entered upon on the spur of the moment, I have but to repeat that these negro troops have been employed at ten dollars a month, while our white soldiers have received only thirteen dollars a month, a discrimination of only three dollars a month in their favor. It is now proposed to increase the pay of the negro troops to thirteen dollars per month, and no increase in the pay of the white soldier. It is against this that I enter my protest, not that it is of such moment in itself, but because it is a part of your intemperate policy. I protest against it in the name of that gallant Army of private soldiers who have borne "the burden and heat of the day," who have pressed forward with the indomitable will of the white soldier to so many glorious victories, and won such imperishable honor. I protest against it as but a part of your general policy which seeks by the force of power to extinguish every vestige of the old Republic of our fathers, wild, reckless, impracticable. I protest against it in the name of a distracted and bleeding country, which, struggling with defiant treason, and demanding prudence and patriotism in the conduct of its affairs, and the noblest incentives to constancy and courage, receives at your hands only the paralyzing counsels of fanaticism and passion.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had approved and signed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 67) to increase temporarily the duties on imports;

An act (H. R. No. 367) to provide for the collection of hospital dues from vessels of the United States sold or transferred in foreign ports or waters;

An act (H. R. No. 62) fixing certain rules and regulations for preventing collisions on the waters; and

An act (H. R. No. 408) for the relief of postmasters who have been robbed by the confederate forces or rebel guerrillas.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS obtained the floor.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me for a moment, I desire an opportunity of saying a word in reference to the question I put to the gentleman from Indiana, and which he declined to answer either in the affirmative or negative. I do not propose to allow this matter to go to the country with the statement of the gentleman from Indiana upon it, diametrically opposed as it is to the facts of the case.

General Jackson had the reputation in his day of being a statesman and a patriot, a genuine and not a bogus Democrat. The word Democrat with him meant something, and it did not mean the Democracy of the present day. General Jackson in his day knew something—although he lived in a slave State—of the value of negro soldiers as well as white soldiers, and he placed them upon an equality as to pay and rations. And no man who knows anything about the history of his country or has any care for justice or veracity will dare to deny it.

Now, sir, these being the facts, as they are recorded in history, every sensible man and every honest man will acknowledge the wisdom of the course which he pursued. And are we to be lectured here because we propose to place them to-day exactly where the old hero of the Hermitage placed them in 1814? No, sir; the good sense and patriotism of this country are in favor of placing them just where he placed them, and that is what I hope this Congress will not fail to do. And these negroes, who are being fed and clothed by the Government, are not fed and clothed by it because they are the wives and children of negro soldiers, but because it is an act of humanity to keep them from starving. They are not fed because they are black, because in the region where they are fed the white people are taken care of by the Government just as well as the negroes are, if not a great deal better.

Now, as to the argument whether they are equal to white men, it has nothing to do with this question. White men are not equal physically or mentally or in any other respect whatever; and as to this law making them equal to white men, so far as we are concerned on this side of the House, I will say that we are not afraid of it. I will tell the gentleman and those who sympathize with him, who, notwithstanding the few advantages of education that negroes have had, have a big scare upon them that they will get ahead of the white race, that we do not believe they will, even if we put them into the Army at thirteen dollars per month.

Mr. GARFIELD. In order that I may not embarrass action on the resolution adopted this morning on my motion, I withdraw the request I then made. I made it because I had already a great deal of work to do. I leave the matter with the Speaker.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I do not see any particular reason for excitement in discussing the present question. I know it is natural for some gentlemen on the other side of the House who are interested in the institution of slavery to become excited, and therefore it is not to me at all surprising. It is the last convulsive spasm of the struggle which I have seen going on for twenty years on this floor, of a power which dominated this Union, and which I never expected to live to see conquered. But my life has been spared to see it subdued, exhausted, and trembling in the last agonies of death as we have seen to-day. I do not think it strange, nor do I reproach it for that last natural convulsive effort which we have seen to-day. It ought to affect but a few, and it does affect but a few.

But, sir, I shall try to confine myself to the question in hand, and not follow the wild rambling of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and other gentlemen, who have gone away from the question to inquire into the robbery of property—that is, slaves—of those gentlemen who have been oppressors so long that they are unwilling to come down to the democratic level of freemen who tolerate freedom.

Sir, the question now is whether the soldiers of the United States, who wear the livery of the Union, who march under the banner of the Union, who, in common with the armies of the Union, expose themselves in the battle and to death, shall be placed on an equality, or whether in that position and under that glorious flag we are to keep up the distinctions which have been the infamy and disgrace of the Union and the age, and which existed when slavery did. I take it for granted that the day has passed when any man, who is not either a lover of slavery or a demagogue, will attempt to maintain the position that any of the soldiers who bear their arms in battle shall be treated as inferior to any other men who stand up by their side. I care not whether the soldiers are of Milesian, Teutonic, African, or Anglo-Saxon descent. I despise the principle that would make a difference between them in the hour of battle and of death. The idea that we are to keep up that distinction is abhorrent to the feelings of the age, is abhorrent to the feelings of humanity, is shocking to every decent instinct of our nature; and I take it that no man who is not wedded to the institution of slavery, or does not foster it for the sake of power, will go with the gentleman from Indiana.

Sir, why should they not be all paid alike? Why should they not all be clothed alike? Why should they not be all armed alike? Why should they not all charge the rebels alike, and die alike in defense of the Union? Because they are of different descent. Why did you put it upon the mere complexion, and not upon the nationality? Indeed, sir, if any were to have a preference over others in pay and in inducements to join the service, it ought to be that class of men whose perils are greatest when they go into our Army. The black man knows when he goes there that his dangers are greater than the white man's. He runs not only the risk of being killed in battle, but the certainty, if taken prisoner, of being slaughtered instead of being treated as a prisoner of war. And these are the men that the gentleman from Indiana would degrade, and sink, and treat differently from those who, when they are taken, are treated as prisoners of war and their lives spared. Sir, I will make no distinction. If black men, knowing, as they do, their greater peril, will consent to fight at our sides, die in our stead, and save our brethren and sons and fathers from slaughter, although I would make no distinction in pay and rations, yet I cannot fail to award to them equal, if not more, honor than to those who, from their social position and the certainty of their position when they go into battle, have more inducements to defend their country. If there is to be any distinction anywhere, it should be in favor of the black man.

Does the gentleman from Indiana pretend that these colored soldiers, who have already appeared in arms and fought, have not fought as gallantly and died as freely as our own white brethren? The records of all battles in which they have been engaged would give him the lie if he dared to say so. At Fort Hudson, at Fort Wagner, and wherever they have been engaged, the uniform testimony is that they have been no less gallant, no less brave, no less faithful, than the white men who fought by their side. And yet this infamous and degrading distinction is sought to be kept up between men who thus fight and thus die and the white soldiers. Let not this nation for a moment sanction it. Let it not go forth as the opinion of this House that the black man or the red man or any other man who bears our arms and fights for our liberty is not to be treated like every other man. But the gentleman says we are discriminating against the white man. He thinks so, no doubt, but he thinks a thing that is not. There is no such discrimination anywhere. By the section under consideration we put, from the 1st of January, all men of all colors, black and white, married and unmarried, upon precisely the same footing. We do not legislate in regard to their families nor with regard to their wives.

I heard it said here, much to my astonishment, that the reason why we should not give black men the same chance with white men is because by some of their infernal laws the black man who is married to a black woman is not married, but that the marriage is a nullity, and those infernal laws, which ought to be scouted by every Christian man, are brought forward here as an excuse for not treating the black man as we treat the white man.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not attribute any such view as that to me.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not attribute that language to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GANSON. I presume the gentleman refers to me.

Mr. STEVENS. I refer to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GANSON. I made that point upon the subject of reserving a portion of the money appropriated to the soldiers for the support of these women and children, and I did it for the reason that they had not a legal claim upon the head of the family, under the law as it exists.

Mr. STEVENS. Then the gentleman was not speaking to the amendment. The amendment had no reference to that, nor did the gentleman move any such amendment.

Mr. GANSON. My colleague from New York informed me that there was such a provision in this bill; but he now says, after examining the matter, that it is in another bill. I should have moved it if I had supposed it was not in this bill, because I think it is a proper provision, and I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania concurs with me on that point.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no doubt it might be proper to have a provision by which a certain portion should be reserved, not because they are their wives and children, but because they are less provident in attending to them; and for the further reason that while at home the cities, towns, and townships make provision for white men's wives, they make none for black men's wives.

But, sir, why does the gentleman from Indiana say that we discriminate in favor of the black man? Because, he says, that in these contraband camps we support the wives of these black soldiers independent of their pay. Sir, I know not how that is. I do know that they are set to work and expected to pay their way, and I do know further that regulations have been made by which the contrabands who are soldiers contribute a portion of their pay to the support of their families. There is no such discrimination. It is a false position; undoubtedly an innocent mistake of the gentleman from Indiana, who wants to get up a clamor that we are discriminating against white men. We are attempting to put both classes upon a perfect equality in our Army, and the gentleman mistakes the American heart when he says that this will be looked upon abroad in the country with disgust and dislike.

I remember when first the question was raised in this Hall about arming black men how scenes occurred far worse than the scene we have witnessed here to-day. All sides were a little tainted then with the miasma—well I do not know what to call it, but it was said that it would not do, and I remember it was said upon this floor that a distinguished gentleman from Illinois, General Logan, had stated that his soldiers would lay down their arms if negroes were enlisted. He may have said so, but I do know that that same gentleman a year and a half ago took the stump, in company with Adjutant General Thomas, and traversed the valley of the Mississippi, making speeches in favor of the liberation of the slaves and of arming them against their masters. I do know that, for I have seen his speeches, and have heard him say that his whole view was changed, that no soldiers fought better than the negroes, and that there was no prejudice against them in the Army.

Mr. GANSON. I would ask the gentleman if he has a provision in this bill opening the door to the promotion of colored soldiers? I understand that under the existing regulations they do not commission any of these black soldiers. I would like to know why that discrimination is made?

Mr. STEVENS. There is nothing relating to that question in this bill. We have not deemed it imperative to make any provision on that subject. We leave it to the sound discretion of a very discreet Executive.

Mr. GANSON. Who is the person to whom the gentleman alludes?

Mr. STEVENS. A person the gentleman has heard of and will hear of again for four or five years to come. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I do not want to go on and discuss this question. I remember that when I first moved something of this kind in this House it got but thirty votes. That day, thank God, has passed. The day of liberty, of universal liberty, has dawned upon the country, and, thank God, it is growing brighter and brighter and will be until no man will rise here and talk about "stealing" his property in slaves. Men will be ashamed that they ever had anything to do with the institution.

The reason why negroes heretofore have been allowed but ten dollars a month is because the Department has misconstrued the law. We passed an act in 1862 authorizing the President to employ contrabands. We did it very gingerly. We had to wrap it up in such a way that the gentleman from Indiana could not use it before his constituents. [Laughter.] We did not say that they should be used as soldiers at all. We authorized the Executive to employ them in and about the Army in such way as he might deem best, and pay them ten dollars a month. That was not making soldiers of them. We intended that, but we only referred then to the contrabands who came over, and who were to be employed and paid ten dollars a month, and then out of that amount the cost of their clothing was deducted, and three dollars more was deducted for some fund—I do not know what it is called. But I never supposed then that if we went on to arm the free people of color they were not to be put upon the same footing with the whites. That law was intended to apply only to contrabands, who could not complain considering the great boon they received in their freedom. But the Department construed that law to apply to every colored soldier who was enlisted, which was a great wrong.

Now, sir, the Committee of Ways and Means propose to go a little further than the Senate; and we have provided in a subsequent amendment that where freedmen have been enlisted, no matter when, their pay and emoluments shall refer to the time of their enlistment; and where contrabands are enlisted we deduct from them the bounty, supposing that their freedom is a sufficient equivalent for the bounty. I think that these provisions ought to be made. I admire the conduct of the fifty-fourth Massachusetts regiment, which, when it was offered by the government of that State the difference of pay between ten and thirteen dollars a month refused to take it from the State government; and I am informed that they never have received it to this day. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] inform me how that is?

Mr. DAWES. They have never received it.

Mr. STEVENS. And when Massachusetts, with her usual liberality, offered to make up the difference, and pay it to those who marched from her soil and under her banner, they refused, with a magnanimity and a spirit which would do credit even to the men of Indiana, to take it; and they refuse to take it to this day, and I honor them for that. I beg pardon of the House for saying so much on this subject.

CHARGES AGAINST TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Messrs. GARFIELD, WILSON, BROOKS, DAVIS of Maryland, STUART, FENTON, DAWSON, JENCKES, and STEELE of New Jersey, a special committee under the resolution adopted to-day for investigating charges against the Treasury Department.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to modify my amendment by increasing the soldiers' pay to eighteen dollars a month.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the fact that we are at this late day discussing the proposition before us, that of giving equal pay, rations, clothing, and arms to all our soldiers without regard to their complexion, is pregnant evidence of the terrible weight of prejudice which has clouded the judgment and conscience of the American people. It, however, gives us hope that that prejudice is disappearing, and that peace will soon come to our country and prosperity thenceforth abide within its borders. But for our pride of race and prejudice against color we would not now be providing the means to carry on a war. I allude not to the fatal truth that despots in the South and demagogues in the North fostered this prejudice, and found in it the means of inducing a people devoted to personal liberty to acquiesce in, and in some instances to battle for the extension of the area and the perpetuation of human slavery. No, sir, I pass by the question of the cause of the war, and say that but for our unchristian contempt for the colored race we would now be at peace; that the authority of our Government would have long since been reestablished over all our territory; or that if the spirit of the rebellion had still required to be repressed by the presence of military power, an army of disciplined freedmen would have relieved the men of the North of the duty of maintaining it, and permitted them to return to their families and the profitable avocations of peaceful life. Has not our prejudice furnished men, money, and supplies to our enemy, while enfeebling our Army, restraining it from action, and paralyzing a large part of our naval power? The cry that the war was no longer for the Constitution, but had been perverted into a war for the negro, has had but little influence in preventing brave and loyal men from rallying "round the flag."

I allude not to that mere hiss of a venomous serpent, but to the fact that but for this pervading and controlling prejudice we would have long since drawn from the laborers of the South an army of three hundred thousand men. This prejudice it was that prevented the country from demanding of the President an early proclamation promising freedom and protection to all loyal people of the South who might make their way to our lines, and arms to such as would enter our service. The demoniac howl that went forth at Fremont's order was but an expression of the prejudice the prevalence of which made Cameron's proposition to arm slaves impracticable and constrained the disbanding of the regiment of colored men enlisted by General Hunter. In those days men would rather die or give their sons victims to the pestilential swamp or battle-field than accept the idea that the negro was fit to be a free-man or a soldier. Congress, slowly escaping from this prejudice, halted in its great duty, and our good and sagacious President could not see a "military necessity" in a measure which he was led to believe would demoralize the Army and arrest enlistments. Meanwhile the men who would so gladly have earned their freedom by serving us were coffed and driven South to raise supplies for the rebel army, to labor in forge and foundry, to dig trenches and rear breastworks, and to man guns aimed at those whose presence among them they were ready to hail as a Heaven-granted blessing.

Sir, the sailor who enters our Navy gets no bounty. He accepts the chance for prize money as its fair equivalent; yet a few weeks ago we passed an act authorizing the transfer to the Navy of twelve thousand soldiers to whom we had given Government and municipal bounties. It was not that they could be spared from the Army; for while the measure was under consideration, or about that time, the President issued a call for two hundred thousand more soldiers. I marked the coincidence, and thought that God was thus teaching us the folly, the stupid, wicked folly of yielding to that prejudice which gentlemen on the other side of the House are now striving so ingeniously to exasperate. At the time we passed that act the press of the country was denouncing the inefficiency of the blockade and proclaiming the relative cheapness and abundant supply of foreign goods in confederate ports, and steamers and monitors which might have made the blockade effective lay at rented wharves in northern ports, the Department being unable to procure sailors to man them. No one will deny that the negro makes a good sailor. He seems to have a natural aptitude for the profession. You find him in the merchantmen of all nations, and he is welcomed by officers and men on all our national vessels. In this branch of the service negroes have always been employed, and our naval records vindicate them abundantly from the charge of cowardice with which honorable gentlemen on this floor so meanly asperse them. They constituted a large part of every crew our Department sent forth in the war of 1812, and their courage, as the records prove, did much to add that effulgence to the stars of our flag in the light of which the "meteor flag of England" paled and grew dim. Had we welcomed the slaves of the South to our service, and treated them as men, the sails of our ships would not have flapped idly at city wharves and our country suffered because they were not filled by the free winds of the ocean. When will we learn that the justice of God permits no wrong to go unpunished?

History, it is said, reproduces itself. We speak of coincidences in history, and are often reminded that on the 19th of April, in two great national eras, Massachusetts blood was shed at the opening of great wars; and I may take the liberty, in the course of this discussion, of reminding the House that the first blood shed in each era was that of a negro. The first that flowed in Massachusetts was prior to that which sanctified the plains of Lexington. It was the life-blood of Peter Attucks, a negro man, who died leading a Boston mob against British soldiery; and, as I had occasion to suggest to the House last evening, before the blood of Massachusetts had dyed the streets of Baltimore that of a negro man, Nicholas Biddle, hastening with less than five hundred volunteers from Pennsylvania to the defense of this capital, had stained the streets of that city through which the little column marched.

It may be a mere coincidence; but these certainly are facts which it becomes a body of legislators, who profess to believe that "all men are created equal," to bear in mind. They are facts which should have done something to remove the prejudice which has cursed us so heavily, especially within the last three years, almost as heavily, indeed, as it has cursed the five million colored Americans against whom it operates.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] tells us that he does not think that negro troops ought ever to have been enlisted. Sir, does he still think that the rebellion would have been feeble with twelve million people to sustain it than we have found it with but eight millions? Does he believe that it were better to-day that the one hundred and thirty thousand negro soldiers who are in arms to fight the rebels should be in arms to fight our sons and brothers and friends? I ask him to explain whether his sympathies are with the white men in the North or are with the rebels in arms against their country. Why should these one hundred and thirty thousand fighting men be handed over to the other side, or be deducted from our strength? There is not, sir, in the ranks of our Army a soldier who will agree with the gentleman from Indiana. There is not a mother at home, praying night and morning for the welfare of her first boy on the field, who does not thank God that there are in the Army with him one hundred and thirty thousand men whom the gentleman from Indiana would transfer to the enemy, or doom to inaction. There is not a man who loves his country who will not arraign the patriotism of one who would strike such a force from our ranks, whether he would absolutely hand it over to the enemy or not. They ought not to have been enlisted, says the gentleman; and they have not been used so as to protect our soldiers. Ah! sir, if his son or brother be in the Army, or if the sons and brothers of his friends are there, they will rejoice that the honors of Milliken's Bend, Port Hudson, Fort Wagner, and Olustee were won by colored regiments, and not by those to which they were attached. Whose blood would the gentleman from Indiana have desired to see shed there? Will he tell his constituents that the men from his district should have kept the negro safe from the batteries of Wagner and Hudson and Olustee? Will he go into his district and complain that they were not Indiana troops who were hacked to death, crucified, and burned in Fort Pillow? No, sir, he will not so argue to his constituents. When he confronts them on this subject he will cavil, he will qualify, he will explain, he will protest that the report which will go forth is garbled; that in his opinion it is well to use the negro to save the white man; that he rejoices that other men, men of darker hue than his friends and constituents, were put into the imminent deadly breach on those occasions.

It is well that we have enlisted these men. They have been used for the protection of white men, for the protection of the white man's Government, for the protection of the white man's flag, and when so used have fought gloriously in the hope of removing from the mind and heart of the white men of America, who have mind and heart, that prejudice which while it has oppressed them has cursed those whom it has controlled.

Sir, when it was talked of enlisting negro soldiers we were told on the other side of the House that it would reduce our great army—then under command of General McClellan—to the condition of Falstaff's ragged corps; that white soldiers would lay down their arms; that the announcement that we would permit negroes to bear arms would assure the success of the rebellion by a general exhibition of treason and desertion on the part of our armies. They were fools or traitors who believed that the hatred of our soldiers of the negro was more intense than their love of their country.

Tell me, you, or any of you who witnessed the passage of Burnside's splendid corps through this city the other day, whether you wished those eight thousand stalwart men of African descent were not in the Army. Tell me whether, as they marched down the broad streets, crowds of the wounded and maimed soldiers of the veteran reserve corps did not cheer them on. Tell me which of you did not admire the cheerfulness with which they marched toward the field which has been so fatal to those of their race who have been permitted to precede them. Tell me whether picked men from all your States are not ready to take command among them. I do not believe that able and tried soldiers are anxious to move at the head of a column of cowards, and I know that in our Philadelphia school for the instruction of officers for these regiments the gentleman's State is largely represented by men who are used to the whistling of the rifle-ball and the boom and roar of the cannon. Two, at least, of the Indiana soldiers who graduated there had received the sanguinary baptism of battle at Pea Ridge.

The gentleman talks about the courage of these people, and doubts it. Sir, has he slept from the beginning of this war? Has he read no page of martial history? He says they will degrade our Army. Will he tell us what influence the Turks have exercised upon the armies of France? Will he tell us what influence the Sepoys have exercised upon the army of Great Britain? Will he enlighten us as to the complexion of the British, French, and Dutch armies in the West Indies? They are negroes, negroes all. And, sir, it is impossible to conceive that mere ignorance or prejudice against the negro alone would exclude him from our Army and Navy. The opposition to this measure, conceal the fact as gentlemen may, springs from sympathy with the rebellion or blind devotion to human slavery. It is a shrewd device by which it is hoped to impose such grievous burdens upon the people of the North as will make them yield to suggestions of peace. It can come from no other motive than love of slavery or sympathy with the so-called confederacy.

Mr. Speaker, the men of this era of whom the poet will sing in highest strains, the men whom the orator will most eulogize, the men in this grand civil war of whom the historian will write his most glowing panegyrics, are the negro soldiers of the loyal Army. I never see a wounded soldier that I do not honor him. I cannot behold a column of citizen soldiers moving over yonder bridge or embarking for the field of battle without the tenderest emotions. I read the story of the battle-fields enriched by the blood of the cultivated, beautiful, and brave, and my heart swells with pride as I contemplate the gallantry of our countrymen. But white men fight for their country, for the glorious traditions of their ancestors, for their homes, their wives, and their children. Not so with the poor negro of the southern States. He has no country, and wanting that, lacks all else.

I hail it as a sign of progress that gentlemen on the other side of the House talk to-day of a slave's wife and children. Oh! have three years brought you so far forward that you behold in the mother of a slave's child a woman and a possible wife? Have three years of terrible war brought you so far forward that in that little breathing, immortal being you see the child and not the chattel? Who will deny that we are making progress? It may be slow, but when you admit that they are wife and child it shows that some little progress has been made where, judging by the light of experience, it would be least expected.

Sir, I found in a paper from my city, the Press of yesterday, the story of the death of one with whom I played in the earliest days of my childhood of which memory has a hold. We were then younger than the light-haired child that stands by the corner of the Clerk's desk. He grew to manhood an elegant gentleman; he was skilled in art and gifted with a rare voice, and a proficient in music. His education was liberal, and his manners and tone those of a gentleman. In early manhood he found admission to society from which his wife and sisters, who, though worthy, well educated, and well bred as he, were excluded. They could suggest that their father was a soldier of the revolutionary army and had endured the horrors of the British prison-ship, and point with just pride to his high standing as a man of enterprise and probity during the many years in which he was a leading sail-maker of what was then the first commercial port of the country; and they could speak of the incidents of foreign travel; but they were, in the estimation of people like the gentleman from Indiana, incapable of the courtesies of life, and of a race that is deficient in courage. To escape from degradation he went to London and engaged in business, and was prosperous. I ask the Clerk to read why he returned, where he is, and how he was borne thither.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"A SOLDIER'S FUNERAL.—The military escort which surrounds the hearse, bearing through our streets to the grave the body of one who has died in the service of his country, has familiarized the people with the last form of respect that is given to a soldier's memory. Yesterday, military ceremonies and honors were paid for the first time in this city to the remains of a colored man. The body of Robert Bridges Forten, late sergeant major forty-third regiment United States colored troops, was deposited in the family vault in the cemetery attached to St. Thomas's church, Fifth below Walnut street, with military honors. Sixteen of his late comrades, commanded by a sergeant, formed the funeral escort, and fired the three volleys of musketry over his grave prescribed by the Army regulations.

"Sergeant Major Forten was the son of the late James Porton, so long and so favorably known in this community, especially to the merchants and mariners of our city. He was liberally educated. For several years past he resided in London, and was a commercial agent for an extensive stationery house in the Poultry. On observing that the Government had summoned the colored race to arms, and was organizing a colored army for the defense of the Union and the salvation of liberty itself, he at once canceled his business engagements in England and hastened to this his native city to offer his services to his country. Finding that by the existing laws he could not be commissioned an officer to command colored troops, though qualified by education and peculiarly fitted by general character for such a responsible position, he resolved to enlist as a private. When counseled to reflect again on his determination, and advised that his age, about fifty years, made it doubtful whether he could undergo the fatigues and privations of the service, that his education was vastly superior to his fellow-soldiers, that his habits and associations were strikingly dissimilar, and that no consideration or allowance could be given to these peculiarities, he replied that the reasons urged why he should not go into the service, with the exception of the one regarding his age, were incentives for him to volunteer. His country, he said, asked her colored children to rally to her defense, and those of them who had been blessed with education should be foremost in responding to the call. Actuated by these patriotic motives, he enlisted in the forty-third regiment, in which his talents were soon remarked, and he was made sergeant major. He was soon detailed on special service and ordered to report to Colonel S. M. Bowman, chief master and recruiting officer for colored troops for the State of Maryland. He entered into the business of recruiting in that State with intense zeal, and showed ability of the highest order. In the many speeches he made to the colored men of Baltimore, and by his logic, his eloquence, and his example, he largely contributed to the great success which has attended Colonel Bowman's efforts to raise colored troops in Maryland. That officer, in reporting to the Philadelphia supervisory committee, commended him as a soldier and a gentleman. Impelled by zealous devotion to the cause of his race and his country, he exerted himself beyond his powers of endurance, and, when attacked by sickness, it was soon seen that his prolonged labors had undermined his constitution. He died suddenly with dyspepsia. He leaves a wife and boy in London, and a daughter, a teacher in the camp of the freedmen at Port Royal."

Mr. KELLEY. Sir, among the colored men of the North—

Mr. CRAVENS. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not wonder that the gentleman wants the House to adjourn, but I decline to yield.

Sir, as I was about to remark, among the colored men of the North there are many other instances like that of the playmate of my young childhood. Men of high culture and considerable estates, men of refinement and accomplishments, who at ten dollars per month, and with no chance of promotion, have hurried into the ranks of our Army to fight for the preservation of a country, the logic of whose institutions assures freedom at some future day to their posterity and race. They have gone relying on the justice of the American people for the just reward of their valor and patriotism. Surely such men will be remembered in song and history.

But the four millions of the South fight without a country, without a home, without a family; nay, such are the blessings of the institution of slavery which the gentleman from Kentucky so lauds, that they have not even been permitted to have a name lest it might tempt them to think of securing a home and maintaining the integrity of their family. Sir, home and family are very dangerous to such despotism as has prevailed in the South.

Mr. CLAY. As the gentleman seems anxious to hear me, I will interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. KELLEY. Be brief.

Mr. CLAY. The gentleman seems to be a profound scholar of history. He knows the history apparently of all the nations of the earth, and of every individual in those nations. But he seems to be deficient in the history of his own State. I refer him back to the war of 1812-14. The State of Pennsylvania as well as other States sent brave troops to fight the British, but when these troops reached the northern part of our territory, near the lakes, there was a question raised about State lines and State boundaries.

Mr. KELLEY. As that was before my birth I do not remember about it.

Mr. CLAY. I want to inform the gentleman, and he refuses to yield for the purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. It has no pertinency to the pending question.

Mr. STEVENS. I should like to know whether the negroes or the white men raised that question?

Mr. CLAY. I am coming to that.

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to yield further. I never heard that my State had any negroes in the Army in 1812, and we are now discussing the conduct and capabilities of that race. I say that the gentleman lauds the institution of slavery—

Mr. CLAY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will hear the sentence I am about to utter, perhaps there will be no necessity for him to interrupt me.

Mr. CLAY. They are putting the negroes of Kentucky under people who are cheating them of half their earnings. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] admitted it was probably true.

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to yield further. The gentleman's rambling remarks have nothing to do with the question under consideration. In the general discussion he complained of the treatment the freedmen are receiving at the hands of Government officials and others who employ them. He says these people cheat them out of half their earnings. I fear this may be true; and to prevent it I have implored Congress to establish a Freedmen's Bureau. But it is apparent that the gentleman's sympathies are not excited by the wrongs perpetrated on the poor negroes. His complaint is not that they are cheated out of half their earnings, but that it is done by "thieves," "robbers," "scoundrels," and other official personages who have relieved them from slavery—a system which, under color of law, cheated them out of all their earnings, and appropriated their babes as chattels for the market. Unhappy as their present condition may be, it does leave them at least the ownership of the children of their loins; it does secure them transportation beyond the lines of their former owners' plantation; and it does open the way through freedom to a better life to those of the race who have capacity and energy and feel the glow of emulation. It is too late for the gentleman to hope to make converts by sounding the praises of slavery in comparison with any phase of freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that when we remember the cool and determined courage with which these men, without country, home, family, or name, save such as Tom, Jim, or Dick, fight without pay, and in the face of almost certain death, for the flag and institutions which inspire their poor hearts with hope for their race, we cannot doubt that the poet, orator, and historian will find inspiration in their unselfish devotion to a great cause. But dark will be the colors in which they will paint the actions of those who, while accepting the services of such heroes, would withhold from them the recognition of their common humanity. Let such men not hope that posterity will fail to do them justice too.

The bill before us is the more important because our enemies are fiendishly discriminating against negro soldiers. They deny the colored prisoner of war all the rights of a soldier; they murder him in cold blood, and then turn to us and cite our example in proof of the propriety of the prejudice that governs them. "Why," say they, "shall we recognize the negro as a soldier entitled to equality with our men while the Congress of the United States, the War Department, and the President withhold from them such recognition? They make them fight without equal pay, and without hope of rank, and who shall brand us for discriminating against them in pursuance of such precedents as these?"

To obliterate this unjust and odious distinction is our privilege. Gentlemen on the other side of the House may consistently vote for its continuance; but the power of the House and the responsibility is with us of the Republican side, and should we fail to recognize the common manhood of our soldiers the page of history which records our failure will be one the perusal of which will suffuse the cheeks of children with the burning blush of shame.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a verbal correction. On page 7 of the bill, in line eight, the word "army" should read "arms," and a comma should be inserted after it; so that the clause will read, "manufacture of arms, accouterments," &c.

The SPEAKER. This is in the text of the bill which has been agreed upon by both branches of Congress, and the Chair knows no way in which it can be changed. The question has been so ruled in the other end of the Capitol, and the Chair is of opinion that it cannot be touched.

Mr. MORRILL. I have received a notice from the Senate that it ought to be amended.

The SPEAKER. It might be made as an amendment and the Senate asked to concur in it.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that amendment, as it is very important that it should be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection; and a message will be sent to the Senate, with a request to make the change in that way.

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish to say a word by way of correction of the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Williams.] He stated what I have heard frequently stated upon the floor, and what I have seen stated in the public prints of the country, that the first man whose blood was shed in this war was from the State of Massachusetts. Now, sir, no man honors the State of Massachusetts more than I do, but she can well afford, her quiver is so full of glorious arrows, to give to the little State of New Hampshire the glory which belongs to her. The man who first poured out his blood in this contest, and who enlisted in a Massachusetts regiment in the city of Lowell, was a brave boy of the little town of Alexandria in my district; and when his remains were borne homeward to the spot which he glorified, they were deposited in the quiet little churchyard of his native village in New Hampshire.

I merely wished to utter these words of explanation, because I believe it is due to my own State, and she should not be robbed of that glory by another.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have modified my amendment, which was to strike out the word "pay," by moving to strike out the word "pay" and all that follows it in that section, and inserting the following:

As other soldiers in the regular or volunteer service: Provided, however, that the pay of the private soldier of the Army shall be twenty dollars per month from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, with a corresponding increase in the pay of the non-commissioned officers.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest that this has nothing to do with fixing the pay of the regular Army.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now regards the amendment as out of order from the fact that it changes the existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is too late to raise that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not state that it is too late, because he has but just modified his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The provision from the Senate also changes the existing law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is probably aware, from his long service here, that in the Senate it is allowable under their rules that amendments changing existing laws shall be offered when reported by a standing committee of that body. But in the House of Representatives we act under a different rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. But when the Senate makes a change in the existing law is not a modification founded upon that change in order?

The SPEAKER. An amendment offered here must be in accordance with the rules of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must, although reluctantly, take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, upon the ground that if the Senate has a right to insert in such a bill as this a legislative provision affecting an existing law, certainly the House must have a right to amend the provision they insert.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is placed here to enforce the rules of the House and not those of the Senate. He decides, according to the rules of the House, that the amendment is not in order, as it changes the existing law. From that decision the gentleman from Indiana appeals, and the question is: "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer that the appeal should be voted on directly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This will be a test vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair will allow me to state that my point of order is that if the Senate can change an existing law, the House may modify the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. COX. That is to say, if the amendment offered in the House be germane to that of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is here to administer the rules of the House, and the rules of the House, differing from the rules of the Senate, provide that amendments changing existing laws are not in order on appropriation bills.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 95, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Furnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenekes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Knapp, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Anos Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Flinn, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Law, Le Blond, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Noble, John O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, and Stiles—25.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ELDRIDGE stated that Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, was detained from the House by sickness in his family.

Mr. COX announced that Mr. PENDLETON had paired off with Mr. KASSON.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now renew my original motion to strike out the word "pay."

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether the gentleman can renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the motion still pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demanded the previous question. The gentleman from Indiana modified his amendment, and the Chair ruled it out of order. From that decision the gentleman appealed, and the appeal has been laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I asked leave to modify it, and the Chair did not receive the modification.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion. It is to strike out the word "pay."

Mr. STEVENS. That original motion was modified and a new one was made, which has been ruled out of order, and of course he cannot now go back to the first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana was correct in his statement. He originally moved to strike out the word "pay" and then he sought to modify it. The Chair pronounced the modification out of order, and from that decision the gentleman from Indiana appealed. The decision of the Chair was sustained; and therefore the original amendment remained.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire to make some little explanation in reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Ohio will renew the motion for the previous question, I will withdraw it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will renew it. Mr. Speaker, observing that this relates to equalizing the pay of soldiers of the Army, gentlemen have come to my desk repeatedly to inquire about the bill, supposing that it emanates from the Committee on Military Affairs. I have been asked, too, in the same connection why, if it were a bill coming from the Committee on Military Affairs, there was nothing contained in it about increasing the pay of the soldiers generally. I will take advantage of the permission given me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to explain the status of this question, as it presents itself now before the House.

The Senate passed a bill (No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers of the United States Army. That bill on reaching this House was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. We reported it back yesterday with some modification of the sections relating to the equalization of the pay of the colored troops with that of the whites, and appended to it several other sections increasing the pay of all the soldiers of the Army, and providing for some other matters in connection with Army pay. The Senate growing impatient, perhaps, for action on bill No. 145, has taken that same bill which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs in the House and has attached it to the Army appropriation bill. And thus it is that this subject comes before the House now from the Committee of Ways and Means as an amendment to the amendment made by the Senate.

As this whole subject has been before the Committee on Military Affairs, and as that committee has discussed and considered and reported upon it, I propose, with the leave of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to take so much of this bill which was reported back yesterday as covers this very ground, as embodies in the main what is here before us to-day, and move it as a substitute for these three sections which the Senate has put in this bill as part of its amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Being interested in the proposition, I would like to know from the gentleman from Ohio how he proposes to get it in.

Mr. SCHENCK. By being permitted to offer it as a substitute.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think not. I was prepared for that exception, and as I saw that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had caught my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] I fell back upon the bill, and propose my amendment as a substitute for the original text.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the amendment may be germane to the eighth amendment of the Senate, but it is the sixth that is now under consideration.

Mr. SCHENCK. This sixth amendment consists of what are called sections two, three, and four. I propose to strike out these sections two, three, and four, and to insert the matter we have reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is not correct. The House has not reached the fourth section. That is the eighth amendment of the Senate. We are now considering the sixth amendment, which ends at the close of the second section.

Mr. SCHENCK. Am I to understand that there is no possibility of reaching by any action these subsequent sections?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, when we reach them. The House has considered five amendments, and is now considering the sixth.

Mr. SCHENCK. Does the previous question apply to all of the amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood it only to apply to the sixth amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not make that distinction. I supposed I was moving the previous question on all the amendments.

The SPEAKER. That would cut off the gentleman from Ohio from offering his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. By an arrangement with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means it was understood that the Committee on Military Affairs should have the opportunity of presenting such modifications as they have agreed on to the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will call the previous question only upon this amendment of the Senate the gentleman from Ohio will then have an opportunity of presenting his amendment to the eighth amendment of the Senate, to which it properly applies. The sixth amendment of the Senate now is only under consideration.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the Chair be kind enough to state what this sixth amendment is?

The SPEAKER. It has been reported by the Clerk.

Mr. SCHENCK. What does it include?

The SPEAKER. A variety of appropriations of various kinds.

Mr. SCHENCK. Does it involve what is designated there as section two of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SCHENCK. And it applies to nothing else?

The SPEAKER. Nothing else.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House (No. 371) for the relief of the settlers upon certain lands in California, without amendment.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (No. 185) to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States at Dalles City, in the State of Oregon; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman has, in my judgment, one very obnoxious feature in it; but I am willing to submit it to the vote of the House. I will therefore consider his amendment as in, and call the previous question upon it.

Mr. SCHENCK. We propose but one amendment to the sixth amendment of the Senate; and that is, to strike out the word "January" and insert the word "May." Having provided for this equalization, but the matter having gone on until the present time without its being a provision of law, we thought it better that it should commence at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly thinks that would be pertinent to the amendment that is now pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. To obviate that objection, then, I will move to strike out the whole section, and to insert in its place the same section with the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. SHANNON. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the demand for the previous question to enable the gentleman from Ohio to offer his amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think the House ought to adopt the amendment, but as the gentleman desires it I am willing a vote should be taken upon it.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I rise to a question of order. Does not this amendment involve a change of the existing law?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will state to the gentleman that it is precisely the same with the alteration of a single word.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. And I submit that that single word changes the existing law, and therefore renders the amendment out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is germane for the reason that it is precisely the amendment of the Senate with the exception of changing the word "January" to "May." The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana changed the pay of a different class of soldiers from that provided for by the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I do not wish to discuss the question, but I understood the Chair to state in respect to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana that the word "May" could not be substituted for "January."

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so state. The Chair stated that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana changed the existing law, but the Chair now decides that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio changing "January" to "May" is germane, and therefore in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will not undertake to make any further explanation upon that point. I desire to make a single remark to explain why we have not introduced a provision for increasing the pay of all the soldiers. These amendments of the Senate are in reference to the pay of colored troops only. If that portion of the appropriation bill relating to the pay of the soldiers in the Army is again before us for consideration, as it probably will be, we shall then report an amendment in favor of increasing the pay of our Army; therefore I have proposed nothing whatever upon that subject at present. I would like now to have our entire amendment to the remaining amendments of the Senate read for the purpose of saving the necessity of any further explanation in the matter.

The Clerk read, as follows:

That all persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay and emoluments, other than bounty, as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service, from and after the 1st day of May, 1864, and that every person of color who shall hereafter be mustered into the service shall receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding $100.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any colored person enlisted and mustered into service as a volunteer under the call dated October 17, 1863, for three hundred thousand volunteers, who was at the time of enlistment actually enrolled and subject to draft in the State in which he volunteered, shall receive from the United States the same amount of bounty as was paid to white soldiers under said call, not exceeding in any case $100.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in every case where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, that any regiment, or any battery, or any company of cavalry, of colored troops, has been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, under any authorized assurance given by any officer or agent of the United States, or by any Governor of any State, authorized thereto by the President or the Secretary of War, that the non-commissioned officers and privates of such regiment, battery, or company, should be paid the same as other troops of the same arm of the service, then they shall be so paid for the period of time counting from the date of their being respectively mustered into the service to the 1st day of May, A. D. 1864.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there may be reserved at the discretion of the Secretary of War, and under such regulation as he may prescribe, a portion of the pay of any colored soldier, not exceeding in any case more than one third thereof, to be applied to the support of the family of such soldier, or of other near relatives dependent on him for support.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will be observed that the amendment I have moved has received the assent of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House further than to explain the amendment we propose to the bill of the Senate, and which I have just moved to the pending measure.

In the first section we propose to strike out January, so that the equalization shall commence in May, that is to-morrow, instead of dating it back to January.

In the next section we have moved to amend so as to put it in the singular number instead of the plural number; and at the conclusion of it we move to strike out the words "without regard to color," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "as was paid to white soldiers under said call, not exceeding in any case $100." The bill of the Senate limits it perhaps to $100. It is not certain that it does. It is not certain that under it they may not get $402 and $300 added together. To make that clear we have expressly provided that the bounty shall not in any case exceed $100.

The next section is expressly intended to apply to the regiments which entered the service with the assurance that they would be paid as other troops. I speak of the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts regiments, and the first South Carolina regiment. The Senate provide that—

All persons of color who have been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States shall be entitled to receive the pay and clothing allowed by law to other volunteers in the service, from the date of their muster into the service: Provided, That the same shall have been pledged or promised to them by any officer or person who, in making such pledge or promise, acted by authority of the War Department; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to determine any question of fact arising under this provision.

The Committee on Military Affairs amended that so as to make it provide that—

In every case where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that any regiment, or any battery, or any company of cavalry, of colored troops, has been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, under any authorized assurance given by any officer or agent of the United States, or by any Governor of any State, authorized thereto by the President or the Secretary of War, that the non-commissioned officers and privates of such regiment, battery, or company, should be paid the same as other troops of the same arm of the service, then they shall be so paid for the period of time counting from the date of their being respectively mustered into the service to the 1st day of May, A. D. 1864.

The Committee on Military Affairs have not thought, the Department have not thought, the Senate have not thought it necessary to go back and apply this provision to all the colored troops. There are some particular regiments, batteries, or companies who entered the service under the assurance that they should have the same pay as other troops, and those we want paid. There are a number of negroes who have enlisted—I know it to be the case in Maryland—into the military service on the assurance that they would only receive ten dollars a month, and have not expected any more. But there are regiments who expect more, and which have a right to expect more. The Department, the Senate, and the Committee on Military Affairs have thought that those who had this assurance should be paid; we provide for them and no further.

The next section, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] thinks more objectionable than any other, provides that

There may be reserved, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, and under such regulation as he may prescribe, a portion of the pay of any colored soldier, not exceeding in any case more than one third thereof, to be applied to the support of the family of such soldier, or of other near relatives dependent on him for support.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] in this discussion, thought that that was in the pending amendment from the Senate. He was led into the error, I presume, by hearing that it was in the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. The reason which induced the committee to report that as a modification of this section of the Senate is simply this: while there are a number of colored soldiers who have enlisted in Massachusetts and other free States, and who are able to take care of the money they may receive, there are large numbers who have been recruited in the slave States who are careless, improvident, or so situated that it is thought necessary in their absence that their families should be looked to, and that a portion of their pay should be reserved for that purpose. It is for a guardianship over that class of colored soldiers who come to us frequently from plantations. It is not a subtraction from their pay, but an application of a portion of it for the benefit of their families, which application they are not able to make themselves.

Now, sir, the first question is upon the amendment to the first section to strike out "January" and insert "May," and I shall need make no further explanation when the other questions come up in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Will it be in order by general consent for the gentleman to move what he refers to as a substitute for what was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order, but the amendment reported by the Ways and Means was to the eighth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I will move to strike out the second, third, and fourth amendments, and insert the same matter as modified by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. What I propose is that the vote shall be taken at once upon this substitute.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Unless the amendments are opened to further amendments, I object.

Mr. COX. Give us a vote upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, the previous question upon the sixth amendment of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The first question being on the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN, to strike out the word "pay"—

Mr. ANCONA called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Haw, Hackett, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazaar, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. McKINNEY stated that Mr. J. C. WHITE was detained from the House by sickness.

The question recurring on adopting the substitute offered by Mr. SCHENCK, which was the same as the Senate bill except that the word "January" was changed to "May," the House was divided thereon; and there were—yeas 61, nays 61.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative; and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand tellers upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. DAWSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 58, nays 65.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senate,

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—80.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herlick, Holman, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazaar, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Voorhees, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—49.

So the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ALLISON stated that Mr. KASSON was necessarily absent, and was paired off with Mr. PENLETON.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call the previous question on the balance of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer some amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the previous question long enough to say a single word. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has already submitted to us what he intends as a substitute for the balance of the amendments. I greatly prefer the amendments of the Senate, and I will call the previous question and let the vote on that be a test vote between the two. We may just as well take a test vote in that way as in any other.

Mr. SCHENCK. That will be no test vote. We will all go for the previous question in order that we may get on with our business.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, as the gentleman from Ohio seems anxious to have a vote on his amendments, I suggest to him that he offer them as a whole as a substitute for the balance of the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The only embarrassment about that course is that the Committee of Ways and Means recommend an amendment to the eighth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman can move to strike out the whole of the Senate amendments, and insert his own in place of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that course being pursued?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I am embarrassed to know what to do.

Mr. SCHENCK. Abide by your agreement, and let me offer my amendment. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, let the gentleman offer his amendment, and then I will call the previous question.

The seventh amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons enlisted and mustered into the service as volunteers under the call dated October 17, 1863, for three hundred thousand volunteers who were at the time of enlistment enrolled and subject to draft in the States in which they volunteered, shall receive from the United States the same amount of bounty without regard to color.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following as a substitute for that amendment, to come in after the enacting words:

That any colored person enlisted and mustered into the service as a volunteer under the call dated October 17, 1863, for three hundred thousand volunteers, who was at the time of enlistment actually enrolled and subject to draft in the State in which he volunteered, shall receive from the United States the same amount of bounty as was paid to white soldiers under the said call, not exceeding in any case $100.

Mr. STEVENS. As I do not see any difference between that and the Senate amendment, I am willing that it shall be adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand, if my recollection serves me, that when we passed the enrollment bill there was incorporated into it a provision that the $100 bounty to slaves should be paid to the master.

Now, this amendment, as I understand it, provides that the bounty money shall be paid to the colored man who enlists, not exceeding $100. I want to know whether this is to be in addition to the $100 paid to the master, or whether it is intended to repeal that provision of the enrollment bill which provides for the payment of the $100 to the master. If this is a repeal of that provision, I am for it; if it is an additional bounty of $100, I am against it. I am in favor of paying the bounty to the man who enlists, and not to his master or any other man.

Mr. SCHENCK. My own impression is that this does not interfere with the existing law to which the gentleman has referred. It pays the bounty to volunteers without regard to color.

The amendment which I offer is, I think, clearer and in better shape in the first part of it than the section as it comes from the Senate, so far as the phraseology is concerned; and by distinctly specifying at the close that the bounty shall be limited to $100, it prevents a construction by which volunteers might receive $300 or $402.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to this amendment, and now call the previous question.

Mr. COX. Is it too late to raise a point of order on this last amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. COX. I think the amendment interferes with the existing law.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to raise the point.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his demand for the previous question, in order that I may offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; I cannot.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the amendment offered by Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

The question recurred on the Senate amendment as amended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenekes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perkins, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Ethel B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—78.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Voorhees, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Fernando Wood—51.

So the Senate amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The eighth amendment of the Senate was reported, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all persons of color who have been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States shall be entitled to receive the pay and clothing allowed by law to other volunteers in the service from the date of their muster-in to the service: Provided, That the same shall have been pledged or promised to them by any officer or person who in making such pledge or promise had the authority of the War Department; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to determine any question of fact arising under this provision.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert as follows:

That all free persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall from the date of their enlistment receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay and emoluments, and bounty as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to offer as a substitute for the amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means the following, agreed upon by the Committee on Military Affairs:

That in every case where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, that any regiment, or any battery, or any company of cavalry, of colored troops, has been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, under any authorized assurance given by any officer or agent of the United States, or by any Governor of any State, authorized thereto by the President or the Secretary of War, that the non-commissioned officers and privates of such regiment, battery, or company should be paid the same as other troops of the same arm of the service, then they shall be so paid for the period of time counting from the date of their being respectively mustered into the service to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1864.

That there may be reserved at the discretion of the Secretary of War, and under such regulation as he may prescribe, a portion of the pay of any colored soldier, not exceeding in any case more than one third thereof, to be applied to the support of the family of such soldier, or of other near relatives dependent on him for support.

I propose both of those sections in lieu of the one section reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. The House has already determined to equalize the pay of the colored and the white troops retroactively, beginning on the 1st day of January last. The Committee on Military Affairs preferred that it should begin to-morrow, but the committee was misunderstood, and members seemed to think that it was not in favor of equalizing the pay. The Committee on Military Affairs did propose to equalize the pay, but beginning to-morrow the 1st of May. The House, however, has carried back the principle to the 1st of January. The Committee of Ways and Means proposes now to go still back of the 1st of January, and to pay to all colored troops enlisted in the free States the full pay given to white soldiers from the time of their enlistment. The committee does not even say, from the time of mustering-in, which is, perhaps, what was intended, but proposes to go back in all cases and pay to colored troops enlisted in the free States this full pay from the time of their enlistment. That would exclude all the colored troops enlisted in Maryland, and they would come in only under the January clause. It would exclude all the colored troops from the slave States, who would come only under the January clause.

But what the Committee on Military Affairs propose is not to go behind the 1st of January, or before the 1st of January if you please to call it so, to increase the pay of these colored troops generally, but to go back and increase the pay of those only who were enlisted with the assurance that they were to receive the same pay as white troops. It would include, as I understand, the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts regiments, the first South Carolina, and I think perhaps one battery and one company of cavalry. These are, perhaps, the only ones that were recruited upon the assurance that they should be paid the same as white soldiers, but who have not been so paid. This, then, is the distinction of the Senate in respect to the equalization of their pay. It is, perhaps, justice to the Committee on Military Affairs to say that they were all the time in favor of equalizing the pay of those in military service, and gentlemen who supposed they were not have fallen into a mistake from the fact that we considered it a matter of equal justice to all that the change in the pay of those colored troops should commence with the present time. But now, as the House has decided to go back to the 1st of January, we propose to go to no period antecedent to that time, and in this we agree both with the Senate and the War Department, except where they have enlisted upon the assurance I have suggested. Gentlemen can easily perceive into what difficulties we might be carried by going beyond that. For instance, intelligent and capable colored men have enlisted from Maryland, and there is no reason why they should not receive the same pay as those from Massachusetts and South Carolina, except that they were given the assurance when they enlisted that they should be so paid.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this assurance was made by the General Government or by the States.

Mr. SCHENCK. By the General Government, by officers duly authorized, or by the Governor of some State who had been so authorized by the Government of the United States.

Mr. GANSON. Does the gentleman say that the Governor of Massachusetts was authorized by the General Government to give that assurance?

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that to be the fact. I understand that assurance to have been given upon the authority of the General Government in respect to the two Massachusetts regiments I have named, and the first South Carolina regiment. But we provide that the proof shall be made to the satisfaction of the Department that such assurances, on proper authority, were given, and that upon that assurance only shall this additional pay be given.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether there was any authority in the General Government to make these assurances, or to authorize officers in particular States to make them, and whether, if they were so made, it is not an act of injustice to discriminate against other States in that respect.

Mr. SCHENCK. I reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that it has been a matter of doubt whether, in view of the law for paying these troops ten dollars per month, the assurances given had any legal obligation. But, as they have been given, we propose to settle the matter by legalizing those assurances that far, but to go no further.

Mr. RADFORD. Will the gentleman name the States in favor of which it is proposed to discriminate?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have already stated that this provision will include two Massachusetts regiments, one South Carolina regiment, which was enlisted at Hilton Head, and then there is a question whether such assurances were or were not given to a battery and company of cavalry from one of the northwestern States. I have forgotten which. The other amendment to which I wish to ask attention, is a provision in regard to the application of one third of this money to be paid to these troops, under regulations to be prescribed by the War Department, for the support of their families. We propose that as a substitute for the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If I understood the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, it meets my approval entirely, except as to that portion which proposes to retain a part of the colored troops' pay, to be expended under other auspices than their own, for the support of their families. Now, while we are professing to put these people upon an equality, let us put them in fact upon an equality. If the colored soldier is to be paid equally with the other soldiers of the United States, let us treat him as a rational being, equally competent to take care of himself and of his family with the white soldier. I beg the gentleman from Ohio to take that portion out of his amendment, and let the equality which we propose to give be real.

Mr. SCHENCK. That can be accomplished by calling for a division of the question, taking first the vote on one section and then on the other.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not divisible. It must be voted on as a whole.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it not in order to move to strike out that section?

The SPEAKER. The power of amendment has gone to the fullest extent.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will not be adopted in either shape, for this reason: the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means is simply that all free persons of color, whether living in Maryland or anywhere else, who are enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, shall be put precisely upon the same footing with all other soldiers from the time of their enlistment. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to make a distinction between those who had no special assurance and those who enlisted under the assurance that they would be paid the same as other soldiers. That is unjust. There is no reason why those in Massachusetts or in any other State who were told what they should get shall be allowed this amount, while others enlisted without any assurance shall get a less amount.

Besides that, it puts the War Department to the trouble of inquiring in each case what was the assurance of the recruiting officer. The whole thing is complicated and impracticable. In reference to the "contrabands," while we increase their pay from the 1st of January, we consider their freedom as an offset to the bounty. We include all freemen as entitled to bounty, and to be paid from the time they were mustered into the service.

I hope that the gentleman's amendment will be voted down, and that we will do justice throughout. I hope that the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means will be adopted, and then the amendment of the Senate as amended concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the last resolution for the present.

Mr. STEVENS. I must call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. The difficulty is that many members vote for an increase of the pay of the colored soldiers provided a portion will go to their families.

Mr. STEVENS. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 54; as follows:

During the vote,

Mr. ROBINSON asked leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. J. C. ALLEN, for two weeks from Monday next.

Leave was granted.

Mr. RADFORD asked for leave of absence for Mr. WINFIELD for a week from to-day.

Leave was granted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, stated that his colleague, Mr. COFFROTH, was detained from the House by sickness in his family.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The Senate amendment as amended was then concurred in.

The next amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the same premium shall be allowed for each colored recruit now mustered or hereafter to be mustered into the service of the United States as is or shall be allowed by law for a white recruit: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall give his assent to the same.

Mr. STEVENS. That is in another bill.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the enlistments hereafter made in the regular Army of the United States during the continuance of the present rebellion may be for the term of three years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Eleventh amendment:

Add to the title of the bill the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate are all disposed of.

GAS-LIGHT COMPANY OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. FENTON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for the purpose of reference merely, a bill to extend the time for opening the books of subscription to the capital stock of the Union Gas-Light Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAWSON objected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening, for debate only.

Mr. COX. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, was agreed to.

The House accordingly took a recess until half past seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at half past seven o'clock.

THE REBELLIOUS STATES.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill in regard to the rebellious States, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, our experience, in the solution of the political problems which have arisen out of the war, should teach us at least this lesson, that however great at first sight may appear to be the difficulties which confront us, a wise, prudent, and patriotic use of the powers delegated by the people of the United States to the national Government is sufficient to overcome them. When the war broke out, we were immediately encompassed by a multitude of new, strange, and difficult questions, all of them growing out of the peculiarities of a political system for the most part new in the history of man, and for which no exact precedent or parallel had existed in the experience of the world. This system rested upon a written Constitution at once so complex in its structure, yet so simple in its practical operation, that to this day it has not ceased to perplex the statesmen and politicians of the Old World, who, accustomed to more arbitrary forms of government, were unable to comprehend entirely a system presenting all the features of a great and powerful nationality, yet embracing within itself, for the purposes of local government, thirty-four subordinate States, each with its three departments of government modeled in exact accordance with their great pattern, and all, until the rebellion, moving in harmonious action with the supreme national sovereignty, and sending to it, as rivers send to the sea, their combined strength and power. Sir, the history of the human race does not exhibit any monument of ingenuity at all comparable with this great framework of American political society, which, notwithstanding its magnitude, the extent of its operations, its complicated arrangements, and the greatness of the resources it commanded and of the power it wielded, yet rested upon the shoulders of the people as lightly as the atmosphere which they breathed. It was a law of necessity that when traitors applied the torch to a portion of this great and beautiful structure, much ruin should ensue, and that much perplexity should be felt in putting out the conflagration which their disappointed ambition had kindled, and in rebuilding the waste places which their insane fury had destroyed. When the ruin is repaired and the edifice rises again before the eyes of the nations in renovated splendor, the loyal people of this country will demand that those persons shall not again pass its protecting portal or enter its sacred precincts until they are purged of their treason, have cast off their political vices, and given bonds for our future security.

From the beginning it was apparent that there existed in this country a school of politicians whose principles were hostile to the perpetuity of our system, and whose favorite dogma of State sovereignty was absolutely inconsistent with the existence of the national Government. The baneful influence of these principles was foreseen by the great men who were principally instrumental in the formation of the Constitution and who labored to protect it against them. Therefore it was that Hamilton declared: "A national Government ought to be able to support itself without the aid or interference of the State governments, and therefore it is necessary to have full sovereignty." And therefore it was that Madison exclaimed: "I am for a national Government, though the idea of Federal is, in my view, the same," and on another occasion when he declared, "I apprehend the greatest danger is from encroachment of the States on the national Government. This apprehension is justly founded on the experience of ancient confederacies, and our own is proof of it." Therefore it was that the fathers of the Republic in making a Constitution, made, as the result of this war will demonstrate, not a league between States, but a Government for the American people; a Government which exists not by the consent of the sections but by the will of the majority of the whole people; which makes laws not for States but for a nation, and whose authority passes over State lines with as little notice of them as the winds which blow across them. The idea of State sovereignty as understood by the school of politicians referred to is fundamentally opposed to the Constitution of the United States, and as inconsistent with it as the proposition that in the material world two different substances can occupy in space the same position at the same time.

But from the foundation of the Government to the present time this pestilent heresy has notwithstanding had its disciples and propagandists. When the Democratic party, in the convention of 1850, adopted the resolutions of 1798, which affirmed the right of a State to interpose its authority against the acts of the United States, (which is the very germ of secession,) it became apparent that the time must come when this false principle must grapple in deadly conflict with the true theory of the Government, and one or the other of them perish in the encounter. That time has come, and the war which now desolates the land is the legitimate offspring of this pernicious error. I know, sir, how much the abominable institution of human slavery had to do with the origin of the war. I know that in our present miseries we but realize those fearful apprehensions expressed by Mr. Jefferson in his Notes on Virginia, when he exclaimed, "Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just." Slavery was undoubtedly the proximate cause of the war; nevertheless it was only its foster-mother. It was born of State sovereignty, though suckled into strength and vigor by this monster of cruelty. Indeed the parent itself was chiefly indebted to the same sustenance for the dangerous proportions to which it grew, for slavery encouraged and exalted it as the necessary bulwark of its own existence. Hence in the southern States this doctrine of State sovereignty has for the last thirty years been a favorite idea, and has come to be a principle so generally believed in that the people of those States have not hesitated to cast off their allegiance as they would a worn-out garment, and at the command of a few political demagogues to precipitate the country into the horrors of the present civil war.

The growth of this idea in the southern States kept pace with the rapid corruption of the public sentiment upon the subject of slavery. As slavery was at first humble, then apologetic, then respectable, then justifiable, then necessary, then a blessing, then divinely appointed, then ambitious, then aggressive, then domineering, then insulting, then rebellious, so the doctrine of State sovereignty was at first a political theory, then an active principle, then a political dogma, then a party war-cry, then a conspiracy against the Government, then a usurping power, then an armed rebel and public enemy. As slavery impaired the moral sense of the people so State sovereignty corrupted their political faith; and their combined influences destroyed their loyalty to their country and drove them into the desperate war which they now wage against it. Both evils must be forever expiated before the country can enter again upon a career of permanent peace and prosperity. The bill now before the House, while it aims to extinguish forever one cause of the existing rebellion, has for its chief object, as I understand it, the vindication of the national authority and the assertion of its perpetual sovereignty; and for this reason should command the support of every man who believes in human liberty and desires that his children should not be left without a country, without a Government, without a future.

The extraordinary subserviency of the Democratic party of the North to the pro-slavery doctrines of the South, and the controlling power which the representatives of the latter obtained over the former—a power which was a reproach to free labor and a scandal to the principles of democratic Government—were mainly attributable to the assiduity with which southern politicians propagated this destructive doctrine of State sovereignty, and its final adoption by the Democratic party. Having committed itself to this fatal heresy, it followed blindly the path of its southern leaders until in the beginning of the year 1861 its northern adherents found themselves standing upon the edge of rebellion and civil war, and invited by those who had led them thither to descend into its fiery gulf. The deceived and betrayed masses who had followed its fortunes in the North drew back with horror and declared their determination to maintain the integrity of their country at all hazards; but even then, in that hour of supreme agony in which the destinies of the country trembled in the balances of fate, the recreant voice of their President was heard reasserting this false doctrine amid the recent ruin which it had made, and declaring that the Constitution conferred no power upon the Government to coerce "a sovereign State."

Sir, no power of language at my command can fitly describe the great treachery which was then committed against the American people, and I forbear, for the man, although he still moves among living men, has really passed away. Dante, in his journey through hell, relates that as he passed through that dismal region, in which he beheld traitors frozen up in swathes of ice, their eyes incrustured with their frozen tears as in a crystal visor, he met the friar Alberigo. "What!" exclaimed Dante, "art thou no longer, then, among the living?" "Perhaps I appear to be," answered the friar, "for the moment any one commits a treachery like mine his soul gives up his body to a demon who thenceforward inhabits it in the man's likeness. Thou knowest Branca Doria who murdered his father-in-law, Zanche? He seems to be walking the earth still, and yet he has been in this place many years." "Impossible!" cried Dante; "Branca Doria is still alive; he eats, drinks, and sleeps like any other man." "I tell thee," returned the friar, "that the soul of the man he slew had not reached that lake of boiling pitch in which thou sawest him ere the soul of his slayer was in this place, and his body occupied by a demon in its stead."

The loyal people of the North of all parties rejected with scorn the proposition that the Government of the United States had no power to compel obedience to its laws, and to preserve itself from disintegration and destruction. The answer of the people was like the roar of many waters, revealing the fact that the instinct of nationality was as deeply seated in the hearts of the American people as that of life and self-preservation in the bosom of human nature. The doctrine of State supremacy, culminating as it did in treason and rebellion, was exhibited in all its monstrous deformity, and people who had watched its tendencies and reflected upon its disastrous consequences began to hope that from the North at least it had disappeared forever. But as the war progressed, and party spirit, freed from the temporary paralysis which it had suffered, began again to display itself, with it reappeared the old enemy of our national existence; and this pernicious doctrine is now, and for the last two years has been, the chief weapon in the hands of the party opposed to the Administration with which it carries on its opposition to the measures which are necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

This was their principal argument against the conscription law; and cannot better illustrate the subject than by a brief reference to it. Their desire to make use of their favorite dogma of State sovereignty against that measure led them into the greatest absurdities. No proposition can be plainer than this, that every citizen owes military service to his country, if it be necessary to defend it against foreign invasion or internal rebellion. From the times in which the Roman consul or prætor was accustomed every year to assemble in the Campus Martius all the citizens who were bound to participate in the formation of the four legions which they annually raised, down to the present time, this principle has been held by every organized political society. The works of Montesquieu, Puffendorf, Grotius, Locke, Vattel, and all the writers on Government perfectly attest it. Indeed no nation can permanently exist without it. Carthage alone among ancient States disregarded it, relying for support upon levies drawn from Africa, Spain, Gaul, &c. The penalty she paid for it was, as every school-boy knows, the loss of her liberty and her existence. The duty of personal military service by the citizen to the State is recognized by the constitution of almost every State in this Union. The raising of armies by compulsory draft was a thing perfectly well known in the history of the several States and of the Revolution. The plan of General Knox, Secretary of War, submitted to Congress by General Washington in January, 1790, contemplated as liable to service all persons between the ages of eighteen and sixty; and stated explicitly that, "every man of the proper age and ability of body is firmly bound by the social compact to perform personally his proportion of military duty for the defense of the State." (7 Niles's Register, p. 296.) Here is a contemporaneous construction of the Constitution adopted by General Knox, and approved by General Washington.

Rhode Island was the last State which ratified the Constitution. On the 29th May, 1790, their convention proposed certain amendments to the Constitution, one of which was as follows:

"No person shall be compelled to do military duty otherwise than by voluntary enlistment except in cases of general invasion, anything in the second paragraph of the sixth article of the Constitution, or any law made under the Constitution, to the contrary notwithstanding."—Elliot's Debates, 371.

Another contemporaneous exposition, the force of which cannot be depreciated. On the 17th October, 1814, Mr. Monroe, then Secretary of War, with the approbation of Mr. Madison, proposed to Congress a plan for a compulsory draft, (7 Niles's Register, 137,) which no doubt would have been adopted and carried into effect had not peace soon ensued thereafter.

Indeed, I believe there is but one American document which can be cited as authority against the power of Congress to compel military service by a draft; and that is the resolution of the Hartford Convention in 1815. (7 Niles's Register, 307.) Yet, in the face of history, in the face of the express grant of power in the Constitution, and of the construction, both contemporaneous and subsequent, of that grant, and in the face of the solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton, 196,) that all the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress are complete in themselves, and may be exercised to their utmost extent, and that there are no limitations upon them except such as are prescribed in the Constitution, we have heard gentlemen upon the other side of this House, day after day, denouncing the draft as an invasion of State sovereignty. Are they ignorant of the history of their own country and of its public men? If not, they must be aware that Mr. Calhoun himself—to them hæd ignobile nomen—advocated the proposition that Congress should raise an army by a draft, expressing his views upon that subject in his speech in the House of Representatives January 31, 1816, on the motion to repeal the direct tax, as follows:

"Although militia freshly drawn from their homes may in a moment of enthusiasm do great service, as at New Orleans; yet in general they are not calculated for service in the field until time is allowed them to acquire habits of discipline and subordination. On land your defense ought to depend on a regular draft from the body of the people. You will thus in time of war dispense with the business of recruiting, a mode of defending the country every way uncongenial to our republican institutions. I know that I utter truths unpleasant to those who wish to enjoy liberty without making the efforts necessary to secure it. Her favor is never won by the cowardly, the vicious, or indolent."—Calhoun's Works, vol. 2, p. 146.

Some of the most violent of the denunciations of that measure have come from gentlemen upon the other side of the House from the State of New York, commencing with the gentleman from the fifth district of that State, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who stigmatized the war for the preservation of the Union as a "hellish crusade of blood and famine," and ending with the gentleman from the thirteenth district, [Mr. STEELE,] who in his recent speech upon the national currency bill made the measure referred to the subject of fresh attack, denouncing it as odious, unnecessary, and oppressive, and as calculated to subvert the liberties of the people, and centralize power in the General Government.

Have these gentlemen forgotten the history of their own State? If they have not, they must remember that the first constitution of New York, made in 1777, declared "that it is the duty of every man who enjoys the protection of society, to be prepared and willing to defend it." They must also remember that during the second war of independence, Mr. Van Buren introduced into the Senate of that State a bill to raise twelve thousand men by drafting, to be placed in the service of the United States, which, after being amended became a law on the 24th October, 1814. It was stigmatized as a conscription bill by the opposition of that day, but it was approved by Governor Tompkins—who was twice elected Vice President of the United States—and sustained by the judges of the Supreme Court. Nor can I suppose them to be ignorant of the fact that the laws of the State of New York expressly recognize the constitutional right of the national Government to raise an army by a draft; the act of 1854, passed before the war, enacting, that "all able-bodied white male citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, residing in this State, not exempted by the laws of the United States, shall be subject to military duty," (Act 1854, ch. 398, tit. 1, sec. 1, 1 Rev. Stat., 715,) and the same act requiring the assessors to include in their assessment rolls the names of all persons between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years "liable to be enrolled by the laws of the United States," (Id., 723,) and the same act yet more plainly declaring that "whenever the President of the United States or the Commander-in-Chief shall order a draft from the militia for the public service, such draft shall be made in the following manner," which manner is then expressed. (1 New York Rev. Statutes, 744.)

But, Mr. Speaker, I must beg pardon of the House for this digression in regard to the conscription law. My object in it has been to show the errors and absurdities into which men are driven by this phantom of State sovereignty. It might be illustrated by reference to the opposition which has been made to other measures of great importance, especially by that made to the national currency bill, which many intelligent gentlemen upon this side of the House refused to support unless the capital of the national banks should be subjected to State taxation, which, to say nothing of the inequality which such a provision would introduce, would place the very existence of institutions created by the national Legislature and intended to be entirely under its control and regulation at the mercy of political parties in thirty-four different Legislatures. Indeed, scarcely any national measure of importance can be started here that is not destined to be fatally crippled in its usefulness or absolutely turned into stone by this Medusa's head. The cry of centralization and consolidation is raised by shallow minds against everything of an exclusively national character which originates here. From a certain school of theorists and politicians this is to be expected. Their political cogitations revolve upon an axis but have no orbits. The axis is State sovereignty, around which they spin continually but make no progress. Sir, the people of the United States have by their Constitution made themselves a nation, and such, by the blessing of God, they intend to remain. It is time that their Representatives should comprehend this great fact. There is in this country but one sovereignty. That resides in the people of the United States in their collective capacity; and of that sovereignty there is but one organ, and that organ is the Government of the United States, consisting of its three factors, Congress, Judiciary, and Executive.

If any one shall ask what this discussion has to do with the present measure before the House, I answer, much. For in this great fact, that in the national Government alone is deposited the sovereignty of the people, lies the solution of the difficulties which lie in our path in rebuilding that portion of our inheritance which the rebellion has laid waste. The powers delegated by the people of the United States to the national Government are sufficient for the great work we have before us.

That the time has come in which Congress in the exercise of the great powers conferred upon it by the people should settle and authoritatively declare the terms and conditions upon which the people of the rebellious districts should be restored to their State privileges and resume their just relations to the national Government does not admit of doubt. Large portions of territory have been wrested from the rebellion. Order, law, and the national authority must be reestablished in those regions. The people who inhabit them, or at least such of them as are willing to return to their allegiance to the United States and to acknowledge its sovereignty and obey its laws, should be restored with the least possible delay to the privileges of representative Government. Humanity demands this; the pacification of the country demands this; the principles of our political system demand it; justice, expediency, and the welfare of the whole country alike demand it. Passing events admonish us that we can no longer delay the exercise of our powers in this respect without justly subjecting ourselves to the charge of neglecting both our own duty and the highest interests of the people. Here alone resides the power. Congress alone can enact the laws which are to reconstruct the political societies in which the fundamental principle of loyalty to the national Government and obedience to its laws and respect for its authority have been obliterated by the violence of rebellion. The President of the United States cannot enact these laws, and it is in my opinion a reproach to Congress that by its inaction up to the present time it has rendered it necessary that the national Executive should be obliged by a sense of obligation to the public welfare to resort to temporary expedients for the preservation of public order and the assertion of national supremacy in those districts and States which the valor of our soldiers has redeemed from the insulting domination of the rebel army.

With regard to what has been done, the pressing necessities of the case demanded executive action in the absence of action here. The President would have violated his obligations to the country if he had neglected to reestablish the authority of the United States in the regions which have been recovered from the public enemy, and to restore to the people of those regions the protection of the United States, and of a temporary government administered by those who represented its authority and would see that it was enforced and respected. What has been done in that respect by the President I believe to have been well done, wisely done, and patriotically done, and to have been demanded alike by the necessity of the case and for the welfare of the Republic. But it is the duty of Congress to put an end to the necessity which existed for executive action, and by the exercise of that exclusive authority over the subject which belongs to it by the Constitution to relieve the Executive Magistrate as speedily as possible from any further action or responsibility in the matter. To us, and to us alone, belong the duty and the responsibility of declaring the terms upon which the communities which have revolted from the United States, and which have by the success of our arms been again subjected to its authority, shall be restored again to the privileges and immunities which belong to American citizens. To us alone belongs the making of the laws which are to accomplish this great object, and which are to place upon secure foundations the future authority and prosperity of the United States. Let us no longer delay the performance of this great duty, but enter upon it with a determination so to build that this great house of freedom shall not again be undermined or shaken by the evil influences which have caused the present disaster.

Sir, we have heard much said upon the question whether the rebel States are now in or out of the Union. Much ingenuity and many arguments have been expended upon it. But in my judgment such discussions are as useless as those in which some ancient lawyers have indulged in their efforts to determine where the remainder is in case of a lease for life remainder to the right heirs of J. S. then living; whether it is in abeyance, in gremio legis, or in nubibus. There are well-founded objections to its being in either place, and so there may be to any direct answer given to the question with which gentlemen have exercised their intellectual faculties. This has been a favorite question with the gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of this House, and they have built lengthy arguments and wasted much breath upon the answers to it so obligingly given on this side. If it is answered that the rebel States are in the Union they immediately respond that they are then entitled to all the advantages of that position, and to the protection of the Constitution, and that their State organizations have been unaffected by the rebellion. If it be answered that they are out of the Union they immediately demand by what authority, then, we can treat them as rebels. It matters not in either case that the conclusion drawn is based upon a bald and familiar fallacy. In both cases the answer is alike favorable to their friends.

Whatever difficulties such minds may have in regard to the present condition of the rebel States, this much is plain to all who deny the right of secession and who believe in the right of the people of the United States to preserve their Government from destruction and their country from dismemberment, namely, that both the territory which has been subjected to rebel control and the people who inhabit it are lawfully subject to the authority of the United States, and must be made to respect and obey it. The question before us is, in what manner and upon what conditions the people of those States may, as rapidly as by the blessing of God upon our arms the national sovereignty is reestablished in those regions, be restored to the right of self-government and of representation in the national Legislature.

That in doing this it is our duty to adopt such safeguards as may be necessary to protect the country against future outbreaks of a similar character, to insure permanent peace and tranquility, and to settle upon secure foundations the authority of the national Government, would seem to be a proposition too clear for debate. If we neglect these precautions we are false to the great trust which the people have reposed in our hands. Much has been said from time to time in regard to the subjugation of the South, and it has been made the theme of much party clamor. But I am not aware that either the Government or any one else has proposed more in this respect than to reestablish the authority of the United States in that portion of its domain, and to exact such conditions from its people, as preliminary to their restoration to the full rights of citizenship, as may be necessary to the safety of our republican system. These conditions are to be prescribed by the representatives of the people, assembled in the Congress of the United States. If to be restored to the national protection, to be subjected to the national authority, to enjoy the privileges of American citizenship and the blessings of representative government, upon conditions entirely compatible with personal and political liberty, but involving unqualified allegiance to the supreme authority of the Union and the total extirpation of the very root of the rebellion—if this be subjugation, then they must pass beneath the yoke.

To reward the perpetrators of this great crime against civil liberty by welcoming them back to the Union without securities for the present or pledges for the future; to place the destinies of the country in the hands of their representatives without any safeguard against the repetition of the treason which has desolated the land with fire and sword, which has created burdens under which our posterity must toil for generations, which has filled a continent with groans of anguish, and made our sufferings the jest and mockery of every despot in the world—this would indeed be a folly unequalled in the history of time, a crime against the living and the dead. Every soldier who has given his life for this great cause, from Big Bethel to Gettysburg, and who died that his country might live, would upbraid us from his heroic grave for an infidelity so great as this. No, sir. They who have at such great cost saved the present demand that we should make the future secure. All the sufferings and sacrifices of the past, all the struggles of the present, all the hopes of the future implore, nay, demand of us that as the rebel armies are forced back, and the territory of the Union is reclaimed from the rebellion, such conditions shall be imposed and such measures enacted that the peace which is attained shall, in its glory and its permanency, be proportioned to the self-devotion, the sufferings, and the heroism by which it was achieved. If we fail in this we fail alike in our duty to our country and our gratitude to those who have saved it from disruption, debasement, and perpetual war.

Upon what conditions, then, if successful in the present struggle, must we insist, as preliminary to the reorganization of local governments in the rebel States in accord with the Government of the United States? There are three which in my opinion are indispensable to our self-respect and our future security; and it is because these three conditions are contained in the bill now before the House that I shall give it my support, content to abide by such alteration in the details of the measure proposed as Congress may in its wisdom see fit to adopt, while these conditions, which I regard as the essential features of any plan for the restoration of the rebel States to their proper position in the American Union, are preserved:

1. Any governments there organized must be based upon the principle of unconditional and perpetual loyalty to the Government of the United States, subordination to its power, and submission to its Constitution and laws.

2. The institution of slavery in those States must be totally extirpated and forever prohibited by their fundamental law.

3. Compulsory repudiation of the rebel debt.

The local governments in the rebel States have been violently driven from their natural and proper orbits and brought into destructive collision with the national Government around which they have heretofore peacefully revolved. All their powers and resources have been perverted from their true purposes and concentrated in the unnatural war which they have waged against the Government of the United States. The prosecution of that war has been the chief object of their legislation for the last three years. They have attempted not only to break that bond of eternal allegiance which bound them to the General Government, but to substitute for it an alliance with another and hostile government, the creature of their own treasonable revolt, and supported it by their governors, their representatives, their judiciary, their supplies, their money, and their men. They have in their legislative acts, in the proclamations of their governors, in the judgments of their courts, by every public officer in their service, and by every function at their command, forsworn their allegiance to the United States, banished its officers, seized its property, reviled its sovereignty, and made war upon its loyal citizens. Every officer, civil and military, in their service is a sworn enemy of the United States.

Are governments constituted in this manner, thus administered and thus officered, to be received into the bosom of the Union, unwashed of their great crime and prepared to commence again upon the first favorable opportunity their schemes of disunion and civil war? Have all the sacrifices to which we have submitted been made for this? Is it for this that our soldiers have shed their blood and given up their lives upon a hundred battle-fields which their courage and constancy have made immortal? Is it for this that we have submitted to foreign insult, to domestic feuds, to domestic sorrows, to pecuniary distress and all the cloud of horrors through which we have passed? History presents no example of a political blindness and infatuation greater than that which such a course of action would involve. The safety of the country, its future repose, the continuance of the Union, and the firm establishment of our political system imperatively demand that in the reorganization of local governments in the rebel States the foundations of such governments must rest upon the principle of submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States. This must be the chief corner-stone of the whole structure. Any other will be but a foundation of sand, which will again imperil the whole fabric of American liberty.

In order to accomplish this effectually this principle must be incorporated in their organic law and assume the character of an authoritative declaration by the people themselves. The seventh section of the bill now before the House contains a provision for this purpose, and is in my opinion a necessary condition of any plan for the proposed object. It is also necessary to guard the elective franchise and the privilege of holding office in those States against the intrusion and treachery of all who have in any sense been leaders in the present rebellion. For this purpose prudence requires that all who have held office under the pretended rebel government should be excluded from these privileges. It does not, however, appear to me to be necessary to exclude all who have held office under the State governments. The chief officers of those governments, such as governors and other high officers, all of whom have been chief actors in the rebellion and have promoted it by every means in their power, should be excluded; but I do not believe that either necessity or sound policy requires the exclusion of the large number of ministerial subordinates who have participated in the administration of local affairs, who have not been leaders of the rebellion, and who are willing to return to their allegiance to the United States.

I would not increase unnecessarily these restrictions. I would not extend them one whit beyond what is absolutely required for the public safety. I for one am willing to extend to the people of those States, upon their returning to their allegiance, every benefit and of restoring to them every right which is consistent with the permanent reestablishment of the authority of the United States. It is our duty, in my opinion, to make the path to this object as easy as possible. Any such path, containing the necessary conditions for this purpose, will to most of them appear at first rugged and humiliating. This is the necessary result of their failure to overthrow the Government of the United States. But it would appear to me to be wise and just and humane and politic to place no unnecessary difficulties or obstacles in the way of an early and complete pacification of the whole country. For these reasons I would prefer to see some modifications of this feature of the seventh section of the bill. I believe that every essential purpose would be answered by excluding from office and the elective franchise all officers of the pretended confederacy, and such high officers of State, under the local governments, as have been chiefly instrumental in aiding and abetting the rebellion. To all other classes of the free male white population of these States I would confidently surrender the privileges of the elective franchise and the same rights of citizenship which we ourselves enjoy, upon their laying down their arms and returning to their true allegiance. Nothing, I believe, could be further from the wishes of the people of the United States than to deprive the masses of the southern people, who are willing to return to their allegiance to the Government of their fathers, of one solitary right which they themselves enjoy.

The compulsory repudiation of the rebel debt, by which I mean all debts of the pretended confederate States and State debts contracted solely for the prosecution of the war against the United States, is a measure which, in my opinion, is demanded on the part of the United States, if successful in the present struggle, not only by a just self-respect, and as a proper and necessary vindication of its own sovereignty, but in order that it may remain a lasting monument of the wickedness and folly of the present rebellion. It is also a just and merited punishment to be inflicted upon those who have lent substantial aid to the rebellion; and it has the further merit that it reaches with its retributive justice those foreign speculators in our sufferings who, at a safe distance, have wickedly connived at, encouraged, and aided in the attempt to break in pieces our nationality and to destroy our free institutions. This feature of the bill meets with my entire approval. I would, not, however, in doing this unsettle any State debt which may have been contracted for the purpose only of carrying on the civil affairs of the State, and which had not for its object the prosecution of the war or the strengthening of the pretended confederacy. I would therefore prefer to see the third condition specified in the seventh section of the bill so modified that it should declare that no debt of the pretended confederate States, and no debt contracted by the State for the purpose of prosecuting the war against the United States or of giving aid to its enemies, shall be recognized or paid by the State.

That slavery must, as a necessary consequence of this war, forever disappear from the American Republic I believe to be a conclusion long since reached by a large majority of the loyal people of the United States. So far as relates to the border States, which have nobly stood by their allegiance to the national Government, I am not in favor of any interference with it, because under our present Constitution we have no such right of interference, and honor and duty alike require that we should refrain from such interference. I am in favor of leaving to the people of those States the entire control and management of this question. I fully believe that they will find it for their interest and welfare at no great distance of time to make their institutions in this respect correspond with those of the free States. The recent action of the people of Maryland upon this subject, by which, on the 6th day of April, they declared themselves by a large majority in favor of immediate emancipation, and forever destroyed the political significance of Mason and Dixon's line, gives assurance, I believe, of what will be the ultimate action of the people of all the border States in reference to this matter. But however this may be, I regard it as a question entirely for themselves; and while the Constitution remains as it is and they adhere steadfastly to their allegiance I believe it to be our duty to abstain from any interference except it be at their own request by way of aiding them in the great reform.

But as regards the rebel States I hold an entirely different opinion; and this leads me to answer the interrogatory of the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALEX.] when he asks from whence Congress derives the power to frame these provisions and to dictate what shall be the character of the constitutions and laws of those States. It is certainly a most singular and extraordinary doctrine which seems to be held by some members of this House, including the gentleman from Illinois, that the people of the States who have thrown off all the restraints of the Constitution, who have abjured its ties, and who have for three years waged war for the purpose of overthrowing it, should be entitled to demand its protection while engaged in armed hostility to it. It is as if an alien enemy who has broken and trampled upon all existing treaties should demand in the midst of flagrant war their enforcement in his own favor. Sir, the people of those States have placed themselves beyond the pale of the Constitution. They have no right to appeal to one of its provisions. They are estopped by their own acts from claiming the protection of a single line in that instrument. They have placed themselves toward this Government in a state of war, and we have a right to use against them all powers which we might lawfully use against any belligerent, and among those powers is the right to demand, if successful in that war, whatever conditions this Government may choose to impose for its own safety and security hereafter. This is a part of the law of nations.

By what right did the allied Powers restore Louis XVIII to the throne of France after the defeat of Bonaparte? By what right did Sardinia, more recently, annex Lombardy to its dominions after the defeat of the Austrians at Solferino? It belongs, sir, to the successful belligerent to dictate the terms of peace; and when those terms are not only consistent with humanity but imperatively demanded for our own security, who shall arraign us for demanding them? By the laws of war we have the right to emancipate the slaves of our enemies, and by the law of nations we have the right to demand of a defeated belligerent such changes in his own political condition as are necessary for our own protection. These are principles which have been declared and acted upon by all nations. They are principles which have been substantially asserted by the Supreme Court of this country in its decision in the prize cases. (2 Black's Rep.) They are principles which are now, for the first time, contravened in argument here. Nay, they are principles which are acknowledged and publicly avowed by the rebels themselves. Yet we are told here, that the Government of the United States has no right to impose conditions upon people who have taken up arms and waged relentless war against it; who have invaded their territory and captured their ships upon the high seas. Away with such sophistry and such empty subterfuges. The people of the rebellious States have, in the language of the Supreme Court, in the case to which I have referred, "cast off their allegiance and made war on their Government, and are none the less enemies because they are traitors." If they are enemies, then we have as regards them all the rights of enemies, and among these rights none is better established than the right, if we are victorious, to dictate such terms as regards their future political condition as may be necessary for our own safety and tranquility.

But if the gentleman is really anxious to find in the Constitution an express warrant for our proposed action he may find it not only in that clause which declares that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, but he can draw it also from that great reservoir of powers in the first article, which gives to Congress the right to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof; for among those powers is a power to require the laws to be faithfully executed, and if the laws of the United States cannot be faithfully executed in those revolted districts without these fundamental changes in their condition, which changes we have also by the laws of war the right to impose, let the gentleman upon this ground satisfy his cravings for constitutional authority, and vote for this measure, which is necessary, not only for the continued and peaceful execution of the laws, but also necessary in order to preserve a perfect Union, to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have permission to proceed with his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, the voice of the people of the United States cannot be mistaken. They demand of us, their Representatives, that the institution of human slavery which has from the beginning been our national reproach, the fruitful source of sectional enmity and strife, the obstacle to the development of one half of our territory, the secret enemy which has for seventy years sown our vineyard with tares and brambles, which has alienated brethren of the same blood, which has proscribed education, fomented discord, encouraged opposition to our republican system, weakened the ties of national allegiance, and at last arrayed itself in bloody war against the Government, shall be forever blotted out in the rebel States, and that upon its ruins shall be written a legend like that which indignant France wrote over the gateway of rebellious Lyons, "Slavery made war upon the Republic; slavery is no more!" They demand this as the right of war against the public enemy. They demand it in the name of that very Constitution which is sought here to be made its shelter and its shield. They demand it as the only adequate compensation for the sacrifices which they have made and the sufferings which they have endured. They demand it in the name of liberty and humanity. They demand it as the only pledge of future union and tranquillity. They demand it for their own peace and safety and for the repose and security of their children. Already its grim and terrible form, weakened by its wounds, begrimed with the dust of battle, and covered with the blood of brave men which has been shed in this sanguinary war, cowers and reels before the banners of the Republic. As it falls let it hear ringing in its ears the decree for its extermination pronounced here by the Representatives of the people.

Sir, I rejoice that I shall be able to say, when I go home, to my constituents, that whatever differences of opinion in regard to public affairs may prevail among the members of this House, I believe that those among them who are not true and loyal to their country at this critical moment of its existence are few in number and insignificant in influence. Greater responsibilities never rested upon the representatives of a free people than those which weigh upon us. If we perform the sacred trust which has been confided to us, with courage and fidelity, we shall receive the thanks of a grateful people, and will not be unremembered in that bright and happy future when our vast and fertile country, stretching from sea to sea, and from the frigid to the torrid zone, with her millions of rejoicing people, shall come forth from her present trials, purified and strengthened by the terrible ordeal, and put on her garments of peace again. When the storm-clouds of the present disastrous time shall have cleared away, and our country shall emerge from them clothed with new vigor, with renewed strength, and with indestructible unity, History will take up her pen, and, in the clear sunshine of that proud and prosperous day, record on her enduring tablets the names of those who were true to its liberty, its unity, and its glory. And she will also, I am compelled to add, at the same time write in her eternal record the severe and unalterable verdict of posterity against those who, without the excuse of passion or the temptation of self-interest, abandoned in the moment of her most imminent and deadly peril the country which gave them birth; who denied her great struggle for self-preservation; who would have struck from her hand the sword which she had drawn to protect her honor and her life; who sympathized with her foes, and gave them moral if not material aid; who contemplated with unconcern the threatened dissolution of the Government and the country, and whose voices were only heard in this Hall as the echoes of those of her enemies.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is generally called the reconstruction bill. Viewing it simply in the light of the Constitution, I am unable to see our power to legislate away the laws and institutions of States, though the people of such States be in rebellion. As a measure of policy it seems to me not well to fix in advance an ideal or legislative standard to the measure of which we will feel bound to work in practice, although a restoration might forthwith appear practicable or be sought for on a different plan. Having pledged ourselves to this plan, and the fruits of the plan to those whom it purports to free, are we bound to go to this preadvanced mark, though it be through a sea of our own blood? Viewing it from the standpoint of those who desire universal abolition, it would seem to be idle and premature legislation, because without military success the law is a dead letter, and with military success under the present programme, abolition is accomplished without the law. We present the curious spectacle of legislating for a vast region which our arms cannot to-day penetrate, and while the wager of battle hangs in doubt. Here I might stop. But as we are trying to mend the Government, I propose to inquire what ails the Government, and the result of the inquiry will be to show that there is and can be no reconstruction without a more thorough and fruitful military success than has yet crowned our arms; that we as a people must come out of this contest with a new and a better political education, an education having for its basis the idea that we are a nation, only being careful that the excessive rebound which secession may give the public mind does not absorb all to the nation, and obliterate the idea of local or municipal administrations without which no great empire can exist except as a despotism. It is plain that in this idea of our political situation it is immaterial what becomes of slavery as a form of labor, just so the maelstrom that wrecks it does not also wreck our free institutions. I speak plainly and earnestly about the first necessity of our political salvation. I mean the success of our arms. Without that we have lost the prize at stake in this great game. With that, so we carry the Constitution with the sword, reconstruction or restoration will come without any bill of forms and conditions for that purpose. Government will spring in full-grown beauty from the American mind like Minerva from the head of Jupiter, so soon as that mind can work free of rebel compulsion, and sees that it must work in the precincts of the Union. It hardly needs argument to show that we retard the formation of that Government, and increase the measure of blood it must cost by prescribing in advance any other conditions for it than that it must be republican in form. Moreover, I deem it not unfair to regard this bill as a link in the great legislative system embracing enlistments, emancipation, confiscation, bounty lands in the South, and that political status of the negro pointed to by the Senate bill regarding this District, and the recent bill regarding negro suffrage in Montana Territory.

I propose then, as being germane to the subject, to discuss the origin, progress, and consequences of our present troubles in the light of our institutions, more especially of democracy, African slavery, and the relation of the States to the national Government, and in the light of the great contests of parties which mediately and immediately preceded the outbreak. However remote some of these may appear, their connection is continued and regular if not direct. We are too much in the habit of considering great events by themselves, or at most only in relation to those causes visibly and presently connected with them, and often fail to discern the real causes of a great social or political revolution by failing to look far enough into the past, or deep enough into our own nature and consciences to find them. Great changes in the habits or institutions of men, though sometimes suddenly developed, are never suddenly or slightly caused. There are conspirators or leaders in all civil commotions, but men are not foolish, or unjust, or tyrants by whole populations, and we should accept some explanation of any great popular movement or convulsion more creditable to human nature than the universal falsehood or insanity of our kind. An earnest disciple of a well-known school in our politics believes in the divine ordination of servitude and the right of State secession as profoundly as the disciple of other schools believes that all men were created equal, and that the Constitution is the framework of a nationality. A fervent soul at Paris in 1791, or at Washington in 1864, confounds perfect equality with pure liberty, and then as if to deny inequality a place in all the universe, exalts human nature to a par with Deity. One decorated and worshiped a beautiful courtesan as the goddess of reason, that reason which had discovered the human race to be the only sovereign of the universe; and the perfect equality of that race its only rule of action. The latter from the same cause mistakes his theory of human existence for the revelations of divine will, and rejects all laws, human and divine, which mar his theory. It is thus the enthused democrat of the abolition school, without knowing it, makes his politics his religion, and thinks he hates slavery as a sin against the law of God, when his hate is solely because slavery is a refusal of his demand for the perfect equality of an unrestrained cosmopolitan democracy. The proper admixture of democracy and republicanism in our institutions is the highest political achievement of man. Guizot, in his learned History of Civilization, shows that in Europe the tendency is toward the democratic equality of the individual and the concentration or centralization of power in the Government. Paradoxical as this may seem it is true; and no less so in America just now than in Europe for the last three centuries. It has been going on since the Crusades. It has been rapidly developed since the decay of the feudal system, and is to-day the chief feature in the political growths of France, Russia, and England. These tendencies may reach a crisis with us in the progress of the present revolution.

In that admirable work upon our own institutions, by De Tocqueville, it is observed that—

"The advent of democracy as a governing power in the world's affairs, universal and irresistible, was at hand." "The gradual development of the principle of equality is a providential fact. It has all the chief characteristics of such a fact; it is universal, it is durable, it constantly eludes all human interference; and all events, as well as all men, contribute to its progress." "To others it seems irresistible, because it is the most uniform, the most ancient, and the most permanent tendency to be found in history."

In this he is probably not mistaken. Governments did not begin in democracy, but in tribes, clans, castes, kingdoms, despotisms; and it is against these that "the permanent tendency" of democracy has set its current. While there have been many interruptions in all ages and countries to this general tendency of mankind toward democracy, the fact remains that it is ancient, constant, and powerful, if not irresistible. The checks it has received have been as often from its own excesses as from the successes of its rivals, absolutism, "divine right," and legitimacy as applied to crowns. Some of the bitterest woes that have cursed the world in politics and in war have followed the convulsive efforts of democracy to abolish too suddenly and too thoroughly the forms, distinctions, and prerogatives to which it is a natural enemy. The idea that it is better for men and Governments wisely to adapt themselves, their institutions and interests, to this majestic tendency of the human mind, this living demand for the equality of democracy, by a judicious accommodation to it, rather than be broken or uprooted in stiffly resisting it, has nowhere been better illustrated than in monarchical and aristocratical England, where the process has been going on for six centuries; in the baptism of fire and blood through which France passed in the attempt to accomplish it in a trice; and in the success of our own system of delegation and balances and checks in which democracy was at once demanded, adopted, restrained, and tempered. In France, where the aspiration had long been pent up and fretted by other traditions and dominant castes, its ebullition was sudden and volcanic, and then, as if alarmed at itself, it nearly as suddenly subsided into a tame submission to the forms it had overthrown. But in again accepting the form of monarchy it did not throw away its ideas, and much of the power of these remains as the fruit of the Revolution. In England the dominant castes have preserved the form of monarchy and aristocracy by slowly yielding to the spirit of democracy, which, by its constant demands, has at length become a chief if not the real governing power in the British empire.

"In the designs of God time appears an element of truth; yet to demand from a single day the definite truth is to ask of nature more than she can afford. Impatience creates illusions and ruins in the place of truth."

"To discover the law of God in society and conform it to the laws of the legislator without forestalling the truth by chimeras and time by impatience—this is wisdom; to mistake the desire for realization, and sacrifice the real to the imaginary and unknown—this is folly. To grow furious at obstacles and at nature, and to crush whole generations beneath the ruins of imperfect institutions, instead of guiding them in security from one stage of society to another—this is crime."

In our own case the question is complicated, and made more difficult to understand and control, by the fact that the democratic tendency is, besides its ordinary political effects, essaying to control the relations between the two races, dominant and servient. Our contest appears on the surface to be between a pro-slavery secession and an anti-slavery nationality. The causes are behind both. The currents that clash and contend on the surface receive their impulse from the same internal heat. This struggle is the final development or paroxysm of a disease or tendency of which other matters are only the symptoms. The cause is twofold—excessive democracy and antagonism of race. I use democracy in the European sense of equality, which, as every student knows, does not mean liberty. I use antagonism of race to express that instinct of man that speaks on every page of the world's history, sometimes as war, sometimes as expulsion, sometimes as slavery, and sometimes as extermination. If there were but one of these elements at work, the political diagnosis would be more simple, but being combined, sometimes working together and sometimes in opposition, has made our trouble a great mystery. At the North democracy assumes a personal character, demanding the equality in freedom of all men, which has been intensified by the movement in the South to destroy the Government with the view of preserving the inequality of master and servant classes. At the South, democracy, though extreme, assumed a political aspect rather than a personal character, claiming the equality of each State with the entire nation, which is now intensified by the attempt of the personal democracy at the North to destroy the relation as it exists at the South. At the North, this element, in its eagerness to attain its ends is running into national centralization, by that massing of power that always comes of earnestness and unity. It does this while maintaining its individuality of effect on persons. The same thing has been done elsewhere, but has always been followed by results which we would wish to escape. At the South, democracy, in its eagerness to resist the same element in a different form at the North, exalts the State into an equality with the nation, and plunges into the political death of secession to break our nationality, and to preserve an inequality which is the foundation of their labor system. At the South, antagonism of race, to say nothing of interest, custom, and example, has enslaved the negro. The same influence is much more jealous to keep him enslaved than it was to enslave him, for the freedom of the long-enslaved negro would offend the admitted democratic equality of the individuals of the dominant race. At the North the same element manifests itself differently, and, at first glance, inconsistently with their democratic element. While their democracy demands the dissolution of the relation of master and slave, as being the basis and essence of an artificial or legal inequality which they hate, yet their notorious demand for free territory, free States, "free land and free government for free men," coupled with the legal exclusion of free blacks from many northern States, all of which were manifested before this fight commenced, show this antagonism most conclusively. At a distance from the slave they strike the manacles from him; brought into contact with the negro, they will thrust him out of their way when his room is needed.

Thus the struggle is affecting not only persons and races, but the whole theory and system of our Government. Let us take a short retrospect. During the revolutionary war, and before we had passed from the condition of a league or confederacy of States to that of a self-consolidated nation of people, there were already two parties, two ideas; one the national, headed by Hamilton, and the other the confederate or State sovereignty, headed by Jefferson. The same conflict of ideas and theories was repeated in the Convention in the process of framing the Constitution, in the conventions of the people called to consider its adoption, and in the partisan constructions contended for after it was adopted. The two ideas were coeval with our independence, and seem to have entered as contending elements into the national conception. And when the infant nation was born of the sovereignty of the people, when the Constitution, the covenant of the people, was substituted for the covenant of the States, the theory of the latter survived and grew among men when its reality reposed in the tomb of the "Articles of Confederation."

One marked moral and logical advantage remained with the defenders of the national idea. In the contest for the adoption of the Constitution its opponents warmly resisted it because of its admitted nationality, which was denounced as an independent, self-executing, centralized power in whose presence the States could not long survive; and after its adoption these objectors formed the nucleus and the intellect of a party who sought to avoid this once admitted nationality of the instrument by applying, in its construction, a principle which was repeatedly rejected in its formation and adoption. After the establishment of the Government the first well-defined parties were Federalists and Republicans, the former in the main combining the conservative elements of the country, maintaining the nationality of the Government, and adopting a liberal construction to that end. The latter embraced the more democratic elements, particularly touching the relations between the General and State governments, diminishing the former and exalting the latter, and for this purpose adopting a federalist construction. The most memorable contest between these two ideas was over the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798-99, which affirmed the Constitution to be only a compact between the States, who, as such, had no common judge; and that each State had the right to judge for itself of the infractions of the Constitution and of the mode and measure of redress, and to enforce its adverse construction or judgment by the nullification of a law of Congress. Since nullification, to be made effective, must always end in the practical and political independence of the dissenting State, it was a substantial assertion of the right of secession. The word "palpable," as applied to a supposed infraction of the Constitution, did not in the least alter the case since the States were to judge what was palpable. The doctrine was at first indignantly and contemptuously rejected by most of the States; and Mr. Madison, who had espoused these resolutions, in his celebrated report to the Virginia Legislature gave evidence of an anxious desire to explain away the force of that which was in itself indefensible. The founders and framers of the Constitution, and those who had favored its adoption, generally adhered to the Federal or national party. Those who had resisted its adoption upon the ground that it was too national, too centralized, generally adhered to the Republicans and the State right construction. There were two notable exceptions to this. Mr. Madison, who had so much to do in framing and adopting the Constitution, seemed for a while to be troubled with this heresy, though he so clearly and ably exploded it thirty years afterwards, when South Carolina came to act upon it; while Patrick Henry, who had earnestly resisted the adoption of the Constitution upon the ground that its powers were too great, too central, too national, made the greatest argument of his life against those resolutions in reply to John Randolph.

The theory expressed in those resolutions was the fatal blow in our political history. It was the commencement of a process, the adoption of a principle, which, if persevered in, must of necessity end in national disintegration or in an armed contest to establish the nationality of the Constitution and the authority of the Government in lines of blood, that color, unfortunately for man, in which all his greatest and best institutions and his mightiest reforms have been written. The tendency of democracy, under whatever name it acts, is to alter or destroy the existing order of things so far as that order is not expressed in equality. The Republicans of the Jefferson school did this powerfully and successfully in regard to the established Constitution in an honest attempt to define and preserve it. They would have the States severally equal to the nation. It was applying to the States that principle of equality which he had applied to persons in the social compact. It was the honest error of a mind more clear and intense than comprehensive.

The next grand division of the people of America into political parties were the organizations known as Whigs and Democrats. In the history, dogmas, and contests of these two great parties there appears the strangest medley of names and principles. The Whigs, who adopted the name of the liberal and progressive party in England and in the colonies, gave a liberal construction to the Constitution, with a view to enlarge the powers of the Government over commerce, manufactures, roads, canals, and the circulating medium, and thus far in the management of the Government were in a certain sense democratic—I mean democratic as to the number of the objects upon which and the extent to which the common Government might use its powers; and yet anti-democratic so far as this constructive vesting of power in the Government would tend to a consolidated mastery by the Government over the people and their interests. As between the States and General Government, on questions of power and jurisdiction, they inclined to the general or national Government; and as that is the one which had, relatively, been losing ground ever since its formation, they were to that extent the conservative party. In the schemes of the Democratic party for the extension and multiplication of the subjects of universal suffrage in the affairs of the State governments, the Whigs generally, though not uniformly, went against the tendency to radicalism and pure democracy, and were in this respect the real conservative party of the country. In their attempt to hedge about executive power in the matter of patronage, limiting it to one term, and refusing it a veto, the Whigs were democratic in their theories, but never succeeded in putting them into effect. Upon the whole they were the conservers of the country. Their system of interpretation, as compared with that of the Democrats, strengthened the powers of the General Government, but made the application of those powers democratic in regard to the number of the subjects and the various interests of the people to which they were applied, though their adversaries charged with too much plausibility that in the manner of applying these constructive and derivative powers to commerce, manufactures, and currency, they did not promote that equality of condition and privilege which is the leading feature and constant tendency of democracy. But it was in the position they occupied in regard to the relative, concurrent, and conflicting powers of the General and State Governments that the Whigs were preeminently the conservatives of the country, preserving the General Government from the attacks of the States, and the State governments from the attacks of pure democracy. They were the successors of the Federalists. The Democrats were the successors of the Republicans, and often adopted the resolutions of '98 and '99 as a part of their platform. The Democrats, in their theory of strict construction, were conservative in a legal or technical sense. Strict construction, so it be reasonable, would conserve the Constitution in its original purity. But in practice they carried the principle much too far, and in their extreme anxiety to prevent a consolidated or centralized Government, they granted it too little and gave too much to the States. In respect to the southward wing of that party it would be more accurate to say, instead of a strict construction of powers granted, they adopted a view which fundamentally affected the theory, scope, and operation of the Government. In their constant distinction between the Government as an agent and the people as principals, they were eminently democratic.

In their doctrines about hard money, currency, government, and bank issues, in resisting protection to manufactures and certain measures of encouragement to commerce, as tending to monopolies and a moneyed aristocracy; in their fervent laudations of agriculture, and their policy that it should be encouraged as our natural and national pursuit, they but repeated the democratic ideas of all countries and all ages. They expressed the sentiments of the lovely pastorals of Horace and Virgil, (with the beauty omitted) of the stern and leveling democracy of the code of Lycurgus was imitated while modified; and the theories, though not the intensity, of France under the Revolution, and of the Roundheads under the Commonwealth, were repeated. They were truly, in their day, the democrats of the country. They have since been outstripped by a swifter current of democracy rushing in a different channel and aimed at a different object of attack. This party were generally successful, and naturally so. With a vast consolidated despotism—a phantom of their own creation—to declaim against, with State pride and local prejudices and local patriotism to appeal to, with a name that is in itself a charm and a power, and, more than all, being ever aided by that great undercurrent of the human mind whose tendency is so ancient, so modern, so universal, and so powerful, it would have been wonderful if they had not generally vanquished their opponents and obtained possession of the Government. The Whigs, so often defeated, became disorganized; but politically they had little affection for their old opponents, rivals, and conquerors, and sought whereby to reclaim the Government from their possession. This could be done only by being more democratic than the Democrats. At the North recourse was had—shrewdly by some, unwittingly by others—to the great tendency so well defined by De Tocqueville. There had been from the foundation of the Government an institution or interest at the South which in its political influences had latterly been with the Democratic party, because that party, by its system of construction, curbed the power of the General Government and enhanced that of the States which had immediate jurisdiction over the subject. That institution was African slavery, the subjection of a servient to a dominant class. Nothing was easier than to array against this institution a sentiment more democratic, more radical, more leveling than the tenets of the Democratic party either North or South. This opposition at first found expression full enough for its purposes in the proposition to exclude slavery from the Territories, while disclaiming any intention of interfering with it in the States. The success of this movement at the North was owing to the democratic character of its anti-slavery element. It was congenial to the honest opposition felt by thousands to the extension of an institution to which they were opposed on principle. I speak not now of that seditious higher-law faction who are to-day and always have been rebels and revolutionists. Nay, more; they were secessionists. They long advocated secession, or a division of the Union, to be rid of slavery, until the South attempted it in behalf of slavery; then they resented secession, but not very promptly. Many of their leaders, some of them now in high places, would have allowed the movement to go by default, when Sumner was bombarded, had not the indignant uprising of the nation forced them into the ranks of the Union. Being avowed revolutionists, they would use the war to accomplish their revolution. Failing in that, they would again become secessionists in times of peace.

This movement at the North could not have succeeded but for the character of resentment imparted to it by the imperious demand of the South that slavery might go and be protected everywhere, the mischievous repeal of the Missouri compromise line effected by the South and their party allies at the North, and the shameless attempt to fix upon Kansas by fraud and force a pro-slavery constitution against the known wishes of the people. These measures, as was foreseen, by prudent men, aroused the full volume of the anti-slavery feeling of the North. The position of the Democratic party upon these and all kindred measures was an anomaly. Whoever has traced the origin of that party, and has studied what Lord Brougham once called "the fierce democracy of Jefferson," must see at once that it would probably and on principle have been the first and greatest anti-slavery party in the United States but for the fact that abolition by the nation ran counter to their favorite dogma of State sovereignty and control over the institution.

Having traced some of the elements and habits of political thought and influences that prepared men's minds and feelings for a rupture, we pass by the facts of its actual development, so recent in the memory of all, to note the increased part which these ideas and influences have played in the progress of the strife, and the results they are destined to work in the end. As the struggle deepened and passions heated, the ordinary historical phenomena began to develop themselves. An extreme democratic impulse, in attempting to attain its ends by the force of arms in the midst of a revolution, has a singular proneness toward vesting supreme power in the executive head as a means of giving vigor to its blows, and often manifests a willful or contemptuous disregard of such written laws and constitutions as stand in the way of the end to be accomplished. Zeal makes unity of effort, and confers executive power corresponding with that fervor. This is fully shown in all the conflicts of democracy with crowns, castes, and prerogative in all countries. Our own great civil war has not been an exception. At the South to-day centralization is so great that the name of "State rights" is a mockery, and personal liberty is only remembered as other lost blessings of good government; while the candid friends of our own Administration will admit that we are demanding, approving, or submitting to executive measures which before the war would have been regarded as a revolution in the Government. But a part of this, it must be said, is owing to the fact of closer study, larger views, and a better education as to the extent and character of the powers of the Government in the midst of war. I am less alarmed on this subject than I was one year or two years ago. We are in the midst of a revolution that will run its course, and when that is done we will settle down into our former ways as other nations have, and I deem it not vain to say that our capacity for improving on experience is equal to that of any other race. I believe it is true that no great and violent convulsion ever was settled or accommodated according to the form and letter of the law existing anterior to the strife. The lightning of the storm illumines the way of escape, and so it will be with us.

A people accustomed to think that their will is the foundation of their Government and laws are for that very reason, out of pride and self-esteem, the most obedient to laws and Government in times of peace. But when men are moved by the passions and ideas of a great convulsion, and desire to accomplish a given end which the limited written powers will not quite reach, the Constitution is invariably exceeded, and by a simple process. The will of the people is held the supreme law, the political god of the land. All it needs, it is said, is expression. They discover that will moving in a given direction, in which it has not had expression in a legal form. Indeed, the Constitution stands in the way of that expression, or at best is too slow, and then the same pride and self-esteem that have been fed from this all-pervading idea of the power of the people become restive. That which caused implicit obedience to the Constitution as the expressed will now makes that Constitution an object of indifference or hostility, because it fails to give expression to that will, or stands in the way of it. Then this newly expressed will of the dominant party is elevated above the Constitution, and becomes the rule of action in its stead, a condition of things that never has endured long, and never can. It is thus that in revolutionary times ideas are obeyed as everything, while the forms of the written law are lightly esteemed or even treated as the natural enemies and proper victims of the new ideas. While this has sometimes been carried to excess by our own Administration and people, as all ideas are in revolutionary times, it must be admitted that objectors have to some extent committed the opposite fault of looking at two contending revolutions through the technical glasses of a good attorney at the bar rather than with the clear, undimmed gaze of the citizen philosopher.

The customs, traditions, or written institutions of one age will give way to and be overridden by the changed will and opinion of another generation. If circumstances, pride, interest, dullness, prevent the expression of that changed will in a legitimate form, it will yet be expressed in a violent form. This has led some to doubt whether under democratic governments written constitutions or fundamental laws have any real utility, and whether under such governments the legislature, through which the people speak, had not as well be left supreme, as it really is in England. This has its advantages and disadvantages. Changes would be more gradual and never either so radical or so violent, but they would be more frequent, and agitation for them more constant. The greatest argument in favor of written constitutions is that a majority is frequently the hardest master, and a constitution, until overcome by a tempest of opinion and passion, serves the minority as the law and the courts serve the weak man.

It is now more than probable that the war caused by secession and its armed violence, and the opinions generated and developed by the war, have loosened the fastenings of African slavery on this continent, let the result of the war be as it may in regard to the union of the States. The perpetuity of involuntary servitude has always proved impossible in every country, and in this country its friends, by an ill-timed and insane effort in its behalf, have placed it in the process of rapid and final extinction. It is an impulse with man in resenting a wrong to strike at whatever appears to be identified with the wrong. This may work injustice, but it is always done. Secession, and rebellion, and guerrilla thefts, and murders, have drawn upon slavery much of the opposition and hatred that were due only to those crimes. To my mind the danger to both races seems that the transition will be too rapid and too violent, and the duty of the statesman may soon be to retard and ameliorate the pangs of a dissolution that has now become so much accelerated by the vicissitudes of war.

War is a great stimulator of new ideas, and frequently develops the opposite of the theory it was intended to defend. A war to-day in Italy to increase and extend the prerogatives of the church would break down the papal power. A war in England to extend and increase the prerogatives of king and nobles would make England a democracy. A war in the United States in behalf of slavery is rapidly propagating anti-slavery ideas in the slave States. A war to enforce the theory of secession will end in an increased consolidated nationality. For three fourths of a century the people of America had appealed to the legislature and the judiciary for a construction of their Constitution, and while upon the law question the decision has uniformly been in favor of our nationality, the Administration has nearly as uniformly been in favor of those interested in slavery. Not satisfied with this uniform current of exposition and administration, an appeal has been made to the sword. The sword is now giving its construction. It is cutting the gordian knot that wranglers tied. Any institution is stable while permitted to remain stationary. Any institution is more than half overthrown when friend and foe alike admit its dissolution is possible. The rebellion has done this for slavery. But few institutions can afford to be aggressive. History mentions but two that have not become the objects of successful hostile combinations on becoming aggressive in their character or being represented by propagandist disciples. Those two are Christianity and Democracy. Democracy has been assailed and combined against everywhere and in every age, by every antagonist institution, idea, interest, and tradition. But it has made the villain of England and the serf of Russia free; the blood of the vassal courses through the veins of his descendant risen to the peerage; and France under imperial Napoleon is to-day more democratic in some of the elements of her polity than the United States. The statesmen or conspirators of the South committed the egregious blunder, as well as crime, of making their ideas of slavery and political disintegration aggressive. Not content that slavery should remain an economic institution, a form of labor, a question of profit and loss, a thing inherited from their fathers, both Cavalier and Puritan, a fact in their midst over which they could have little control, they sought to convert it into an active commercial and political power. Slave labor made cotton, and cotton was king. First demanding non-intervention in the Territories, it was suddenly discovered that intervention for slavery was the duty of the Government. And it would be idle to deny that in all the slave States, not excepting the border States, that have clung to the Union there has long been as an offset to impertinent northern agitation a persistent attempt to hedge slavery about with a divinity that would make it an offense to oppose or doubt it. In some localities of the South this spirit and policy amounted to a pro-slavery terrorism and made white men slaves to slavery. This was as unnecessary as injurious. The friends of any matter have already condemned it when they insist it shall not be discussed or inquired of.

The rebellion has made this not only a question of military force, but has added import and point to the issue by making it a question of moral and political values. The love of the people for their Government, which is in itself a conservative element, has been to a great extent converted into a radical element by the attack of the rebellion on the Government. The policy of the insurgents seems from the beginning to have been to force upon the minds of men the question, which is the more valuable, the Government of the Union or the institution of slavery, by falsely alleging the latter could no longer exist under the former, and by violently offering to destroy one as a means of protecting and extending the other. It has inaugurated an unequal contest. It has raised a false but a terribly practical issue. It has arrayed a mere form of labor against the existence of the Government. Upon the success of the pres-idental candidate of the Republican party, a success the conspirators purposely procured by dividing and demoralizing the only party which could prevent it, before that man was inaugurated as President, before he had an opportunity to do aught that was wrong if he had so intended, while the Government was still being administered by a President the choice of southern people, the process of State secession was commenced, based not upon wrongs done but upon wrongs said to be intended. And this was the great issue made against the Government, that upon the accession of the Republican party to power it had become necessary, in order to protect, defend, expand, and to save the institution of African slavery, that the States where it existed should withdraw from the Government and divide the Union on the slave line. The issue was made, that to preserve slavery the Government must be destroyed. They might have anticipated the counter-issue, equally false, so soon afterward made by the enemies of the institution, that to save the Government slavery must be destroyed. Amid the heats of civil war it was easy to pass from the policy of restriction to the policy of destruction. It has been said extremes meet. They first beget each other.

It will require but little observation of the forces thus arrayed against each other to determine which must ultimately succeed. I do not allude to the material resources for war. I mean the political, agricultural, and commercial influences that must and will crown the war for the Government and the unity of the Republic with success. Upon one hand we have a unity of territory inhabited and controlled by a race that is one; and these unities are only made the more perfect by that diversity in the productions of the parts and the wants of the people which makes them dependent upon and interested in each other. The territory of the United States, bounded on the east by the Atlantic, on the west by the Pacific, on the north by the great lakes, and on the south by the Gulf, with all our great rivers running from north to south, our only two mountain chains ranging north and south, with no deep water-course, high mountain ridge, or desert tract bisecting the continent from east to west, so as to form a natural boundary line between two nations, North and South, makes a fit area for one empire, one people, one Government; and the natural domain of the Republic remains to-day as it came from the hands of the Creator, the Architect of the universe, a geological and geographical unit. This grand temple was inhabited, owned, and governed by one people. The white race of America are one by blood, one in language, one in civilization, one in manners, and one in religion; one by all the material interests on this continent, one by all the strong ties that have ever constituted a unity of race. Upon these two natural and historical unities—unity of territory and unity of inhabitants—are naturally based the union of the States and the oneness of the national Government. Against them we find the avowed that these unities must be severed and destroyed, the Government overturned, and both the territory and the people made twain to preserve a given form of labor, one species of property, the institution of African slavery. Besides the falsity of the issue, aside from the fact that the property or institution to be saved was already infinitely safer under one Government, one territory, and one system of laws than it ever possibly could be under a separate code and government, contiguous to a foreign and hostile nation, it was a fatal error in another view. It was an affirmation that the Government known as the Union was incompatible with the stability of the institution. It was a distinct affirmation and adoption, from a different stand-point, of the doctrine of an irrepressible conflict. The rebels did not seem to perceive the breadth of the issue at arms which they offered the Government. It was more than a mere assertion of incompatibility. It was an avowal that the two could not exist together. This was wholly untrue; exactly the contrary was true.

But from these false premises it was easy to draw the conclusion that one must be destroyed to save the other. The effect of the issue being made and sustained by force of arms, was none the less disastrous by its being untrue. It was a dangerous question to present to the minds of men. It widened and deepened the opposition and created it where it had not before existed.

And many minds not imbued with this opposition, and many who, cherishing it only as an abstraction, would never have sought to make it a political force or element in the administration of the Government, when told by the patrons of the institution that it and the Government could not coexist, were not long in disposing of the question, as they would any other question of value, and easily and correctly decided that as the Government was more valuable to them than any species of property, they would adhere to the Government through all the phases the question might assume. It was a cruel and foolish experiment, this arraying an interest, an institution otherwise much debated, in hostility to the Government, and thus make it the subject of attack and demolition. It gave to the abolition element of the North a new direction and an increased momentum. Many of the party who had merely sought to save the Territories for white men, then became a leveling agrarian democracy who gladly accepted the issue, and now openly and fiercely seek to make this a war for universal emancipation, and the parceling out of the large landed estates of rebel masters. The border State Union men and the war Democrats of the North rejected this feature of the issue offered by the rebellion. The only issues we accepted were the question of our nationality, the question of the right of secession by States, and the military contest for the supremacy of the Government. We would wage the war regardless of the negro, except that being property he is subject to the rules of war, and, if you please, being a man is subject to the command of the Government. Our theory has been to make the war a contest between the power of the Government and armed rebels in the field, and not to embarrass its progress, divide our friends, and consolidate our enemies by side issues of a political character. We would not have the overthrow of slavery as an end or aim of the war, but only the overthrow of the rebellion. We would have the war against armed rebellion pushed to a successful issue, and if injury or even destruction to slavery comes, as I now think it will, as the unavoidable result of "the friction and abrasion of war" let it come; and if there is any responsibility in the matter we will answer by asking, "Who made the war?"

The restoration of the Union under the Constitution, by the surrender of the rebellion before the exigencies of war have done their work, is the only hope for the South and her institutions. It is believed such an offer would be met by a vast majority in the loyal States who would prefer the Union on the old basis to the further carnage, untold debt, and grinding taxes that would come from an indefinite war for any other purpose. But if persistent rebellion requires the war to proceed, there may yet be a Union as it was not under a Constitution as it will be, and such new order of things will be acquiesced in and preferred to secession by many who now ardently long for the Union as it was. But the restoration of the Union as it was, while the very best thing for the South, would not fully restore the institution as it was. Its power as a controlling element in our politics is gone. The opposition to it has been increased. Its territory has been diminished. The rebellion, in its spasmodic attempt to enlarge the area of slavery, has caused it to be driven from West Virginia and the great State of Missouri, and by suicidal violence in its behalf has planted a leaven against it in Maryland, Tennessee, North Carolina, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Kentucky, that will more likely live and grow than die. And other causes are at work. The intelligence, the volition, and the locomotion that distinguish this from other property are excited, educated, and brought into play by the events passing before him and in which he is mingling, an education that would not cease for want of lessons after the success of the rebellion. This kind of education is all against the interest of his master and the peace of society. With him the pageantry of review in his rebel master's camp is not merely pride, pomp, and circumstance. He is learning the effectiveness of arms and the power of combination. With him the labor he performs in the Federal camp is not all mere drudgery. He is becoming educated. He is learning war from the ditch to the evolution of the battalion. From a being of mere imitation and submission he becomes a man of self-confidence and reliance. Add to all this the fact which cannot be kept concealed from him, that the two extremes are claiming the contest to be about him and his condition, and who shall say what such seeds will not bring forth? And when they have borne their fruit what will it be? I confess the future of his relations to his white neighbor is a picture of darkness and gloom to my mind.

The success of the rebellion might postpone but could not avert the doom that now awaits the institution and the race. Under the confederacy abolition and a war of races would come, just as surely (though from different causes) as they now seem to be approaching. The retirement of the seceding States from the Union would result in compulsory relinquishment of all common territory not erected into States. Any attempted expansion toward the Southwest or into Central America, whether Mexico or France be in the way, could only be accomplished by conquest; for though Napoleon may intrigue with the rebels for our injury he cannot venture to become a pro-slavery propagandist. In any such attempt they would have combined against them the Powers of this continent and of Europe, an opposition that has not been lessened by instructions already issued to rebel diplomatic agents abroad to enter into no negotiations looking to the suppression of the African slave trade, accompanied by a construction of the rebel constitution giving to each State the right to open that trade at pleasure. Having achieved their independence they would find themselves surrounded on the West and Southwest by a cordon of free States, which, backed by the sentiment, and, if need be, by the power of the world, would forever bar the door to expansion in that direction. Manifest causes would rapidly shift the slave line southward, and the cotton States would soon find all the slaves of the continent crowded into their borders. While the ratio or relative increase of the blacks would be thus accelerated, that of the whites in the same locality would be decreased by manifest influences. The labor of the blacks would soon place in the possession of the masters all the desirable lands of that region. The poorer and laboring whites would in one generation find themselves the necessary tenants of the swamps, sand ridges, and mountain sides. By a rule of physiology well known they are the people who furnish all the muscle and most of the brains for a nation. Their loss could not be repaired. Their political influence would soon correspond with their meager agricultural resources, and they would seek to relieve themselves from a secondary position in society and government, and better the condition of themselves and posterity by emigration North and West. Already thousands of refugees from Arkansas, Tennessee, Carolina, Virginia, and Kentucky have sought safety, quiet, and a subsistence in that direction. The blacks in the slaveholding regions would soon become far the most numerous. In 1810 there were 1,191,364 slaves in the United States. In 1860 there were 3,953,587, an increase of 300.32 per cent. in fifty years. The same rate of increase would give 11,873,936 in 1910. The increase might not be quite so rapid in the next fifty years, and it would be inaccurate to assume that all of the slaves of 1860 and their increase would be crowded into the cotton States in 1910, though evidently much the larger portion of them would be. We may safely assume 8,000,000 slaves in the States of Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina in 1910. In the whole United States the ratio of increase of the white population is greater than that of the blacks. In the States just named that of the blacks has been greater than the whites for several decades. In 1860 there were in the States just named 2,618,754 whites. How many will there be in 1910? Allowing the same increase as for the blacks there would be 7,864,991. Considering the influences we have just discussed, would there be near so many? Under the system of emigration that would drain those States 4,000,000 would approximate nearer the truth. This disparity and its natural results would soon become apparent to both races. The whites would seek to avoid its results in one of two ways. The master would seek to maintain his authority by increased kindness and conciliation, resulting in the thousand nameless favors by one and liberties by the other, known only between master and slave; or he would attempt to maintain the same authority by increased rigor and severity, on his own part, in the law, and in armed patrols. I now speak of master and slave to represent the whole dominant and servient populations. The first plan would rapidly grow into a system of contract, hiring, villenage, tenantry, losing all the features of the absolute control incident to slavery, until it would merge into the practical, and ultimately the legal freedom of the black man. This process would be greatly hastened if it were sought to lessen their numbers while flattering their vanity by training them to the use of arms to assist in the almost constant state of war that must exist between the two Governments, by the confidence and importance such a course would impart to them; a policy that would also be invited by the scarcity of laboring whites from whom to replenish their armies. This course of events is far less probable than the other; that of increased rigor. That would first be manifested on the plantation and in the domestic circle; but as the disparity in the two populations grew apace, the preservation of the relation of master and slave would become one of the chief objects of legislation. To accomplish the end it would be found that the white or master class would rapidly assume the character of a military police, embracing a vast majority of its members, who would live upon horseback, and wield the arms of the light cavalry service, almost as uniformly as would the blacks the plow and hoe. How long would be required for society to assume this phase, or how long it could be preserved when assumed, are questions not so material as the fact that it would not endure a great while, and would find its denouement in a San Domingo struggle, in which if the whites were successful the blacks would be exterminated as a necessity, and if the blacks were successful the whites would be destroyed as an act of bloody and malignant revenge, leaving that skirt of country in the possession of the black man. And how long would he hold it? Not a half, a quarter, nor a tenth so long as the Indian did after the white race set foot on Plymouth rock. While these events were passing in the South, the North would in the mean time become pressed with a redundant, active, aggressive, adventurous population, sprung from a blood that loves land and power, does not fear war, and despises all inferiors. They would seek an establishment and an easier subsistence in the more genial climes of the South. Pretexts, possibly good causes, for war would not be long wanting, nor would it require much argument in the mind of the northern conqueror to persuade him that his black neighbor was his natural enemy, and that nothing less than his entire landed estate (so illy gotten anyhow) would constitute indemnity for the past and security for the future. But may not all this reasoning as to the course of slavery under the confederacy be illy founded, because it implies the notion that a confederacy based on secession could last two or three generations? Is it not far more probable that a much earlier solution would be had in the shattering and breaking to pieces that must come of secession and petty civil wars run ad infinitum?

Those who dream of elevating the African in our midst to a moral, social, and political equality with the white man will be disappointed. Secessionists and abolitionists are all alike in one respect, and their children will be as their fathers. The freed man will enter the lists as a competitor, and as such will go down. Our blood loves land, loves money, loves power, and despises inferiors, especially Indians and negroes. We will out-work him, out-thrive him, out-trade him, out-learn him, out-fight him, out-vote him if need be; in short, beat him in the great game of life, and he will disappear, partly by violence, partly by that kind rule of diminished increase that favors a race in that condition, and partly by those irregularities that will throw the blood of the two races into an intermediate channel. When war and democracy have done all they can, dissolved the bonds of the slave, it will then be found that the equality of democracy is confined to the limits of a race of equals. Mark already the constitutional provisions to exclude the blacks from several of the free States. When the "American citizen of African descent" shall demand that his equality of freedom gives him a right to social and political equality he will have a smile from a faction and a scowl from the mass. Christianity has been invoked in this great undertaking. Christianity is in some respects the most democratic and in some respects the most conservative power among men; conservative in its precepts for domestic government and obedience to rightful authority, and democratic in its freedom of thought and injunctions of personal justice. This great power is active and aggressive; it goes everywhere and permeates all institutions; and a wholesome democracy, either latent or developed, follows in its wake. It has converted the white master and the black slave, brought them into the same sanctuary where they attend upon the same ministrations, and, in thousands of cases, they kneel in prayer every night around the same family altar. But Christianity has not made the two equal as races, and democracy will fail to achieve what Christianity has omitted to attempt. Democracy equalizes in a legal sense the son of the President and the son of the pauper; in a few generations it brought to an equality the son of the hereditary nobleman and the son of the meanest feudatory. But this is only equalizing castes and discrepancies of position among men of the same blood. Accident, force, law, custom, separated them for a while, but democracy brought them together on the same plane. It has not done this and will not be able to do it for the Caucasian and the African. This demand for a forced and sudden equality of all men, when it reaches the point of popular or epidemic political fever, not only demands the abolition of all privilege and distinction for the future, but cries for blood as a revenge for the past. Persons perfectly innocent, or even useful or amiable in their own characters, are ruthlessly destroyed for being the representatives of an hereditary and condemned inequality. It demands there shall be no distinctions of authority but those founded on virtue and genius; that every avenue in society and State shall be open to every human being; soon punishes as a crime distinction won by virtue and genius, and ends by submitting to power won by crime. Fame is an inequality, and its possessor must be beheaded or banished. Hemlock and ostracism were the familiar rewards of citizens grown too great among the ancients. In France the Convention, the Commune, and the Committee of Public Safety beheaded one set of generals for being defeated, on the ground of complicity with the enemy; and beheaded another set for being successful and winning the confidence of the soldiers, on pretense of fearing a dictator. Their popularity was dangerous; it was a conspiracy because it might be improperly used. Whether used well or ill it was an inequality not to be allowed. Under other forms of government great deeds excite gratitude or patriotic ambition; under a pure democracy they are only a passport to destruction or exile. Republics are not ungrateful, but democracies are terribly jealous. We have not yet reached that point in our fever. We may reach it and suffer its delirium and cruelties, and pass into the cold sweat of collapse in the attempt to make an equal of the negro, and then find we have not accomplished what God did not will should be.

"Nature is an aristocrat," exclaimed Lamartine, himself a democrat. If he meant as to persons he said too much, if as to races he said the truth. Again, "Equality is written in the law long before it is established in races." If he meant between men or castes of the same race he is right, for there equality is oftener a political idea and a legal right than a personal fact. If he meant equality of or between races it does not exist. Those who think emancipation will solve the whole problem in this vexed matter, have not yet seen the greatest trouble in the case. Dispose of the slavery question and the negro question remains. The same spirit, the same interests, that give freedom to the slave, when brought in contact with the negro will go for thrusting him out of the community as a foreign substance offensive to their theory, one for whom there is neither room nor honey in our social and political hive, whose ejection is demanded by public economy, the public peace, and that public equality they will continue to teach. Viewed from a distance, the relation of master and slave excites their democracy. Brought in contact with the race, the same inexorable demand for equality, coupled with the manifest impossibility of its accomplishment, and the passion of our blood for land and dominion, will make them the enemy of the race. When well analyzed this will be found the chief element and motive power with the extremes in this movement on both sides; and this remark is none the less true because a vast majority of those who rush or float with the tide honestly think they are acting from other motives, and have not yet discovered the real propelling power that is behind them. The form of democracy I speak of is energetic and severe while it lasts, but never lasts long. It is not in the nature of things that it can make a protracted and sustained effort in one direction for even one generation. It subsides, but the leaven of democracy works forever. Our political pendulum, in counting off the centuries of our career, may swing to and fro, but events on this continent will verify what reason teaches, that a pure democracy, or any very near approach to it, is the most impracticable and short-lived of all forms of administration for an extensive empire and a large population; and as often as we are compelled to return from either extreme to our system of delegated or representative authority, and the checks of our three departments, it will be with a renewed appreciation of their value and importance.

A question of race, and, connected with that, a question of land, is the ulterior form which this matter will assume. The system of servitude by which a hundred men work an estate for one owner, and the three fifths rule by which that one owner votes equal to sixty non-slaveholders, are elements that excite democracy, jealousy, and cupidity. The master's power is to be shorn, the slaves to be freed, hired, and cheated, and the land divided among those who win it in battle. I do not mean to speak harshly or unjustly, but this does seem to me to be the tenor and effect of our legislation. A century or half century hence the white man, moved by the same impulses about equality, and the same idea about land, and the same feeling about race, will advance a long but easy stride from the abolition of slavery to the expulsion or abolition of the race he really feels is in his way. To doubt this for a moment is to ignore history and human nature and the fate of the red man. It is proved by the willingness and even the anxiety to thrust the negro into the war; to hold him up as a dark shield between our bosoms and the fire of the rebel hosts. It is claimed that it saves the lives of white men. That is true, and is to the point in more senses than one. It can only save white men by exposing black men to destruction, and then when the war is over that displacement of the race so much desired will have been partially effected. While the antagonism of race is assuming this form of expression at the North, it is assuming quite a different and yet quite a natural form at the South. What has enabled the leader to get into the rank and file of his army, and to make so determined a soldier of the poor and laboring white man of the South? Was it that he had been wronged by our Government, or felt any real opposition to it as such? Not at all. It was accomplished by making him believe the negro was to be set free and made his equal, and that a State had the right to secede to prevent this. He fights for these reasons, and so would many northern men similarly situated. Reverse positions and educations, and many an advocate of universal emancipation would be a devoted soldier under the stars and bars of rebellion, while many a soldier of the pro-slavery secession would be a zealous advocate of universal emancipation. And all for the same causes, developed in different forms and under different lights; democracy and race.

If this ultimate contest of race, and its disastrous result to the black man be thought a harsh or unjust view of human nature, I answer I am not defending the morality of the result, but am only getting my own consent to see a great truth pointed to by the history and the constitution of man, the jealousy and antagonism of races; that latent, instinctive hostility which, when brought into action, sometimes assumes the form of slavery, sometimes of war, sometimes expulsion, and sometimes extermination. It is an instinct among men as it is among animals, and therefore is confined to no age, no climate, no race, no color. It existed between Egyptian and Israelite; between the polite nations and barbarians; between Jew and Gentile; between Roman and Carthaginian; between Castilian and Moor; between the Tartar and the rest of Asia; between the "pale-face" and the red man; it built the great wall fifteen hundred miles long between the Chinese and his enemy, and has existed in all ages between the Ethiopian and the rest of mankind. Similarity of republican institutions did not prevent the free States of the North from volunteering freely to aid in the conquest of the territory of a neighboring republic of a different race, in a war ostensibly to defend the previous acquisition of a slave State, nor prevent the terrible political contest that ensued on their demand that this black race should be excluded from the vast dominions wrenched from Mexico. The free negro exclusion clause of the constitution of Indiana was adopted by a majority of ninety-four thousand votes; and the convention of a political party in that State simply spoke for our race when they said that this vote meant that "the honest laboring white man should have no competitor in the black race; that the soil of Indiana should belong to the white man, and that he alone was suited to her free institutions."

The other really great power in this controversy is the question of secession as a State right, assumed on one side and denied on the other, a question involving the existence of all government. It is the white man's question in this contest, and the effect upon him will be as secession is successful or defeated. With the triumph of the theory of secession as a principle or element in our system of Government, we will repeat and perpetuate on a larger scale the modern history of Mexico, not omitting subjugation by foreign Powers and petty empires under European protection and control. But if this principle is defeated and the success of the Federal arms is accompanied by a constant and earnest recognition of the fact that the Constitution is the "supreme law of the land," our institutions will have been purified rather than consumed by the fire, and strengthened rather than sundered by the iron of war. Its effects upon the political and national education of the people will be that the Constitution is not a loose league between separate and independent sovereignties, to be abandoned at pleasure by the States; but that it constitutes a Government, that it is a charter of powers emanating from and acting upon the sovereigns of that Government, the people. My own views of the way of our political salvation are well defined. We must have the complete, lasting, and overwhelming success of our arms on the field, while the civil law must be wielded at the hands of men who know and feel that the Constitution is a higher law than their own views, their own feelings, their own schemes, and their own prejudices. It is to obey the law ourselves and enforce it upon the rebels at all hazards and all costs. I know this involves a hardship. There are thousands at the South who are fighting for what they honestly believe "a State right"—the right of secession. They have been taught it from infancy, and political error, like error in religion, is believed more ardently than truth. Many more still have been forced into the battle against their will by the unsparing command or the irresistible local torrent of the revolution. But epochs, crises, and generations have their sacrifices, which must be referred for final account to the great system of providential compensations. The time had come when it was necessary to determine whether the United States were a Government. If that question is determined aright, the decision will be worth all its cost, and if it is decided amiss, the children of the rebels of to-day will pray it had gone against their fathers.

Let those who would use the war to destroy anything but the military power of the rebellion beware they do not destroy the Government as well. We may loose a storm we cannot direct as we ride it, nor stay it when we would. Remember that when a republican constitution had been adopted by the Constituent Assembly of France and accepted by the king, La Fayette, Barnave, and others, demanded a declaration that the Revolution was accomplished and that there it should stop. Robespierre and his party urged it forward. It went forward, demanding equality—blood; the king's head fell, then Robespierre's, and the same mob who had followed Louis to the scaffold amid cries of "Vive la republique," a few years afterwards lifted the child of destiny to his vacant throne, making the welkin ring with cries of "Vive l'empereur." A man, a nation, is always equal to duty, not always to destiny or misfortune. There are times when a people cannot control their own movements, but rush headlong with the current, and the current is turned or set by accident. We can avoid this by doing our one duty of fighting the rebellion and leaving the balance with God. By reaching too far we waste our power and miss the mark we might have hit. If this war fail of its original object it will be by attempting too much. If this rebellion succeeds, it will be much indebted for the moral aid sometimes loaned it by ourselves. While there is no safety without military success, our safety does not lie altogether there. We must show that a war for the life of a republic need not become the rude funeral of the liberties of the citizen. We must not press the triple, yet one, idea of "liberty, fraternity, equality," that triune godhead of revolution, so far that our heads shall all come together in a bloody embrace of emphatic equality in a basket under a guillotine we made for others.

If the views I have here presented have foundation in truth the ideas now arrayed against each other and represented by the hostile armies in the field may be classed as follows:

Southern, or Rebel.

1. A fallacious and long-continued political education upon State rights and State sovereignty involving nullification, (the Jefferson school,) and the vicious ambition of secession and southern confederacy, (the Calhoun and Davis school.)
2. The insulence of pro-slavery propagandists and southern leaders, and the jealousy toward free negroes by the southern laborer.
3. Antagonism of Race; manifesting itself at the South in a desire to retain the negro in slavery, and among non-slaveholders in an intense aversion to the personal and political equality of the race.

National, or Union.

1. The unity and the nationality of the Government and its direct action on men and things, (the Hamilton school;) the supremacy of the national Constitution and laws, the political and territorial integrity of the Republic, (the Webster and Jackson school.)
2. The equality of Democracy arrayed against the regulation of master and slave by the Republican and Abolition parties.
3. Antagonism of Race; manifesting itself at the North in the demand for free territory, free States, and the exclusion of the black race from free States; recently demanding their deportation, now desiring them as soldiers and laborers; and will ultimately destroy them by neglect, discrimination, and superior thrift—possibly by war. I apply the latter thought to our race, and not to any party.

I have purposely left out of the account the hate felt by many southerners for "Yankees" and "abolitionists," and by many northerners for "slaveholders" and "slavedrivers," as being prejudices not entitled to the dignity of real, moving, living powers in a great event—prejudices which the much good fighting done on both sides will not fail to dispel. It is to these prejudices and the heated blood of the occasion that we must refer nearly all the irregularities, ungenerous warfare, and unsoldierly cruelties that have occasionally stained this; and this not nearly so much as other civil wars. The combatants are learning from each other that men are not cowards or heroes by races, or by sections; that both qualities are found among all men; and that many more men of all races, States, and conditions have sufficient animal courage to make good soldiers than have moral courage to believe the truth. War is the rude, commerce the gentle pacificator of peoples and civilizations. The first chroniclers of the Crusaders were all harshness, contempt, and bitterness toward their enemies. The latter chroniclers were softer, truer, juster, at times filled with admiration. The East and West learned each other, and mingled their manners and their knowledge, increasing the one and polishing the other. The North and the South will do the same.

A word about Mr. Jefferson. I have meant no disparagement of him by classing him with Calhoun and Davis. But it is a little remarkable that a statesman of such clear and forcible views, such ardent patriotism and renowned services, should have promulgated a doctrine which for a while misled and seduced Mr. Madison, furnished Mr. Calhoun with the material for the political error of a lifetime, the abolitionists with authority for much of their mischief, was the authority for South Carolina nullification; was quoted substantially in the report of the Hartford Convention, and a text for Mr. Davis, who has been a con-spirator ever since he entered public life. There is little more similarity in the politics and character of Jefferson and Davis than there was in those of Hamilton and Jackson. Yet it must be admitted that upon the great antagonistic ideas that have agitated and distressed our national existence they are properly classed—Jefferson with Davis on the side of State independence and nullification, and Jackson with Hamilton on the side of our nationality.

I have not discussed the war so much as the political elements that have led to it, have directed it, and are being developed by it. The subject is intricate. I hope I have been understood. The results will be commensurate with the issues joined. With intemperance we may repeat some of the features of the decline and fall of another great Power, not omitting the sale of the Government to the best bidder by a praetorian band. But avoid the breakers indicated by the miscarriages of other nations, destroy secession, restore the Constitution, and our future, our very near future, will be what no other people have achieved; what no other form of Government can bestow; to combine upon a scale of unprecedented magnitude the homebred and fireside blessings of small States and local administrations, with the security, influence, and power of a great empire. By relying solely on the federative principle for a general Government the centrifugal forces in politics will surely part the Republic. By relying solely on a centralized nationality for all purposes, the centrifugal forces in Government will freeze and disaffect the extremities and engorge the vitals. The happy mean between the two does not need to be invented, but only to be discerned and followed in the skillfully graven lines of our constitutional chart. We are fighting for a Government, for existence as a nation. If, as many suppose, we are remitted from the Constitution to the laws of war, of nations, and of conquest, we are still not without the best of guides for our conduct. There has been no improvement upon the text of Montesquieu in his Spirit of Laws. It is owing to this law of nations, that among us victory leaves these great advantages to the conquered, life, liberty, laws, wealth, and always religion; where the conqueror is not blind to his own interest.

Mr. LONGYEAR. Mr. Speaker, it has been my intention, during the present session at least, to content myself with being a silent spectator, and not take up the time of the House with speaking; while action was of so much more importance to the interests of the country in its present perilous condition.

But the novelty and importance of the measure now under consideration, the anomalous condition of the country out of which it arises, the imperative necessity for action of some kind by Congress now, the great and absorbing interest felt and manifested in regard to it, not only justify debate but demand the freest and fullest discussion.

And the business of the House having been so arranged that debate upon this measure does not stand in the way of progress in those other great measures of the session for supplying men and means for carrying on the war and to sustain the credit of the country, I propose to discuss briefly the bill now before us.

I shall not attempt to go over the whole ground, but content myself with noticing a few of the leading questions involved in it.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the speeches of gentlemen on the other side of the House, made in the course of this discussion, to get an idea, if possible, of the grounds of their opposition to this bill. But thus far I have listened in vain. They have, with scarcely an exception, evaded and dodged the question throughout. My colleague from the fifth district [Mr. BAKWELL] in his speech of nearly an hour in length scarcely alluded to the subject. Has he no reason to give for his opposition to this vital measure? Or does he suppose that his constituents will be willing to accept a hackneyed tirade against the present Administration as a reason why Congress should not make some provision to bring order out of the chaos in which nearly one half of the country is involved by a wicked and causeless rebellion?

Let me remind my colleague that the people have put upon those old complaints against the Administration their seal of condemnation; that his party has been before the people with that same tissue of misrepresentation and misconstruction of the acts of the Administration, and met with a most disgraceful defeat and merited rebuke.

But my colleague's acts, according to his own admissions, are inconsistent with his expressed sentiments. In one breath he tells us that this Administration is corrupt, and that it is conducting this war for its own aggrandizement and the perpetuity of its power; and in the next breath he tells us that he votes for all measures for carrying on the war. In one breath he tells us that the enormous expenditure of money by the Government is for private speculation, for filling the already plethoric pockets of Government contractors and corrupt rulers; and in the next he tells us that he votes for all appropriations the Administration asks for. I suppose this is what he calls being a "war Democrat." Does he thus vote, Mr. Speaker, because he disbelieves the sentiments expressed by him? Or does he feel himself compelled to do so by the indignant frowns of his constituents into whose minds he has not yet succeeded in instilling those sentiments? Sir, a compulsory patriotism of this sort is poor material upon which to rely for the support of the Government and the salvation of the country in perilous times like these.

Mr. Speaker, it has been asked wherein lies the necessity for action upon this measure at this time, and it has been said, Subdue the rebellion first, and it will then be time to talk about governing the country. My reply is this: the necessity for some kind of government goes hand in hand with subjugation. If civil government is not provided for it must be a military government—a thing inimical to the spirit of our institutions, and unknown to them except by the laws of war, and then of doubtful application except to foreign territory and a conquered foreign people. Pass a judicious enabling act, with proper safeguards, of which the people may avail themselves to organize civil governments at the very earliest opportunity, and it will afford a rallying-point for the Union sentiment remaining there, and tend to foster it and nourish it into a healthful and vigorous existence. It will prevent perplexing and complicated irregularities and diversities of action, and tend largely to harmony and strength in our future deliberations. No stronger illustration of the necessity and propriety of immediate action need be given than the case of Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas.

The President's proclamation does not solve the difficulty. As a proclamation of amnesty, as a general outline or plan for organizing new State governments, as a prescription of safeguards and conditions precedent to such organization, it will ever stand as a bright and glorious page in the history of the present Administration. But it is incomplete for lack of constitutional power. That can be conferred by Congress alone, under the power to admit new States.

I am aware that a wide diversity of opinion exists as to the true, logical condition or status of the rebellious States, both while in rebellion and after the rebellion shall have been subdued by force of arms. Some contend that, to all intents and purposes, these States are out of the Union—territory and people—and that they are foreign Powers, and that when subdued we hold both as by conquest, with all the rights of a conqueror on our part, and the rights and disabilities of a conquered foreign Power on their part. Others contend that merely the governments of the States are subverted and overthrown, but that by some kind of spiritualization the States still exist and are in the Union, and that when the rebellion shall have been subdued, all we have to do is to rehabilitate or reimbody that supposed spirituality with such habits and or such body as we may see fit; and that when that is done we have the same old State we had before, but born into a new life. Others, again, contend that the State governments are not subverted or overthrown; that they still exist, with all their rights and obligations, as States of this Union, but that their functions are merely suspended by force of the rebellion; that it is a case of suspended animation merely, and that when the pressure of the military power of the insurgents shall be removed, these governments will spring into action again with full life and vigor, and with all their former powers, rights, and immunities unimpaired. Their motto is, "Once a State of the Union always a State of the Union," on the monarchical idea, I suppose, that the king never dies.

In order fairly to consider these several theories, and intelligently to advance my own, I propose to take a few bearings from an original standpoint.

What is a State, in a general sense, and what is it to become and to be a State of this Union, and what are the true relations of the States in rebellion to the General Government while at war with it, and what will be those relations when those States are conquered?

What is a State? Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, (p. 189, n. b.) says:

"A State, in the meaning of public law, is a complete or self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights, and to do right to foreigners. A State has its affairs and interests; it deliberates and becomes a moral person, having an understanding and will, and is susceptible of obligations and laws."

Such, then, is a State. The people in their primary capacity do not constitute a State. It is the union of the people into one body for the purposes named. Such union is effected through the forms of government. Under our system, those forms of government are made up of and consist in constitutions and laws; from which it necessarily follows that whenever the constitution and laws of any State are by any means subverted, abrogated, or overthrown, the union of the people which made them a State is gone, and they cease to be a State.

One of the attributes of government is sovereignty. Under our theory of government, sovereignty is vested primarily in the people, but, as just shown, the people are not therefore a State. When the people, by virtue of that sovereignty, unite themselves together into one body for the purposes named above, through the forms of government, they breathe the breath of life into that body by investing it with sovereignty; and then, and not until then, does the State exist. When, therefore, the government, the body of the State, dies, what becomes of that sovereignty with which it was so invested, and by virtue of which alone it was made a living soul? It returns to the people, and may be exercised by them de novo, the same as though no government had ever existed.

So much as to the general characteristics of a "State."

Under the definitions above given, and within the general meaning of the term, the Government of the United States is "a State." It is a union of the people, and of all the people, into one body or community for the purposes named in the definition given by Chancellor Kent. "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union," &c., is the language of the preamble to the Constitution. It is the supreme State in all matters within the scope of its powers and jurisdiction. It was invested by the people with a sovereignty superior to, and supreme over, all others that may or can exist anywhere within its jurisdiction.

To become and to be a State of the Union requires the express action of Congress, admitting it as such, and its submission to the Constitution and laws of the Union.

Each State, therefore, owes its existence originally to the mandate and express consent of the supreme State, the General Government; and all the people of each State, and the States themselves, owe primary allegiance to that superior sovereignty.

My view, then, is this: the Government is the State; its soul and essence is the sovereignty with which the people have invested it for certain specified ends; among which ends is obedience to the national Constitution and laws. When such government becomes subversive of those ends, or seeks, by virtue of that sovereignty with which it has been invested, to bring the people in conflict with that superior sovereignty to which they owe allegiance, or when such government becomes abrogated or destroyed by any means, the sovereignty with which it was invested returns to the people, to be exercised by them de novo. When a State has thus, by its own act, become divested of its sovereignty, its soul and essence are gone, and it ceases to exist as a State of the Union.

It does not go out of the Union; that is impossible. That idea involves the absurdity that a State of this Union can exist outside of the Union. It simply ceases to exist when it ceases to be a State of the Union. If in such case it continues to maintain the forms of an existence, by force or otherwise, it is an excrescence upon the body-politic of the nation, to be removed and dissolved to make room for the exercise of national sovereignty and for legitimate State organizations by the people.

The superior sovereignty and jurisdiction cannot be destroyed or impaired by the destruction, subversion, or abrogation of the inferior. And hence when the inferior ceases to exist the national authority remains as complete as before over the entire territory and people.

Territory is not the State. It is the habitation of the State. It prescribes the boundaries of its local jurisdiction. In a governmental sense territory is national, and remains national the same after a State organization as before. To illustrate: the people of any portion of the national territory may go through the forms of organizing a State government by adopting a constitution and electing officers under it, but it cannot occupy a single foot of territory as a State anywhere within the national boundaries, and has no standing; whatever, without the previous consent of Congress. When Congress yields its assent and prescribes the boundaries of the new organization, then, and not until then, it has a footing to stand upon; but national jurisdiction over such territory is not thereby supplanted or impaired. The new organization comes in under and subject to national jurisdiction and sovereignty. And what folly would it be to contend that the national Government could not afterwards assert its jurisdiction and sovereignty over such territory to the entire exclusion of a foreign Power usurping such State government, and even of such State government itself, if subverted and sought to be maintained in defiant opposition to the national authority!

And yet there are those who contend, notwithstanding a State is in open and defiant rebellion against the Federal authority, yet that it is entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities to which it became entitled on being admitted into the Union. This doctrine involves the absurdity that, although it was necessary for such States to submit themselves to the superior binding force of the national Constitution and laws in order to become a State, and be entitled as such to the rights, privileges, and immunities of a State of the Union, yet that a continuance of its existence as a State of the Union and of its rights and privileges as such does not depend upon a continuance of its submission to national authority.

This brings us to a more minute consideration of the questions, "What are the true relations of the States in rebellion to the General Government while at war with it?" And "What will be those relations when those States are conquered?"

We speak of them as States in rebellion. It will be seen that this is not a contradiction in terms, as might at first appear; but that in this idea lies a strong argument that by their rebellion they have ceased to be States of the Union. Those organizations now at war with this nation are not new organizations, endeavoring to supplant and usurp the territory and jurisdiction of the old. They are the same old organizations, operating under the same old constitution and laws. We are not contending to prevent some foreign Power from usurping the government of those States. From the very nature of the case we are not spending all this blood and treasure in endeavoring to aid those States to sustain their position in the Union, and as a part of it, against the depredations and usurpations of some foreign Power. No, sir. As has been already shown, those States have by their own acts ceased to be States of the Union. But they keep up the form of a State government—the same form as before. They have entered into a new confederacy. In both these capacities they constitute a power de facto; and as such power they are endeavoring, not to supplant and usurp the old State governments—it is absurd to say that a power is endeavoring to supplant itself—but the effort on their part is to supplant and usurp the national Government; and it is against that usurpation that we are contending.

We speak of them as States, and call them by their old names; but it is a mere matter of description; a convenient mode of expression. They once were States of the Union. In form they still maintain the same organization and the same geographical boundaries; and as a convenient and ready designation of them as a power de facto we call them by the same old names.

In calling them States, and treating them as powers de facto, we do not concede the right or the legal power of secession. We deny the right of secession, and yet, as in the case of these States, it may become a fact. It has become such, but by wrong, by the highest of crimes, treason, robbery, and murder; nevertheless it is no less a fact. By it, however, came death and dissolution to the body-politic of those States, not by virtue of their resolutions and official or conventional declarations of secession alone, for these were mere nullities, and they were meaningless until followed by action. When followed by action, by forcible resistance to Federal authority, these resolutions and declarations had a meaning. They showed the animus of such resistance, the intention of it, and the extent to which it was intended to reach. They tended to show that such resistance was intended to be by the States in their corporate capacity. They showed that such resistance was not for redress of grievances under the national Government, but for its entire abrogation and destruction, so far as they were concerned; that they became and now are enemies within our borders and upon our own territory; and that the war has been, is, and must continue to be on our part for the maintenance of the existence of the national Government and the integrity of its territory.

We recognize them, however, as belligerents only. They have not been recognized by us or by the nations of the world in any other capacity. When an insurrection becomes civil war and the necessity occurs to treat the insurgents as belligerents has been so ably discussed and elucidated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Broomall] and others on this floor, who have preceded me, that I will not take up the time of the House with any remarks upon that point. It is sufficient for my present purpose that it has been authoritatively determined by judicial decision, and by the action of all the branches of the Government, that this contest is war, and that the rights and immunities of belligerents attach. From which it follows that the contest must be conducted under the rules of war, recognized as such by civilized nations; and further, that in its conclusion and results the contending parties must be governed by the same rules.

The "southern confederacy" and the States of which it is composed have no standing, therefore, except by virtue of those belligerent rights. And hence they must stand or fall by the rules of war. They are belligerents because of their military power; and they will remain belligerents so long, and so long only, as they have an organized army in the field, and because they have it. Everything depends upon the success or defeat of their arms. If they succeed, they then emerge into a civil government, and are entitled to be placed among the nations of the earth. If they fail, if their military power is broken up and destroyed, they are destroyed with it and are nothing. The rebellious States have submitted their right to national existence to the fate of war, and by that fate they must abide.

But who are the parties to the war, and what are the immediate results of conquest by either? The parties are, upon the one side, a portion of the people of this nation in insurrection, organized into a formidable military power and assuming to exercise all the functions of civil government, (through the forms and machinery of government known as States, which had once existed under and as a part of the national Government,) seeking a dismemberment of the nation and the establishment of their own independence; and upon the other side the national Government itself seeking to maintain its integrity.

The integrity of the Government, as before shown, is to be maintained by breaking up the military power of the insurgents, which, as we have seen, must be done under the laws of war. According to those laws the successful party is conqueror and the other is the conquered; and all the rights, liabilities, and disabilities of conquest follow. If we succeed we make no conquest of territory, because that is already ours. We simply succeed, in that respect, in bringing that which is our own again under our control. But we do make conquest of the people, and of the entire people, within the insurrectionary district; because by the rules of war all the people within the enemy's jurisdiction are enemies. By the same laws we succeed to the right not only to govern the conquered but to dictate to them the form of government which they shall adopt, limited only by our own constitutional powers.

It is absurd, and illogical, and in contravention of the plainest rules of war, to contend that States, which have thus formally forsworn their allegiance to the Government and submitted the question to the arbitrament of war, are entitled nevertheless to all their rights and immunities under the national Constitution and laws. As well might it be said that nations at war with each other might insist upon the observance of former treaties of commerce and of diplomatic courtesies. No, sir, war abrogates all compacts, and the belligerents are remitted to the inexorable laws of war in all their intercourse with each other. And there is no difference in this respect between a civil war and a war with a foreign nation.

In our case, so far as State rights are concerned, and to the extent to which those rights exist, we may treat the enemy, when subdued, as a conquered foreign Power; but so far as the powers and jurisdiction of the General Government are supreme or even concurrent, the people at war with it are domestic enemies and traitors, and on being subjugated are liable to be treated as such. Hence, the States thus at war are liable to have their respective State governments and their existence as States treated as abrogated and at an end, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of a subjugated foreign Power. But while this is the case the powers and jurisdiction of the General Government remain just as they were before the war, unaffected and unimpaired, over all the territory of those States, and all the people which shall be found remaining there; and that to the same extent and to be exercised in the same manner as if such State governments had never existed. If rebels and traitors are found there, treat them just as you would rebels and traitors found anywhere within our jurisdiction; convict them and hang them, or grant them amnesty, as may seem meet.

So far, then, as those organizations known as States are engaged as such in this contest it is war to all intents and purposes; and so far as the people in their character as citizens of the United States are concerned it is civil war; in each of which conditions, however, the national Government has the same rights and powers as in the other.

In deciding the prize cases, so called, in 1862, the Supreme Court of the United States laid down the following doctrine in relation to the present contest:

"The present civil war between the United States and the so-called confederate States has such character and magnitude as to give the United States the same rights and powers which they might exercise in the case of a national or foreign war."—2. Black, 636.

And again, quoting Vattel as authority, the court say, (page 667:)

"A civil war," says Vattel, "breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Having no common superior to judge between them, they stand in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest and have recourse to arms."

In this view of the case, and so far as we have the right by the laws of war to dictate terms to the conquered, and grant amnesty to domestic enemies, the proclamation of the President, accompanying his last annual message to Congress, was not only competent, right, and proper, but was clearly within the scope of his war powers as Commander-in-Chief of the military and naval forces of the nation. But when these people, or any portion of them, wish to organize a State government, and be admitted as one of the States of the Union, the consent of Congress is necessary, and upon this point there seems to be no difference of opinion. It is one of the features of this bill to provide for such emergency.

But Congress has not the power to create State governments for the people; it has the power only to admit them as States when organized by the people. Congress, nevertheless, has the power to prescribe the terms upon which such new States may be admitted, and to govern the territory, and the people until State governments are organized and admitted as such. It is another of the features of this bill to meet this latter emergency.

Such, then, are my views of the status of the rebellious States, and the power of the national Government over the territory and people of which they were made up, deduced from principle and authority.

I will not detain the House with any argument to show the justice of the retribution thus brought upon those States by their crime. It seems like a waste of time to discuss so self-evident a proposition.

So much, then, as to the power of the national Government over the people and territory involved in the rebellion. What is its duty toward them for the good of the whole people and the future peace and stability of the Government is still another question.

In ordinary transactions in life, when we set about remedying an evil, our first step is to search for and destroy or remove its cause; or, if the cause be already removed or destroyed, then our efforts, if wise, are directed toward avoiding or preventing its recurrence.

That slavery is the cause of the present rebellion no sane man doubts; and no man whose judgment is not warped by interest or trammelled and tied down by old party bonds, and perverted by old party dogmas, will deny or even cavil about it. And it is equally clear to all thinking men whose minds are free to think correctly upon this subject, that the insurgents will continue the war upon this Government so long as there remains a vestige of the accursed institution to fight for, and they have an army left in the field.

Yes, sir, slavery has hung upon the nation like an incubus ever since it has had an existence. It is no part of the body-politic of the nation. It is an excrescence upon it, a horrible disease that has been festering upon its surface, enfevering the entire system, until at last it has struck at the very vitals of the nation; and unless destroyed and entirely removed the body must die.

As in the animal economy, when any portion of the body is so diseased that the functions of life and growth are materially interfered with, so in this. If there be sufficient vitality remaining, there will be formed what the surgeons call a line of demarcation between the diseased flesh and the healthy, and the former dies and sloughs off, and the body is saved. And as in such cases the skillful surgeon watches for this indication of nature, and when it appears, at once amputates the diseased part, and thus aids nature in restoring the body to health, so in this case the line of demarcation formed, and by the breaking out of the rebellion it became clearly delineated upon the body-politic. The diseased portion—slavery—at once commenced to die and slough off. The President, like the skillful surgeon, although perhaps a little tardy, applied the knife of emancipation; but it remains for Congress to finish the operation. Let us complete the work with a bold hand and strong nerves, and at once and forever remove this poisonous ulcer, this vile excrescence, from the body of the nation, and thus not only save its life, but restore it to renewed health and vigor. To aid in bringing about this result is still another feature of this bill.

I have said that slavery constitutes no part of the body-politic. That is so. It is no part of the national Government. It is neither head, body, limb, hand, nor foot, and constitutes none of its vital functions. The Constitution and the Government are complete without it. What branch of the Government cannot be conducted without the existence of slavery? What part of the motive power, what portion of the fundamental framework or machinery of the Constitution do you remove or interfere with by destroying slavery?

The fundamental elements of the Constitution are those which establish the principles and policy upon which the Government shall be conducted. Slavery was not among the principles thus established. Neither did it constitute any part of the policy upon which the Government was to be conducted. It existed before the Constitution, and that instrument silently suffers its continuance.

Simply that and nothing more. This being the case, how can it be said that we cannot have "the Constitution as it is" unless slavery is reestablished, or at least permitted, in all the territory in which it formerly existed?

That slavery exists by virtue of State laws alone, is a proposition which cannot be, and I believe is not, controverted. Therefore, when those laws cease, no matter by what means, the shackles of the slave fall from his limbs and he is a free man, and that without, and, if you please, in spite of presidential proclamations, and without any legislative or constitutional enactments whatsoever.

As I have before shown, the constitutions and laws of the States in rebellion have ceased to exist, and the people are remitted to their original right to organize new State governments under the Constitution and laws of the Union. As one of the results of this state of things, slavery has ceased to exist. The only object and purpose to be effected now by congressional enactment and constitutional amendment is to prohibit its reestablishment forever; and while we are about it, let the prohibition be universal throughout the entire length and breadth of the national boundaries.

That it is the duty of the Government to do this has become too well established to even admit of argument. It has been adjudicated and determined by the verdict and judgment of the people. It is right in and of itself. It is just, and the people demand that it shall be done. If this Congress does not take the initiative, the next will be composed of men who will. The people are awake to this subject and understand its merits. They are moving, and in the right direction, and almost unanimously in the same direction, that of right, of justice, and of humanity.

True, there still exists a remnant of a once powerful party, but now weak and insignificant in numbers, which from interest or blind party prejudice, or both, still clings to the failing fortunes, and tottering form of slavery, and seems determined to "sink or swim, survive or perish" with it. And notwithstanding that the vanishing demon, proud and self-sufficient even in the very jaws of death, derides their sycophantic fidelity, while it accepts the fruits of their cooperation, yet, with all the tenacity (but none of the purity) of the love and fidelity of Ruth toward her mother-in-law, upon bended knees and with outstretched arms they beseech their once powerful protector as Ruth besought Naomi:

"Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if I ought but death part thee and me."

Sir, in respect to slavery and the slave power, we are in the midst of revolution. This proposed legislation and this discussion are because we are involved in revolution, and are themselves parts of it. In respect to slavery, it is not change merely that is taking place, it is radical substitution; and of what? Of freedom for slavery; and why? Because slavery proved itself inimical to civil liberty, to the Constitution, and to republican institutions.

The slave power, not content with the enslavement of its immediate victims, insisted upon and for a long series of years was conceded the control of the Government, and the enslavement in fact of all its energies, its power, its wealth and its emoluments. At length, through congressional enactments controlled by its interests, and subsidized judicial decisions in furtherance of its purposes, its encroachments became intolerable; and a cry went up from the great body of the people of the free States, and from many in the slave States, against the aggressions of the slave power, and demanded that it should confine itself to its own particular domicile, and not stretch its arms over the entire nation, and attempt to control the liberties of the entire people. It was the voice of Liberty, demanding of this modern Pharaoh to "let the people go." But, like its ancient prototype, its heart was hardened, and it refused. At length the people arose in their might and asserted their right under the Constitution to rule, and said to the slave power, "Henceforth this Government shall be in truth what it is in form, a Government by the people, and you may exist forever, if you will, where you are, but no further shall you go."

Then the slave power rebelled, and, like the ancient Egyptians, sought to destroy the nation it could no longer enslave. For a time we seemed to be drifting about, we scarcely knew whither. But the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night kept us on our way. Slavery, however, lay before us, stretched out across our pathway, and, like the Red sea before the ancient Israelites, seemed an impassable barrier to our further progress, while the hosts of the enemy were threatening death and destruction in our rear.

At length the President of the United States, in obedience to a Power mightier than he, like Moses of old, stretched out his hand over the sea, and a strong east, and a north and a west wind as well, blew, and caused the sea to go back and the waters to be divided, and we went into the midst of the sea upon dry ground; and now those dark waters of slavery that seemed an impassable barrier to us have become a wall of protection unto us, on our right hand and on our left.

The hosts of rebellion, impelled by the same unseen power, are still pursuing, even into the midst of the sea, where certain destruction awaits them. Already are they troubled. Their chariot wheels are taken off that they drive them heavily. Soon the waters will come again—ay, are coming now in the form of a hundred thousand armed men that once were their slaves—upon them, upon their chariots, and upon their horsemen, and all the hosts of the rebellion that shall have come into the midst of the sea after us, together with all those that voluntarily adhere to them, will be engulfed by the closing waters and utterly destroyed, and there shall not remain so much as one of them! And this people shall walk upon dry land, and emerge into renewed national life and vigor, holding an unbroken Union in the one hand, and in the other liberty undefiled and unadulterated, liberty without contradictions, liberty regulated by law, liberty that makes a people free indeed.

Mr. DONNELLY obtained the floor, but yielded to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at ten o'clock and fifty minutes, p. m.), adjourned until Monday morning.

IN SENATE.

Monday, May 2, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUMNERLAND. The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of Commanders James F. Armstrong, William Roncken-dorf, G. H. Cooper, and Lieutenant Commanders McCauley, Potter, McDougal, Temple, Chandler, and a great many other officers of the Navy, who represent that for more than twenty years the number of commanders in the Navy was ninety-seven and that of captains sixty-five, the vessels of our Navy then numbering less than one hundred, and these officers were not deemed too many for the exigencies of the service; and yet at a time when the Navy is being enlarged three-fold in men and ships and subordinate officers, the grade of commander was reduced to seventy-two and that of captain to thirty-six. The result has been to stop promotion among commanders and lieutenant commanders. They say that while the duties and responsibilities of these grades are considerably increased, they are imposed on officers of inferior rank; that is to say, it is required of lieutenant commanders to fill the place of commanders and of commanders that of captains. They represent that we have lieutenant commanders in some instances commanding frigates and serving as fleet captains to large squadrons and filling the duties of captains—their labors alone and not their rank with its immunities at all increased. The pay, too, of these grades was at the same time materially reduced. Feeling aggrieved as the case now stands, they earnestly beg that these two grades of captain and commander may be increased at least to their old figures, which would not increase the aggregate expenses of the Navy, provided the lieutenant commanders, now one hundred and forty-four in number and found by experience to be excessive, be reduced to the necessary limit. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the honorable Senator that some instruction should go with that petition to the committee.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust there will be no necessity for any instruction on the subject. Let it be simply referred to the committee without instructions. It is not usual, I believe, to accompany the reference of a petition with instructions.

Mr. CONNESS. I was going to suggest that the committee be directed to report at an early day. I think that is entirely in order and usual; and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition has already gone to the committee.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of citizens of Livingston county, Michigan, praying for an increase of the duty on imported wool to at least fifteen cents per pound; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of men and women of Belgrade, Maine, praying for the abolition of slavery, and such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. CONNESS presented a telegraphic dispatch to him, from citizens of San Francisco, California, in relation to an extension of the time for payment of duty on goods in bond; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of James W. Nye and other territorial officers and citizens of the Territory of Nevada, praying for such amendments to the act authorizing the people of that Territory to form a constitution and State government as will change the time of voting on the question of adopting such constitution from the second Tuesday in October to the first Wednesday of September of the present year, the day of the general election in that Territory, and that so much of said act as inhibits the taxing of lands until three years after sale by the Government may be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, information in regard to the condition of affairs in the Territory of Nevada; which, on motion of Mr. WILKINSON, was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac Reede, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Helen M. Stansbury, widow of Major Howard Stansbury, of the corps of topographical engineers of the United States Army, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Jane M. McCrabb, widow of Captain John W. McCrabb, praying for arrears of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Alfred A. Belknap, a paymaster in the United States Navy, praying to be relieved from all responsibility for a certain sum of money belonging to the United States which was stolen from him in the city of New York in April, 1863, have directed me to make a written report asking to be relieved from the further consideration of the petition for the present. I move that the report be printed.

The report was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 225) for the relief of certain friendly Indians of the Sioux nation in Minnesota, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 263) to grant one million acres of public lands for the benefit of public schools in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 49) to provide additional ground for a cemetery at the Soldiers' Home; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs. It will be remembered that Congress authorized the President to procure grounds in and about Washington in which to bury our deceased soldiers, and certain grounds were taken near the Soldiers' Home. Six thousand soldiers are now buried there, and additional lands are wanted. The grounds adjoining should be taken if needed. I understand there is some opposition to those grounds being taken, and the idea is to start a new cemetery over the river. The spot where our soldiers are buried will be of intense interest to this capital for ages to come. It is proposed to send the deceased soldiers who may hereafter die over the river to be buried. I hope that we shall have but one burying-ground near the capital for the soldiers that may fall or die in the war. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. WILKINSON submitted an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 159) for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 29th of April, the following acts:

An act (S. No. 66) to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports; and An act (S. No. 181) in reference to donation claims in Oregon and Washington.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLORD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and tenth amendments; and disagreed to the ninth amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865; and it had agreed to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate to the said bill, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; also, that the House of Representatives had made two amendments to the text of the bill, in which amendments it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 47) for the relief of William C. Walker and others;

A bill (H. R. No. 388) for the relief of Jesse Williams; and

A bill (H. R. No. 371) for the relief of the settlers upon certain lands in California.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, with the amendment of the House to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and the amendments of the House to the text of the bill; and

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Finance.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

The bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to move that an extra number of copies of that bill be printed for distribution. I do not know how many, but I suppose the motion must go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must go there unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I think there will be unanimous consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will move that one thousand extra copies of the bill be printed for the use of the Senate, and, if there be no objection, I will ask for action upon the motion now.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that these extra numbers be printed in pamphlet form, as that will be the better form for distribution.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will cost more, as the type will have to be reset.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am informed that that will add to the expense, and I withdraw the motion.

SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HALE. I submit the following resolution, which I desire to have considered in connection with a joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts this morning:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the relief to soldiers at the Soldiers' Home, inquiring into the manner in which the funds for the said institution have been managed, the present condition of the same; and also whether the benevolent purposes of the Government in establishing the same might not be better carried out by repealing the law, abandoning that mode of relief, and substituting therefor pensions to those at present by law entitled to its benefits.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

RIGHTS OF COLORED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to take up a resolution that I offered on Saturday calling on the President for certain papers, which was objected to by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL.]

Mr. DAVIS. What is that resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. A call on the President for certain papers.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be reported.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:
Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, a copy of any opinion by the Attorney General on the rights of colored persons in the Army or volunteer service of the United States, together with the accompanying papers.

The motion to take up the resolution for consideration was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to call attention to the character of that opinion by reading two sentences from it.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no objection to the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course there will be no objection to it; but I merely wish to call attention to the character of the opinion. It relates to a question that has been much discussed in the Senate during this session, and on which there have been opposite opinions. Certain Senators have alleged, on grounds of law and of Constitution, that the colored soldiers had no rights to equality in the Army or volunteer service of the United States. We have now the opinion of the Attorney General to this effect:

"I do not know that any rule of law, constitutional or statute, ever prohibited the acceptance, organization, and muster of persons of African descent into the military service of the United States as enlisted men or volunteers."

And then, in another part of this opinion, after referring to the proviso regulating the pay of soldiers of African descent, he says as follows:

"The act of which the proviso is a part was not intended, in my opinion, either to authorize the employment or to fix the pay of any persons of African descent except those who might be needed to perform the humble offices of labor and service for which they might be found competent."

I understand that this opinion is accompanied by certain papers, among others an important letter from Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, which ought to be printed in connection with the opinion that the whole case may be fairly understood.

The resolution was adopted.

RANCHO BOLSA DE TOMALES.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 216. It is a bill that will occupy but very little time. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 216) to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, in the State of California, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause the lines of the public surveys to be extended over the tract of country known as the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, in Marin county, California; the claim to which, by James D. Galbraith, has been adjudged invalid by the Supreme Court of the United States, and to have approved plans thereof duly returned to the proper district land office; but the actual cost of such survey and platting is first to be paid into the surveying fund by settlers, according to the requirements of the tenth section of the act of Congress approved May 30, 1862, to reduce the expenses of the survey and sale of the public lands in the United States.

After the return of such approved plans to the district office, it is to be lawful for individuals, settlers upon the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, to enter, according to the lines of the public surveys, at $1 25 per acre, the land settled upon by them to the extent to which the same had been reduced to possession at the time of the adjudication of the Supreme Court, joint entries being admissible by continuous proprietors, in order that their respective boundaries may be adjusted in accordance with their several possessions.

All claims within the purview of this act are to be presented to the register and receiver within twelve months after the return of such surveys to the district land office, accompanied by proof of settlement, and the extent to which the tracts claimed had been reduced into possession at the time of the adjudication; and thereupon each case is to be adjudged by the register and receiver, under such instructions as shall be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; to whom the proof and adjudication are to be returned by the local land office, and no adjudication is to be final until confirmed by the Commissioner; but the confirmation by the Commissioner is to be conclusive and final between continuous proprietors, and the correctness thereof is not to be open to contestation in any action at law or suit in equity between them or between parties claiming under them by title subsequent; but any claim not brought before the register and receiver within twelve months is to be barred, and the lands covered thereby, with any other tracts within the limits of the rancho, the titles to which are not established under this act, are to be dealt with as other public lands, but subject to the adjudicated boundaries of the claims which are presented within the limit of the time prescribed. No person under the provisions of this act is to be allowed to enter a greater quantity of land than three hundred and twenty acres.

Mr. CONNESS. A few words to explain this bill. It has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands favorably. It is a bill to enable the settlers upon what was an alleged Spanish or Mexican grant in California to obtain their lands from the United States, the grant having been rejected by the Supreme Court of the United States, and they having settled upon the land and made their improvements and homes there. There are no counter rights to be affected by it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable member from California if the title to the rancho has been settled by any judicial decision in any controverted case.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir; and rejected by the Supreme Court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRADE ON THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senate now to take up and consider at this time Senate bill No. 223. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 223) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes.

It provides that any boat, sloop, or other vessel of the United States, navigating the waters on our northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, otherwise than by sea, shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; which enrollment and license is to authorize any such boat, sloop, or other vessel to be employed either in the coasting or foreign trade; and no certificate of register is to be required for vessels so employed on those frontiers; but such boat, sloop, or vessel is to be, in every other respect, liable to the rules, regulations, and penalties now in force relating to registered vessels on our northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers.

In lieu of the compensation provided by the fourth section of the act of March 2, 1831, to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes, each of the several collectors of customs in the following districts: Pembina, Chicago, Milwaukee, Sault Saint Marie, Detroit, Miami, Sandusky, Cuyahoga, Presque Isle, (hereafter to be called Erie), Dunkirk, Buffalo, Niagara, Genesee, Oswego, Cape Vincent, Oswegatchie, Champlain, and Vermont are to receive an annual compensation of $1,000, and, in addition thereto, the fees now collected under the general regulations of the Treasury Department of February, 1857, and a commission of three per cent. on all moneys collected and accounted for by them respectively; but the aggregate compensation derived from salary, fees, and commissions is not in any case to exceed the sum of $2,500 per annum, subject to the provisions of the act relative to collectors and other officers of the customs, approved February 11, 1846. Whenever the aggregate of salary, fees, and commissions in any case exceeds the sum of $2,500, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the office, for and during the same period for which the compensation is allowed, the excess is, in every such case, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. The fees and emoluments of all kinds are to be accounted for as provided by the twelfth section of the act of the 7th of May, 1822.

The collectors and other officers of customs on the frontiers are to be authorized to charge and collect the same fees as are now allowed by law to be charged and collected by the collectors and other officers of customs.

All the territory, harbors, and waters on the eastern shore of the State of Wisconsin, bordering on Lake Michigan, heretofore embraced in the district of Michilimackinac, and lying within the limits of the State of Wisconsin, are attached to and made a part of the collection district of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin.

There are to be designated and appointed in the mode provided by law two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Oregon, at an annual compensation of $500 per annum, to be paid as provided by law in the case of other like inspectors.

All bonds given by collectors of customs, naval officers, surveyors, and by all officers of the customs throughout the United States are to be approved by the Commissioner of Customs, in whose office they are now required to be filed.

This bill is to take effect from and after June 30, 1864.

The act entitled "An act to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1831, and all other acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are to be repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on the amendments reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POWELL. I should like the gentleman having the bill in charge to explain the effect of the law this bill proposes to repeal—I do not know what it is—and whether it confers on these vessels any greater privileges, before we proceed to act upon the amendments.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps I ought to explain the general character of the bill. The Senate will perceive that it relates entirely to the commerce on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers. It has no application to the sea-coast. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky, I will state that it repeals the act of 1831, and provides otherwise than that act did for the commerce in that section of the country. By the second section of that act it will be seen that British colonial boats, vessels, &c., entering these waters were placed upon precisely the same terms as American vessels. This bill changes that rule, and places British vessels navigating the lakes upon precisely the same footing with British vessels navigating the seas.

The second section of the act of 1831 provided for licensing vessels upon the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers; but it was not uniform with the system adopted upon the coast. This bill repeals that section, and, as will be seen by the first section, provides that they "shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as other vessels." The only effect of this is to produce entire uniformity. I am not aware that in the question of fees or emoluments or anything of that sort it makes the slightest difference.

The fourth section of the act of 1831 provided for the compensation of these officers; and it will be seen by reading the section that it is quite difficult to know what that compensation is. The section is in these words:

"That in lieu of the fees, emoluments, salary, and commissions now allowed by law to any collector or surveyor of any district on our northern, northeastern, and northwestern lakes and rivers, each collector or surveyor, as aforesaid, shall receive, annually, in full compensation for these services, an amount equal to the entire compensation received by such officer during the past year."

That is to say, if we wish to find out what shall be the salary of any of these officers for any future year, we must ascertain what their salary was for 1830. How is that to be ascertained? The compensation of these officers is made up principally by fees, fines, forfeitures, &c., which they collect. The custom-house officers upon the lakes were peculiar in that respect. They had no fixed salary. Their compensation, therefore, depended entirely upon what they could collect from fines, forfeitures, &c., and it was various. This bill provides that at certain points, enumerating them, ten in number, I think, along the northern and northeastern coast, they shall receive a compensation of at least $1,000 a year, and they shall have such compensation as arises from commissions.

Mr. POWELL. Does that make their pay greater or less than the compensation they have heretofore received?

Mr. MORRILL. It is greater in some respects, and less in others. It has been very disproportionate. At Buffalo, Oswego, and some other points, the compensation was very large, while at other points it was merely nominal, demanding no service and securing no fidelity. This bill goes upon the idea that if it is important to protect the commerce of that section of the country it is important to secure the services of men worth at least $1,000 per annum.

Mr. COLLAMER. As collectors?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir. The committee believe that the commerce on that frontier is, particularly at this time, of such importance as to demand an agent in the interest of the Government who is worth at least in that business $1,000. We say, therefore, that at certain points, taking into consideration the importance of those points as we have been able to ascertain them, there may be custom-house officers appointed whose salaries shall be $1,000 per annum, and as much more as they are able to collect out of certain emoluments that are established by the general law of the country. That is the provision of the second section of the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. That includes all the northern frontier?

Mr. MORRILL. The whole northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers.

One other thing, and then I have stated the whole effect of the bill. The custom-house officers on the interior lakes have never had the same compensation and fees as the custom-house officers on the coast. There has been a distinction. We abolish that distinction by the third section of this bill, which is in these words:

"That the collectors and other officers of customs on the said frontiers shall be authorized to charge and collect the same fees as are now allowed by law to be charged and collected by the collectors and other officers of customs."

So that in this respect, as in the respect I have already stated in regard to registering vessels, it makes entire uniformity throughout. This, I believe, is a succinct statement of the effect of this bill.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator inform me why the committee propose to strike out the fifth section of the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. I omitted that. The fifth section provides for the appointment of two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Oregon. That was not congruous to this bill; and upon consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury he consented, or rather recommended, that that section should be stricken out with a view of providing for the matter contained in the section, which he recommends as a necessity, in connection with the establishment of similar officers at other points. There is a bill already reported in the other branch of Congress which makes the same provision, and for that reason we propose to strike this fifth section out of the present bill. The first amendment of the committee was in section one, line six, after the word "as" to strike out the words "may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury," and to insert "other vessels;" so that the clause will read:

"That any boat, sloop, or other vessel of the United States, navigating the waters on our northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, otherwise than by sea, shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as other vessels."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section one, line nine, after the word "trade" to insert "on said frontiers;" so that the clause will read:

"Which enrollment and license shall authorize any such boat, sloop, or other vessel to be employed either in the coasting or foreign trade on said frontiers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section one, line fourteen, after the word "registered" to insert "and licensed," and after the word "vessels" to strike out "on our northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers;" so that the proviso will read:

"Provided, That such boat, sloop, or vessel shall be, in every other respect, liable to the rules, regulations, and penalties now in force relating to registered and licensed vessels."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the fifth section of the bill, in the following words:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be designated and appointed, in the mode provided by law, two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Oregon, at an annual compensation of $500 per annum, to be paid as provided by law in the case of other like inspectors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LYON, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 377) making appropriations for the payment of the awards made by the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 198) to aid the Indian refugees to return to their homes in the Indian Territory.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills of the House:

A bill (No. 119) to regulate the admeasurement

A bill (No. 220) to vacate and sell the present Indian reservations in Utah Territory and to settle the Indians of said Territory in the Uinta valley.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 29th of April the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (H. R. No. 62) fixing certain rules and regulations for preventing collisions on the water;

An act (H. R. No. 367) to provide for the collection of hospital dues from vessels of the United States sold or transferred in foreign ports or waters;

An act (H. R. No. 408) for the relief of postmasters who have been robbed by confederate forces or rebel guerrillas; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 67) to increase temporarily the duties on imports.

CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senate to suspend all prior orders and take up the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is in order, I will move to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the resolution in regard to a quorum, with a view to have it before the Senate. I do not propose to press it to a vote now; but I should like to have the committee discharged from its further consideration. I will state very frankly the reason why I make this motion. The chairman of the committee [Mr. TRUMBULL] is detained from his seat by illness in his family, and will not be here for some time. The Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS], who is also a member of that committee, is also absent, and it is scarcely worth while for us to wait for the report of that committee. I therefore move to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the resolution, so that it may lie on the table, and I shall call it up for a vote at some future day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent; another subject being before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a matter of such fundamental importance that I think it absolutely indispensable that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary should be made on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky object?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir, I object.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall not take up the time of the Senate to explain the merits of the measure before the Senate unless objection be made to it. If Senators do not wish to discuss it, I do not. I think it is plainly the right of that State to have her fund.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps we may as well take up the subject at the present as at any other time, but there are only ten minutes left of the morning hour, and I wish to say something to the Senate upon it. I think it hardly worth while to take it up for ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is already before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to state to the Senator from Maine that after this evening I am compelled to be out of the city for a few days, and I should like very much to have this resolution disposed of to-day if possible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought the Senator was not disposed to say anything about it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not care to discuss it unless objection be made to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have some objection to it; but I do not wish to interfere with the Senator if he is going away.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If a vote cannot be had to-day, I do not care about taking it up; but I hope the Senate will continue the consideration of it until it is disposed of.

Mr. GRIMES. You have only got ten minutes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the Senate will extend the time and pass it to-day. If this resolution should not pass at an early day, there is great doubt about its receiving the consideration of the House of Representatives, and it is a matter that ought to be disposed of. It has been hanging for some time in an unsettled condition, and it is the right of the State of Wisconsin, I think, to have this money.

The resolution, in the first place, provides that the accounts of the State of Wisconsin for her five per cent. fund shall be adjusted in the Interior Department, and the amount found due to her shall be paid, deducting what she and the Territory of Wisconsin have received upon the sale of one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres of land, under what was known as the canal land grant of 1838, subject to a credit, however, for the amount of money expended by the Territory and State upon that work; and also providing for an adjustment of equities of the canal company in respect to that grant.

I received, Mr. President, a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, informing me that the amount due to the State of Wisconsin upon her five per cent. fund, in 1861, was $249,768 70, and that the adjustment up to 1862, added $370 41, making the entire amount at the close of the year 1862, $250,139 11; and I presume, as the Commissioner has not informed me of any subsequent adjustment of the accounts, that none has been made since 1862; and it is known to Senators that the sales of the lands since 1862 have been so inconsiderable that probably a subsequent adjustment will add but very little to this amount, so that the amount in round numbers is $250,000, due to the State of Wisconsin upon her five per cent. fund.

In 1838 there was chartered by the Territory of Wisconsin a corporation known as the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company. The charter of the Territorial Legislature authorized the company to apply to Congress for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the work. That application was made by the company, pursuant to the provisions of the charter, in the summer of 1838. Congress receiving the petition, made an appropriation or grant of lands of alternate sections, which would have amounted, I believe, to about two hundred thousand acres if the entire amount had been received by the Territory. This grant was made to the Territory, but for the benefit of the canal company. The company was organized. There was a subscription of stock, and money was paid in by the subscribers in the expectation that this land would be used to aid in the construction of the work, and would secure its completion at an early day. According to the charter and the land grant, the Territory of Wisconsin became the trustee for the benefit of the canal company; the company was the beneficiary; and it was provided in the charter that the State of Wisconsin after her admission into the Union should have the right to buy out the stockholders, and that this canal should become the property of the State of Wisconsin, but that the State should impose no tolls except so far as would be necessary to maintain the canal and pay expenses. The act of Congress of 1838 granting the land to the company, in view of that provision of the charter provided that if the State purchased the canal from the company and made it a free canal, she should not be required to pay to the company the cost of the canal so far as that cost was paid out of the proceeds of these lands; but that if the State failed to buy the canal from the company and to pay the stockholders their subscription and the interest upon it, then the dividends upon the State stock derived from the sale of these lands and any other portion of the proceeds of the sale of the granted lands should go to buy out the company and to pay the stockholders. This was the equity of the company.

In 1842 the Territorial Legislature of Wisconsin became dissatisfied with its connection with the grant as trustee and its responsibility as such, and petitioned Congress to relieve it from all responsibility about it, and that these lands should be used for general purposes of internal improvement in the Territory, or that the State should repeal the grant. That came before the House of Representatives in 1842, and the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, now a Senator of this body, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD] made a very able and elaborate report on the subject, in which he said that because of the provisions of the charter and because of the provisions of the land grant itself, the canal company had acquired a vested right which could not be disturbed by the joint action of the Territorial Legislature and of Congress, that the company was interested in that land grant to secure a completion of the work, that subscriptions were made to the work by stockholders in the expectation that the land grant would go to secure a completion of the canal, that their stock depended in its value upon the completion of the canal, because if it was left incomplete and unfinished the stock would be worthless; if it was a completed work by the use of the granted land, then their stock would be valuable. This was the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in the House of Representatives, in 1842, and that report resulted in the adoption of this resolution by the House of Representatives.

"Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere with the act of cession without the consent of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company."

I ask the privilege of the Senate to read very briefly from the report made to the House of Representatives in 1842, by the present Senator from Michigan:

"A more important question arises. The company have refused their assent to this proposition of the territorial Legislature; and the inquiry presents itself whether, without that assent, the Federal Government can rightfully exercise the supposed power of repealing the act of cession. From the recitals made above from the charter, and from the act of June 18, it is manifest that the company have an interest in the proceeds of the lands. They constitute an estate in trust, the use of which is to be enjoyed by the company under its charter. The Territory, as a party, can assert no beneficial or pecuniary interest in the fund: its character is entirely fiduciary, and its rightful action can only be in subordination to the objects authorized by the charter. This grant was made for the sole purpose of aiding the company in opening the canal. To this aid, to this pecuniary benefit, they have an undoubted right. If the trustee discharge the duties which it has voluntarily assumed, if it proceed to sell the lands and expend the proceeds, conjointly with the funds of the company, in completing the work, as it is bound to do, it adds greatly to the profits of the company, who are plainly entitled to receive the accruing dividends; and it is the right to the employment of this fund in prosecuting this public improvement, and making it valuable to them—a private, pecuniary right, springing from an executed contract by the United States—that, in the opinion of the committee, erects an insuperable barrier to the repeal of the law without the consent of the company."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to announce the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of this measure. It will not require much time, I presume. I shall not take much of the time of the Senate in explaining what I think are the rights of the respective parties in this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Indiana, I have not the slightest objection to have him finish his remarks, as he desires to go away this evening, but I shall object to further debate on the proposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like, of course, to hear the points that may be made against this measure.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the effect will be substantially to take the whole day from the bank bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it be the pleasure of the Senate I will complete what I desire to say now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the special order be laid aside informally that the Senator may conclude.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that course will be pursued. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It will be observed by Senators that the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives in 1842 arrived at this conclusion, that by the grant of land to the Territory of Wisconsin in 1838 the Territory became the trustee and the canal company the beneficiary, and that the Territory and Congress together could not repeal that grant so as to divest the beneficial interests of the canal company, and a resolution of the body indorsed that view of the committee.

In 1860 the question was before the Legislature of Wisconsin, and the committee on the judiciary of the Senate of the Legislature of Wisconsin made a report upon this subject, and took the same view that was taken by the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives in 1842, so that the House of Representatives of the United States and the Senate of Wisconsin concur in the view that the grant was for the benefit of the canal company, and that the Territory was but the trustee to hold that grant for such benefit. But in 1844 and 1846 the territorial Legislature of Wisconsin showed a disposition to throw off the responsibility that was upon it as the trustee for the canal company, and in 1846 the territorial Legislature passed an act declaring that the Territory would no longer act as a trustee for the canal company, but that these lands should be held for another purpose, and that the money then in the treasury from the lands already sold should be appropriated, not to the construction of the canal, but to the payment of the expenses of the constitutional convention and other territorial expenses. This was the first act of direct repudiation on the part of the territorial Legislature of its obligations under the grant of 1838. From that time forward none of the funds arising from the sales of the granted lands were used in the construction of the canal, but the funds were used in payment of the expenses of the constitutional convention and other territorial expenses of the Territory of Wisconsin. But when the territorial Legislature refused further to apply the funds received from the sale of the granted lands to the construction of the canal, and violated its obligation under the trust, it had the good conscience to provide "that the faith of the Territory and future State of Wisconsin is hereby pledged to repay to the said canal fund the sum which shall be diverted in pursuance of the above resolutions to the purposes aforesaid, whenever the same shall be required to be repaid, for the purpose of executing the trust created by Congress in making the 'canal grant,' and all laws contravening these are hereby repealed." So that when the territorial Legislature said that the money received from the sale of the granted lands should be used for the payment of the territorial expenses, it said that the faith of the Territory and the faith of the new State of Wisconsin should be pledged to return to the canal fund the money which should be thus diverted.

During the same year, 1846, Congress passed an act to enable the people of the Territory of Wisconsin to form a State government and a State constitution. One of the provisions of that law I will read:

"That five per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands lying within the said State, which have been or shall be sold by Congress, from and after the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making public roads and canals in the same, as the Legislature shall direct."

This is the ordinary appropriation to the western States upon their admission into the Union of five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; but in this case by the act of 1846 this five per cent. fund was to be used in the construction of public roads and canals in the State of Wisconsin. The constitutional convention which was organized pursuant to this enabling act met in 1848, and among other resolutions adopted these:

"1. Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, requested, upon the application of Wisconsin for admission into the Union, so to alter the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river,' approved June 18, 1838, and so to alter the terms and conditions of the grant made therein, that the odd numbered sections thereby granted and remaining unsold may be held and disposed of by the State of Wisconsin as part of the five hundred thousand acres of land to which said State is entitled by the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of public lands and to grant preemption rights,' approved the 4th day of September, 1841."

It will be recollected by Senators that under the act of 1841 the new States were entitled each to five hundred thousand acres of the public lands. This first resolution of the constitutional convention of Wisconsin asked Congress so to modify the canal grant that the unsold portion of the granted land should constitute a part of the five hundred thousand acres coming to the State of Wisconsin. The fourth resolution was:

"4. Resolved, That Congress be requested, upon the application of Wisconsin for admission into the Union, to pass an act whereby the grant of five hundred thousand acres of land, to which the State of Wisconsin is entitled by the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of public lands, and grant preemption rights,' approved the 4th day of September, 1841, and also the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands, lying within the State, to which it shall become entitled on its admission into the Union by the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to enable the people of Wisconsin Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union,' approved the 6th day of August, 1846, shall be granted to the State of Wisconsin for the use of schools, instead of the purposes mentioned in said acts of Congress respectively."

By the act of Congress of May 29, 1848, admitting the State into the Union, it was provided:

"That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the first, second, fourth, and fifth resolutions adopted by said convention, and appended to said constitution; and the acts of Congress referred to in the said resolutions are hereby amended so that the lands granted by the provisions of the several acts referred to in the said first and fourth resolutions, and the proceeds of said lands, and the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands therein mentioned, shall be held and disposed of by said State in the manner and for the purposes recommended by said convention."

"Provided, That the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin under the act entitled 'An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river,' hereinbefore referred to, shall be paid and discharged by the State of Wisconsin."

These are the laws to which I feel it important to call the attention of the Senate, to understand the respective rights of the General Government and of the canal company, and the obligations of the State of Wisconsin, from which the Senate will perceive that the land grant of 1838 was made by Congress to the Territory, not for its own benefit, but for the benefit of the canal company, to raise a fund to complete the construction of the canal, and after the canal should be constructed, to secure the payment to the subscribers of the money subscribed by them with seven per cent. interest thereon; that the Territory became the trustee, the canal company the beneficiary; that in 1846 the Territorial Legislature repudiated the trust, disregarded its obligation after it had in part sold the lands, and after a portion of the proceeds of the sales of those lands were in the territorial treasury it directed the appropriation to other purposes not in accordance with the obligations of the trust, and in 1846 Congress enabled the people of the Territory to form a State constitution and State government, and said to the people that they should have five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the construction of roads. The convention then asked Congress to modify that so that this five per cent. should be used not for the construction of roads and canals, but for the benefit of common schools in the State of Wisconsin. Congress agreed to that, agreed that this land grant should no longer be used for the purpose of constructing the canal; Congress agreed to the application of the convention that the proceeds of these lands should not go to the subscribers of the amount of money paid in in accordance with the original obligation, but that it might become a part of the five hundred thousand acre grant under the act of 1841.

Now, what was the effect, sir, upon the canal company? It was to defeat the construction of the canal, to leave it an incomplete work; no proceeds could come from it; there could be no dividends upon the stock; the stock was left worthless upon the hands of the subscribers in consequence of the breach of the trust by the joint action of the General Government and of the Territory of Wisconsin. But when Congress agreed to this diversion of the fund it provided that the State of Wisconsin should pay to the canal company what was her due, as I construe this last provision of the law:

"Provided, That the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin under the act entitled 'An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river,' hereinbefore referred to, shall be paid and discharged by the State of Wisconsin."

What was the obligation of the Territory of Wisconsin which Congress said should be discharged by the State of Wisconsin? That obligation we find in the resolutions of 1846 passed by the Territorial Legislature, to the effect that because the Territorial Legislature had diverted this fund and had used it to pay the ordinary expenses of the territorial government, the State of Wisconsin should refund to the canal company the amount of money that was taken out of the fund. Congress said that obligation should be discharged by the State of Wisconsin, inasmuch as the Territory had disregarded the obligations of the trust, and had said that the faith of the Territory and the faith of the State should be pledged to the refunding to the fund of the amount thus diverted.

It may be claimed, sir, that under the original grant of 1838 the State of Wisconsin owes an obligation to the General Government to pay all the money that has been realized from the sale of these lands back to the general Treasury of the United States. I do not think so. From an intimation made by the Senator from Maine the other day, I think he so understands the obligation of the State of Wisconsin. I will give two or three reasons, which I think that Senator will very readily appreciate, why there is no such obligation. The language of the act of 1838 in the sixth section is:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Wisconsin shall be held responsible to the United States, and for the payment into the Treasury thereof, of the amount of all moneys received upon the sale of the whole or any part of said lands, at the price at which the same shall be sold, not less than $2 50 per acre, if the said main canal shall not be commenced within three years and completed within ten years, pursuant to the provisions of the act creating said canal corporation."

The ten years expired in 1848; but this diversion took place before the expiration of that time. The money that was realized from the sales of the granted lands was diverted by the Territorial Legislature to other purposes prior to the expiration of the ten years. Now, what obligation does this impose on the State of Wisconsin? It is provided in the land grant, I admit, in the sixth section, that the State of Wisconsin shall pay to the General Government all money that shall be realized from the sale of these lands if the canal is not completed within ten years; but I ask Senators to refer to the seventh section upon this subject, in which it is provided:

"That, in order to render efficient the provisions of this act, the Legislature of the State to be erected or admitted out of the territory now comprised in Wisconsin Territory, east of the Mississippi, shall give their assent to the same by act to be duly passed."

The State of Wisconsin has never given such assent; she has never assumed this responsibility. Taking these two sections together, then, they amount to just this: that the State of Wisconsin shall be responsible to the General Government for the amount of the sales of these lands at $2 50 an acre if the canal is not completed within ten years, provided the State of Wisconsin, by an act duly passed, shall agree to this responsibility. The State of Wisconsin never did agree; she never was a trustee; she never had any obligation to complete this canal.

But there is another and a very powerful reason upon my mind why the State of Wisconsin is not responsible under this sixth section, even if the seventh section were not found in the same act; and that is, that the General Government itself was a party to the diversion of this fund from the purpose to which it was granted. If the Territorial Legislature had diverted the fund; if the Territorial Legislature had reduced the price of these lands, and had used the money for other purposes than those contemplated in the grant, there would be some force in the argument if it were not for the seventh section; but this diversion of the canal fund was agreed to by the General Government. The constitutional convention asked Congress, when it admitted Wisconsin into the Union, to agree that this fund should be thus diverted, that the canal grant should no longer exist, but that the lands granted by the act of 1838, instead of being used as they were pledged to the canal company for the construction of the canal, for the payment to the subscribers of the money that they had invested in this work on the faith of the grant of these lands, should become a part of the grant under the act of 1841. Congress agreed that these lands should be no longer a fund for the construction of the canal; should be no longer a fund to repay to the subscribers what they had thus invested, but that these lands should become a part of the five hundred thousand acres to which the State of Wisconsin was entitled under the act of 1841. Congress itself agreed to this diversion of the fund. Can it now say to the State of Wisconsin, "You are responsible in law or equity because you have thus diverted it?" Can Congress say to the State of Wisconsin, "We will hold you responsible for the penalty, because this canal was not completed in ten years," when prior to the expiration of the ten years Congress itself said that a very material fund should be diverted from the completion of the canal? I say that in equity Congress cannot say so, without reference to the provision of the law which said that the State should not be responsible unless she agreed by an act duly passed to assume such responsibility.

Mr. President, I should like, if I had the time, to read the very able report in full which was made to the House of Representatives in 1842; but I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate long enough to do that. I beg leave, however, to call the attention of Senators to that report, which they will find incorporated in the report that I have felt it to be my duty to make to the Senate on this question. I also ask the attention of Senators to the report made by the judiciary committee, in the Senate of Wisconsin, recognizing these equities and obligations. The whole question is this: Congress, in admitting the State of Wisconsin into the Union, said to her, "You shall discharge the obligations that were upon the Territory of Wisconsin," and I ask Senators what were the obligations upon the Territory? They were the obligations of a trustee, as if I held land in trust for the benefit of the Senator from the State of Wisconsin, and I diverted the fund, I abused the trust, and instead of using the trust property according to the contemplation of the trust itself used it for another purpose. Such was the condition of the Territory of Wisconsin. She accepted this trust, because after the grant was made she by an act of her Territorial Legislature, in 1839 or 1840, appointed officers to take charge of these lands; she authorized them to sell the lands, to take charge of the funds, and to pay the funds out as the work upon the canal progressed. She accepted the trust, and accepting the trust she incurred the responsibility and obligation of a trustee for the benefit of the canal company, and in 1846, when she violated this trust, she said that her faith was pledged, and that the faith of the State of Wisconsin should be pledged to the canal company to place back in this fund the money thus diverted.

Then if Congress in admitting the State of Wisconsin imposed upon the State the obligation which rested upon the Territory, that obligation is a very plain one. The Territory was under no obligation to pay any money to the General Government. That was not in the law making the grant; and by the act of admission Congress simply required the State of Wisconsin to meet the obligations of the Territory; not any new obligation, not the obligation that might have been resting on the State of Wisconsin under the act of 1838; but Congress required the State of Wisconsin to discharge the obligations that were upon the Territory of Wisconsin. What were they? Not to refund to the national Treasury the proceeds of the sales of these lands. That was not imposed on the Territory. It was attempted by the act of 1838 to impose that obligation upon the State of Wisconsin, if she should assent thereto, by an act duly passed; but such an obligation never rested upon the Territory of Wisconsin. The Territory assumed to the canal company the obligation to pay into that fund again the money which had thus been diverted, and Congress said to the State, "If you come in under these resolutions, if you are allowed to use your five per cent. fund as a part of the school fund instead of a fund to construct roads and canals, you shall consent to discharge the obligations of the Territory toward this canal company." It seems to me to be a very plain question. It is simply, what was the obligation of the Territory toward this company? It was the obligation of a trustee, as I have already said, an obligation which she recognized in the resolutions of 1846, to refund all the money that had been diverted contrary to the letter and spirit of the act making the grant.

This was regarded, Mr. President, as a very important grant to the Territory of Wisconsin, then sparsely settled. It was desired by the Territorial Legislature to encourage settlement in that portion of the Territory between Milwaukee and Rock river, and for that purpose this corporation was established by the charter, with authority to come to Congress to secure this grant. It was not the Territory that applied to Congress; it was the corporation that applied to Congress for the grant of lands, pursuant to a recommendation in the charter. The corporation got the grant for its benefit, recognized to be for its benefit everywhere, plainly for its benefit, so recognized by the United States House of Representatives in 1842, so recognized by the judiciary committee of the Senate of Wisconsin in 1860. It procured the grant and enjoyed it until 1846, when the Territorial Legislature said, "We will use this money not to complete this canal, but to pay the expenses of the Territory." It was so used; but the Legislature said, "We will refund this; we will pay it back to this fund." And Congress said to the State when the State was admitted, "You shall assume the obligation and responsibility that is upon the Territory;" and that was a plain obligation. It was not a confused obligation, not an uncertain one, but it was a plain one, the obligation of a trustee to respond in equity for the abuse of the trust, an obligation which the trustee has recognized.

It may be asked why the adjustment of the questions in dispute between the State of Wisconsin and the canal company should be brought before Congress in connection with the proposition to pay to the State of Wisconsin her five per cent. fund. The reason of that is plainly this: when Congress said in 1848 that the State of Wisconsin might come into the Union, it said that the State should enjoy this five per cent. fund, provided she paid to the canal company the money that had been taken out of that fund; the constitutional convention in 1848 asked Congress to modify the grant; Congress did so modify it, both in respect to the land grant and in respect to the five per cent. fund, making them both a school fund instead of a road fund; but Congress said in making that modification that it was upon the condition that the State of Wisconsin should discharge all the obligation that there was upon the Territory of Wisconsin in respect to this trust; Congress did not provide that the five per cent. fund should go to the State except upon that condition; and now when the State asks to receive this five per cent. fund, it is the duty of Congress to say to the State, "You shall discharge that obligation before you have the five per cent. fund." In 1848 Congress connected these rights and obligations together; they have remained together ever since; and Congress in adjusting the one must adjust the other.

I suppose no Senator doubts that the State of Wisconsin is entitled to her five per cent. fund. That is not questioned. It is the plain law, recognized in two enactments. The act providing for holding a convention to form a State constitution said that the new State should have the benefit of five per cent. of the sale of the public lands within her border. The act admitting her into the Union said that she should have this five per cent. fund. That cannot be questioned. It is her legal right, her plain right, accompanied, however, with the condition that she shall pay into the canal fund the money that had thus been diverted.

I apprehend, however, that the only question which can be made in respect to this claim is one to which I have adverted, and that is that the State of Wisconsin is bound to pay into the national Treasury the proceeds of the sales of these lands at $2 50 an acre. I think I have sufficiently answered that objection in advance. I think I have answered it sufficiently by referring to the very next section of the act of 1838, which provides that the State of Wisconsin shall not be thus bound to pay this money into the national Treasury unless she first agrees to it by an act duly passed. I think I sufficiently answer it in the equity that the legislation of Congress has raised in respect to this matter. Congress agreed to the diversion of this fund; Congress, before the ten years had expired, agreed that a very important fund for the construction of the canal need not be used for that purpose, but that it might be used for the maintenance of common schools in the State of Wisconsin; Congress said in 1838, by the sixth section of the act, that if this canal was not constructed in ten years the State of Wisconsin should pay into the national Treasury the amount of the proceeds of the sales of these lands at $2 50 an acre, but the next section said that the State should first assent to this by an act duly passed; but further than that, Congress agreed before the ten years expired that instead of making that canal, these lands should go to maintain schools in the State of Wisconsin.

Now, can Congress claim that the State shall respond for these lands? Can Congress say that there is a forfeiture on the part of the State in not completing the construction of the canal within ten years, when Congress agreed to the diversion of the fund which was to secure its construction? If the ten years had fully elapsed before the diversion, there would be some force in the argument; but they had not elapsed, the work was then incomplete, the time had not expired, and Congress said: "You may use these lands and their proceeds for another purpose; we absolve you from the obligation to make the canal and the obligation to pay the money into the Treasury dependent upon the non-completion of the canal." Who, then, can say that there is an obligation on the part of the State of Wisconsin, after Congress has assented to a change of the grant from the purpose of constructing the canal to the purpose of maintaining schools in Wisconsin, that the State of Wisconsin is bound to pay anything into the Treasury of the United States?

The proposition before the Senate is that there shall be paid to the State of Wisconsin what shall be found her due upon an adjustment of the accounts by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, for the five per cent. fund; that she shall be charged, however, as against that fund with the lands sold, but credited with the amount that was appropriated in the construction of the canal, and she shall be credited with the amount that is to go to the payment of the canal company for the rights secured under the grant, under the charter, and under the resolution of 1846. After a very careful examination of this question I became thoroughly satisfied that the resolution which the committee has reported to this body secures the legal rights and equities of the General Government, the State of Wisconsin, and the canal company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This joint resolution will now be laid aside and the regular order of the day taken up.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by the pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On the subject of currency and banking now pending before the Senate, I desire to submit two or three sections which I may offer as amendments to the bill in the Senate, and I ask that they may now be received informally, and be ordered to be printed.

The order to print was made.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "section," in line seven-teen of section twenty-eight, the words:

Nor shall it hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage or hold the title of any real estate for a longer period than five years.

It will be seen from the provisions in the bill that there is no inhibition upon any of these associations from taking possession of or receiving the profits of mortgaged property indefinitely. There is an express provision in the section which I have moved to amend, allowing any of these associations to purchase real estate, in discharge of its debts, at sales for that purpose; but there is no limitation upon the time that the associations shall hold that real estate. The result might be that these associations might become large landholders, large monopolists of real estate, and they would have the privilege of holding it indefinitely. It seems to me to be a mistaken policy to authorize so gigantic an institution as this an unlimited power to acquire, by purchase at sales in discharge of its own debts, real estate, and to hold that real estate indefinitely. My amendment proposes that no association shall hold the title and possession of any real estate for a longer period than five years. It may be convenient sometimes, and it may be necessary to the interests of the institution, that it and some of the associate institutions should have the privilege of purchasing real estate to satisfy their own debts; but when they have made such purchases, it seems to me that good policy, to prevent a large and exorbitant accumulation of real property in the hands of these associations, especially those that may be most wealthy, would require that they be restricted as to the time that they may hold the possession and title to the estate.

Mr. GRIMES. The amendment does not except the banking houses I think.

Mr. DAVIS. It relates only to the real estate they may acquire by sales under judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The clear legal effect of the language would be to prevent their holding their own banking house.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought I had made the provision in conformity to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, but I see I have not, and I will now put it in this form:

Nor shall it hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage or hold the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it, for a longer period than five years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have known in my own practice cases where creditors have been unable to sell property for a longer period than five years by reason of the laws of the States. This provision may operate very injuriously and be hard on the banks. They may not have the power to sell the property under a foreclosure, or upon a judgment, or upon their lien within the five years although they may advertise it every quarter day. I think the limitations contained in the bill are ample. We provide, first, that they shall hold no real estate except for the accommodation of their business as a banking house; second, that they shall only take mortgages for preexisting debts, that they shall not take mortgages as securities for debts but only for a preexisting debt; third, they may hold real estate deeded to them in satisfaction of a debt; fourth, that they may hold land purchased at sales upon judgments, decrees, and mortgages held by the association. I think we have limited them so far as any banking law I ever heard and probably a little further. I wish to accomplish the object the Senator has in view, to prevent the banks from accumulating a large amount of real estate, but I think the provision proposed by him may restrain them or compel them to sell unreasonably or may even impose on them an impossible condition. I have no objection to any reasonable restraint on their acquisition of real estate.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand the provisions in the bill, as explained by the Senator from Ohio, there is no restriction upon any association as to the amount of real estate it may purchase in discharge of its debts at a sale to satisfy its debts, and there is no restriction as to the length of time during which such property shall be held by the association. So long, then, as the association exists as a corporation, it may hold real estate to any amount that it may purchase. A banking association authorized to issue $300,000,000 of paper, located in its branches all over the United States, might by the effect of these provisions acquire an enormous amount of real estate. I do not recollect exactly whether this general banking association is to exist forever or only for some definite number of years; but as long as the association continues to have a legal existence, it may purchase without limit real estate in satisfaction of its debts, and it may hold all that it may thus purchase as long as its legal existence continues. It seems to me that it would be impolitic and might turn out to be mischievous to allow a bank thus indefinitely to acquire and indefinitely to hold the title and possession of real estate. I think it is a monopoly in the acquisition of real estate that ought not to be allowed to a bank. The time of five years which I have fixed within which to compel it to part with the title and possession of real estate that it may purchase in satisfaction of its debts, may be too short, but I should think it would be ample. If that time is too short, let a further extension within a reasonable period be proposed. It seems to me that five years is ample time to enable a bank to make every prudent and proper arrangement in the disposition of any real estate it may purchase in satisfaction of its debts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I have another amendment to offer, to come in at the end of the thirty-first section:

But every association doing business under this act shall, within six months after the existing insurrection and rebellion shall have been suppressed and the laws of the United States shall be duly and regularly executed in the States where their execution is now obstructed, redeem with gold or silver coin of the United States their notes of circulation at its own office.

Mr. President, I am no friend to this measure, and I never profess friendship to men or measures unless I feel it. I entertain the deepest hostility to this scheme, but still if it is to become a law my desire is that it shall be as perfect of its kind as practicable. I think the first amendment which I suggested was proper, and will improve to some extent the bill if it becomes a law, and that the bill will become a law I suppose there is no doubt. The amendment that I now propose I think of the most vital importance.

There never was a highly commercial country on the earth that had for any considerable length of time an irredeemable paper currency. There is a higher and a more imperative law in relation to currency than can be imposed by the legislation of the Congress of the United States, or even by our Constitution, and that is the general law of the world. By the universal practice, by the inexorable judgment of the whole commercial world from ancient times to the present, money, the great representative of value, has been gold and silver coin. There have been, to a limited extent, exceptions in other metals throughout all time as to coins of a small fractional value, which are made sometimes of copper and sometimes of other metals; but the great currency, the great representative medium, the money of the commercial world, has always been in the main constituted of gold and silver. It will remain so in the future as it has been in the past. The Congress of the United States cannot by its act change that inexorable and uniform law of the world. Whatever measure we may pass and whatever arrangements may be adopted by our Government for the purpose of establishing a permanent irredeemable paper currency will prove futile and we will have to return to the metallic standard. The process of transition from a metallic currency to irredeemable paper is always attended with a vast degree of inconvenience, of loss, and of ruin; and so is the transition back to a gold and silver or mixed currency. There may be certain exigencies, certain great necessities in the condition of a country, that require a temporary resort to an irredeemable paper currency, but whenever they occur, as in our revolutionary war, they are of temporary duration; they are transitory and fugitive in their nature; the exigency that demands them must soon pass away; and then it is a law of commerce and trade, required by the universal usage of the world, that the country having made this temporary resort shall return to the uniform and universal money of gold and silver, according to the practice of all commercial nations. The nation that persistently stood out against this general law of currency would be subjected to a commercial outflow.

I think it was a great mistake, and a most mischievous policy on the part of Congress, when two years ago we resorted to the issue of demand notes, and made them a substitute for a metallic currency by making them a legal tender. I voted for the first proposition to issue demand notes, and I voted for it, not that demand notes were, or could be made by a law of Congress, money in the sense of the Constitution of the United States, for I entertained no such opinion as that. The idea of coining money out of paper, in the sense in which the Constitution and those who made it understood the coining of money, to my mind was an absurdity; but from the condition of the country at that time, the inability of our Government to obtain money by loan from Europe, and the pressing demands, as represented to us by the Secretary of the Treasury and his friends in the Senate, for an immediate supply of money to the amount of some twenty-five or thirty or forty millions—I do not recollect the exact sum—and the utter impracticability, as it seemed to me, to obtain it in time to answer the extreme exigencies of the Government in any other mode, I was induced, against the powerful argument of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] to vote for the demand notes, and to give them the characteristic of a legal tender. The argument of the honorable Senator staggered my mind in relation to the legality and the constitutionality of making that kind of paper a legal tender, even to answer any need of the Government, however extreme. I have investigated the question more maturely since, and my subsequent inquiries and reflections have satisfied me beyond all doubt that there was no authority in the Constitution for attempting by legislation to give any such character to our demand notes. I see from a paper which has reached me this morning from Kentucky that one of our judges has decided that the "greenbacks," as they are termed, are not a legal tender, because they are not money according to the sense in which the Constitution of the United States uses that term, and therefore that Congress, under its power to coin money has no authority whatever to establish such a laboratory for irredeemable paper money as now exists at the Treasury Department.

The resort to such a system ought never, according to my poor opinion, to be tolerated unless under the most extreme and pressing necessity, and a necessity of such a nature that the evils resulting from the failure to such resort would be overwhelming, of such a character as beyond all question vastly to outweigh any inconveniences and injuries that might result from the resort to an irredeemable paper.

Mr. President, I have always entertained the opinion, at least since the decision of the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that for the purposes of a fiscal agency Congress had a right to charter a United States bank; but I have doubted the power of Congress to authorize the bank to issue a currency. That it would have the power to give the other functions of a bank to its fiscal agent for the convenience of the collection, custody, disbursement, and transfer of its funds from one point to another, I entertain no doubt; but I seriously distrust the correctness of the position that Congress, under the power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," can resort to any such indirect and irregular power as to authorize its fiscal agent to issue paper to circulate as money, even though it is redeemable in gold and silver; but that Congress have no power to substitute a declared irredeemable paper money as the medium of values, as the representative of the commercial transactions of the country, under its power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," in my own mind I entertain no doubt whatever.

Well, now, sir, this act proposes to organize and give permanence to a gigantic association to issue upon the basis of the bonds of the United States a paper currency which is to exclude all other paper currency, and itself to carry no obligation or promise, nor to have any provision whatever for its redemption in gold or silver. The project is against the usage, the practice, the uniform, irreversible and immovable judgment of the commercial world, present and through all the past ages, and will prove to be not only impracticable and worthless, but the cause of enormous disorder, mischief, and ruin in the public affairs and private business of the whole country. As long as it exists and operates it will exclude from circulation the only legitimate measure of value, in which the balances of the trade of all nations are settled, and indispensably necessary to the vast internal trade and business of the United States, and substitute for it a spurious paper currency whose daily fluctuations would cause an amount of confusion, loss, and ruin too wide-spread and great to be estimated. It would bring the finances of the country, public and private, its trade, its entire business into general disorder and chaos, and our only deliverance its utter repudiation, and a return to the only legitimate, safe, and universally recognized measure of values, a gold and silver coin; and yet the return to the true principle would inevitably cause more of bankruptcy and demolition than the whole course of the aberration from it.

I therefore conclude that if Congress had the power to establish this Briarean paper monster, it would not only be unwise but fatal legislation. All the attempts of other nations to establish and continue a permanent irredeemable paper medium, and to force it to be received even in the transactions of their own people, have signally failed. It requires great public stress to give it even a fugitive existence and toleration; and so soon as that passes the people on whom it was intended to be fastened rise in irrepressible force against it, and they are urged forward and sustained by the outside pressure of the world. I think the time has come when Congress, and particularly the Senate, should renounce distinctly all purpose to give permanency, even continuance after this war shall be over, to any such monetary monster. There ought to be a reasonable time for the country to make the transition from the present exclusive and greatly depreciated paper currency to a mixed one of paper and metal, and a notification in the solemn form of this amendment would not be too early or too long.

It is the suddenness of the transitions from a metallic to an irredeemable paper currency, then of the change back again to a specie currency, that falls so calamitously upon the country. Where those changes are inevitable and must be submitted to there ought to be timely and reasonable notice given of them, that the merchants and business men and the whole community may adapt their transactions to the coming change. An omission to make such a notification at this time would not impart to the proposed measure any more effectiveness for good, but might leave it greatly more potent for evil. The whole brotherhood would be admonished to do their business so prudently as always to be prepared to redeem their circulating notes with specie, if thus cautioned; if not, they might aggravate existing evils by the excess of their issues and business.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose we all concur with the honorable member from Kentucky, that as soon as possible there should be a resumption of specie payments by these banks, and by all other banks in the United States; but in order to accomplish that, I think my friend from Kentucky will at once see that it will be necessary that the United States should also resume specie payments. As long as the United States has outstanding her currency which she has made a legal tender it will be impossible for these banks to resume; and after the United States shall have withdrawn from circulation her legal-tender notes, the banks will be under an obligation to resume specie payments. It seems to me, therefore, with due deference to the better judgment of my friend from Kentucky, that it is premature now, for that reason, if there were no other, to offer such an amendment as he has suggested, although, to repeat, I am sure we shall all agree in hoping that the time will soon come when that object can be accomplished.

But it is unnecessary, as far as the banks to be organized under this bill are concerned, for another reason. The last section of the bill reserves to Congress a right to change the charter in any way, at any time; and whenever, during the existence of the rebellion, or after the existence of the rebellion, Congress shall see proper to require it, they may require these banks to resume specie payments.

There is another reason that operates on me which I will briefly suggest for the consideration of my friend from Kentucky. These banks will, of course, have very extensive loan transactions all over the country. They are organized for that purpose, and they will be sure to carry it out to the whole extent of the power, if they can do it with anything like safety to themselves. Their loans, therefore, will be very heavy; and it is necessary, also, as they are to substitute to a certain extent the currency which the Government is issuing, that that currency should be outstanding as long as the rebellion lasts. The only excuse, if I may be permitted to apply that term to legislation that Congress has already adopted, for the existing legislation in relation to the currency is the necessity in which the country is placed, the war being upon us, and it being supposed, in the judgment of Congress, that you could not carry it on upon a currency based upon specie. They were obliged, therefore, as they thought, to go further than had ever been done before to make these Treasury notes, or certain of those notes, a legal tender.

The honorable member's amendment professes only to begin to date its operations from the period when the rebellion shall have been put down and the authority of the Government and of its laws reinstated; and when the rebellion is to be put down and when the authority of the laws is to be reinstated nobody can tell, or how it is to be brought about; whether it is to be the result only after a long contest, wasting individual wealth as well as national wealth, or whether it is to be brought about suddenly as the consequence of some decided and crushing victory which the United States will obtain over their foes, nobody can tell. One thing we know, at least I think we must know, that as long as it lasts we cannot return to a specie-paying currency. If I am right in that, in what condition would the country be placed as far as the customers with these banks are concerned, if the banks, when the rebellion shall be put down, are required to return to specie payments within six months? How are they to accomplish it? They are to contract all their loans at a fearfully rapid rate of discount. Every man who is indebted to them $10,000 has to pay it in six months, when without ruin he would perhaps not be able to pay it for four, or five, or six years. We have the example of England, an instance which shows that we ought to be very cautious, as I think, in fixing any specific period, and particularly if that period is made comparatively a very short one, for a resumption of specie payments. I do not think I am mistaken when I say that the Bank of England was authorized to arrest her specie payment during the wars of England with Napoleon, and it was not until six years after the termination of that struggle that she was able to resume, or if she was able or would have been able by pressing her own debtors, it was, in the judgment of Parliament, improper that those debtors should be called upon to pay their debts, except during a period of six years. The ability of the bank to meet her payments while preserving at the same time the interests of the customers of the bank, in the judgment of Parliament was thought to require that the bank should have the prolonged time in which to resume specie payments, and it was given her.

Now, what would be the situation of my friend's State if his amendment should receive the sanction of Congress? The banks in Kentucky or the banks elsewhere—for these banks may loan everywhere—may loan to citizens of Kentucky some six or seven or eight million dollars, whatever may be the amount, take mortgages to secure the debt, get judgments binding the real estate of their debtors; they may be perfectly willing to give time; the mortgages may be an effectual security, in the judgment of the bank, if the Government do not interfere; and so in relation to the land affected by the judgments. But if the bank is compelled to return to specie payments within six months from the period when the rebellion shall be closed, and the rebellion is closed soon after those debts are contracted, Kentucky would be ruined, or rather such of her citizens as might become borrowers of the banks.

I submit to him, therefore, first, that it is not necessary to make such a provision as this, because under the law we may do it at any time hereafter, and we cannot now know the circumstances which may render it improper to impose so hard a condition upon the banks or the customers of the banks; and secondly, because when the Government herself resumes specie payments, by withdrawing her own circulation effectually these banks will be compelled to pay specie, and they cannot be compelled before, because they will have the same right that everybody else has to use the currency which the Government itself has declared is a legal currency.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I suppose that confidence is always the basis of credit; and that one reason why greenbacks now are at such a heavy discount is the great distrust which is felt in the country of their ultimate redemption. That want of confidence results in a large degree from the quantum of greenbacks that have been issued as well as from the suspension of specie payments by the Government. I believe the Government suspended specie payments before the banks. The banks of New York continued to redeem their paper, if I understand the fact, although they had nominally suspended, after the Government had suspended specie payments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I beg leave to correct him as to the matter of fact. The banks resolved to suspend and did suspend specie payments before the Government did; and they gave as a reason for suspending that they supposed the Government would have to suspend, but they suspended first as a matter of fact.

Mr. DAVIS. So I understand the fact, sir; that the banks of New York city made an order to suspend specie payments; but nevertheless they continued to redeem their paper in gold and silver until after the Government had suspended.

Mr. COLLAMER. Until after the Government had got away from them from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and ninety million dollars in gold.

Mr. DAVIS. I am aware of that. The Government gathered together all of the gold and silver of the banks, and instead of drawing drafts upon the banks that had made subscriptions to the Government loans and allowing those drafts to be met at the counters of the banks, if I recollect aright the Government distributed that specie widely over the country, and therefore made it in a great degree unavailable for the convenient business of the banks and for the interests of the country.

But, Mr. President, I was making this general remark: that depreciation in paper marks the degree of want of confidence in its redemption, as a general rule, and that the great depreciation in greenbacks now results from the deep distrust of the country of the ability of the Government to redeem them; and that this want of confidence has been increased essentially by the quantity of greenbacks that has been thrown into circulation. The agents of the Government reproach the State banks with having created this inordinate circulation of paper, whereas the contrary is the fact. By the evidence of one of the financial officers of New York, Mr. Van Dyck, the amount of issues by the banks of New York is less by a million and a fraction of dollars in this year, 1864, than it was in 1854; and in fact, the actual circulation, by the retention by some of the banks of large amounts of their own paper, was six or seven millions less than the amount of paper they had been allowed to put in circulation. The agency that has brought this great excess of irredeemable paper circulation upon the country has been the Government, acting principally by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the reproach which has been cast by the Administration and its supporters upon the banks of having created this ruinous excess of circulation is true of and ought to be made against the Government and the Secretary of the Treasury instead of the banks.

This circulation has become so redundant, so excessive, as to create serious and general apprehension that it might never be redeemed. The consequence has been that its depreciation as compared with gold and silver has progressed from time to time until it has reached its present great point; and how long it will be before it will attain a still lower depth and become as valueless as Continental money, nobody can tell. Certain it is that if this war continues upon its present scale with its gigantic expenditure of money, and with the enormous and still increasing circulation of irredeemable paper, the credit of that paper must be wholly lost, and it will be regarded by the country as worthless, and will cease to answer any of the purposes of money.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator permit me to correct a statement he has just made?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hold in my hand a tabular statement of the circulation of the banks of New York, showing an increase of $8,629,799 in the last year.

Mr. DAVIS. I have got a table too, which makes a very different showing.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is a statement of the banks of the whole State, not of the city of New York alone.

Mr. DAVIS. My statement was made by Mr. Van Dyck. It is succinct and very luminous. He says:

"The public should be aware that all the plates of all the banks in this State, corporate, associated, and individual, are in my possession, sealed against use and securely locked from reach of the banks. Not a dollar can be printed without an order from this department, and not a dollar is furnished save upon the deposit of security. Hence our books furnish an incontestable data of the amount of currency delivered to the banks. And what do we find as the result? I take the close of the fiscal year for ten years past as a criterion by which to judge the present, and it shows as follows."

He then proceeds to give the amount of capital and circulation for each year. I will only read the amount of circulation:

Date.	Circulation.
Sept. 30, 1854.....	$43,962,535
" " 1855.....	41,159,794
" " 1856.....	43,492,485
" " 1857.....	41,243,922
" " 1858.....	35,607,180
" " 1859.....	36,581,276
" " 1860.....	38,024,300
" " 1861.....	36,606,140
" " 1862.....	45,239,836
" " 1863.....	42,192,045
April 18, 1864.....	42,802,310

"Thus it will be seen that the aggregate circulation issued and outstanding at this time is more than a million dollars less than it was in 1854; although the banking capital has increased more than twenty-five million dollars within that period. The amount of circulation above stated includes all ever issued to the banks and not returned. More than a million dollars belonging to institutions which have passed out of existence has probably been lost, burned, or otherwise destroyed. Then again, of the circulation thus standing charged on the books of this department, less than thirty-five million dollars was in actual circulation on the 12th of March, 1864, as appears from the sworn statements of the banks just made in obedience to law—the balance being in their possession, unissued. With these official facts and figures in view will any person kindly inform the public where the charge of 'inflating the currency' comes in, as it regards the banks of this State?"

The circulation of the banks of Kentucky was restricted in a greater ratio in that period of ten years than was the circulation of the banks of New York. I suppose, from the inferences authorized to be drawn from the circulation of those two States, that the amount of State bank circulation in 1864 was less than it was in 1854. I think it is stated, as a general truth, that the amount of the circulation of the State banks is about one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy millions, while the Government paper, irredeemable in its character, is enormously over that sum in its aggregate amount. The great and ruinous circulation of irredeemable paper which so disorganized all the commercial transactions and business of the country, threw everything into confusion, and produced such fluctuation in prices, was produced mainly by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. Right at this period of the Senator's statement I will ask him if he noted that it was authoritatively stated that temporary credits had been extended recently by the banks of the city of New York alone to the extent of $200,000,000; and whether inflation and speculation are not founded upon those extensions of credits as much or more than upon bank issues?

Mr. DAVIS. I was not advertent to the matter of speculation at all. I was limiting my remarks exclusively to currency and to the effects of currency upon trade and prices.

Mr. CONNESS. I knew the line of the Senator's argument very well; but the entire argument went to prove that the Government was responsible for all the inflation that occurred in trade.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; I did not say in trade. The inflation of paper that is to be received as money in all Government and private transactions, of course, is the cause of the increase of prices. That is said to be the paper representative of prices. If that paper representative of prices assumes an irredeemable feature, and is increased four or five fold in the course of something like two years, it must necessarily produce a great augmentation in the prices of all property when measured in that paper, that paper being irredeemable, and being at a heavy discount in gold and silver. I believe it has reached as high a point as to require $180 in paper to purchase $100 in gold. The Government has endeavored to inculcate the banks as the authors of this great inflation of the circulating medium, although the Government itself has been the chief agent in producing the excess of paper issue, and consequently is more responsible for the heavy depreciation in the paper circulation, under the par of gold and silver, than the banks.

But these remarks were incidental and are leading me away from the point upon which I was commenting, and it was simply this: that for a paper currency to receive the confidence of the country and to circulate at anything near par, there must be a stable and general belief that it will be redeemed in gold and silver. Why, sir, it is that convertibility that is the true responsibility of a paper currency. It is its attribute to be redeemed by those who issue it in gold and silver at the pleasure of the holder that imparts to it the faculty of money. Whenever this responsibility to be redeemed in gold and silver coin by tale is dispensed with by the laws of Congress, or ceases from any other cause, the inevitable consequence is depreciation in the value of the paper. The Government itself has been the principal author of the great depreciation of its own paper: first, by issuing it without any promise or obligation to redeem it in coin; secondly, by its frequent and excessive issues. If the Government had not interfered with the banks it is a problem whether they would have been driven to the suspension of specie payments at all; certainly not in the condition in which the country and business then were.

But to maintain at anything like par in gold and silver the credit of this paper issued by the Government, or of these notes of circulation which it proposes to give to every association that will do business under this act, there must be a firm confidence in the country that it will ultimately be redeemed in gold and silver. Unless you can produce that conviction and that faith the credit of this paper will fluctuate from causes that cannot be controlled, and eventually in a short time it may become as worthless as the Continental money itself. Anything that tends to sustain the credit of that paper would be beneficial to the country. Any feature in this bill that would restrict the issue of paper by these associations, and that would command the faith of the country that it would so operate, would help to sustain the credit of their paper and proportionately to keep down inflation of prices.

It seems to me that the amendment I propose, if it should be adopted, would have such a result. It would satisfy the people, as far as they could be assured by the legislation of Congress, that specie payments were to be resumed within a reasonable time, when every holder of a dollar of this paper might calculate upon receiving for it a dollar in gold or silver. It would admonish those who are to manage these associations not to do a business so large as to leave them unable upon short notice to redeem their paper with gold and silver. They would ponder well their contingent obligation to redeem their paper, and the probability of the occurrence of the events upon which that obligation was to become absolute, and they would keep prepared by the most prudent banking. In that way it seems to me that two essential elements of confidence in this paper on the part of the people would be established.

Again, the act of Congress organizing this system, making an imperative requisition on the whole association to redeem their paper with the precious metals, would have the effect to assure the public that such redemption would be made at no very distant day, and thus aid materially not only to prevent further depreciation, but to enhance the present value of that paper.

If the Government of the United States were to retire now one half of its paper that is in circulation by funding it, what would be the certain and immediate effect? The confidence in that paper, in the ability and the disposition of the Government to redeem it within a reasonable time, would at once greatly increase; the discount upon it and the price of gold would decline; the commercial and general business transactions of the country would assume a more stable and healthy character. Any causes which would curtail the present enormous paper circulation of the Government and would keep down its future issues and restrict the circulation of these associations would be productive of great good, and ought to be favored both by Congress and the Executive, and the amendment which I have proposed should therefore be adopted. It would tend materially to prevent excessive and fraudulent banking by these associations and mitigate the inevitable evils consequent upon their coming to specie payments, to which the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] adverted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Foster in the chair) put the question on the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask for the yeas and nays. Mr. CONNESS. Wait until we get into the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well. I will withdraw the call now; but I give notice that I shall ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment in the Senate.

ONE HUNDRED DAYS' WESTERN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the permission of the honorable Senator from Ohio to report from the Committee on Finance a bill which is considered rather important to be passed to-day if we can. It is a very simple one, making an appropriation for the purpose of paying the troops that have been accepted by the President from the western States. It is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) for the payment of volunteers called out for not less than one hundred days. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. I am also directed by the same committee to report back the Senate resolution on the same subject, (No. 47,) to appropriate $25,000,000 for the subsistence and pay of militia called out by the President, with a recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have action at once upon the House resolution, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) for the payment of volunteers called out for not less than one hundred days, which appropriates the sum of $25,000,000 for arming, equipping, clothing, subsisting, transporting, and paying volunteers that may be received by the President for any term not less than one hundred days.

Mr. HALE. I object to its consideration to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We may as well consider it now as to-morrow unless the Senator wants time to look into it.

Mr. HALE. I do not want time to look into it; but I am opposed to the adoption of the resolution. I think it unwise. I think our experience in three years of war, if it has learned us anything on earth, has learned us, in the first place, that the calling out of three months' men at first was an unwise measure, and the calling out of nine months' men was an unwise measure. I do not know whether we have had any six months' men or not.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. We had some six months' men, I understand, and I think the calling of them out was an unwise measure. I think if we pass this resolution it will be throwing away $25,000,000. Such an appropriation as this will show that we are in that unhappy position spoken of by the younger Pitt in his answer to Walpole, that we "remain stupid in spite of experience."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say that whatever might be my own opinions about that act adopted by the Secretary of War and the President, of course under the advice of the most eminent military authority with reference to the condition of things at present, this measure is thought to be advisable and indeed of great importance at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSON. These troops have been called into service according to law; have they not?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have been received by the President under a tender of them by the Governors of the States.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is an act of Congress authorizing it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir. I do not know that there is any special call under the act of Congress, but the troops have been offered by the Gov-errors of the States and the President has accepted them.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand. What I intended to ask was, whether the act of Congress authorizes the call.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The law authorizes, as I understand it, precisely this: the President is authorized to call out, for any term not exceeding a certain term, any number of the militia of the States or volunteers that he may see fit. I do not understand that there has been a distinct call in this case; but there has been what perhaps may be equivalent to it—an offer by the Governors of the States to furnish this number of troops within a given time, and the acceptance of that offer by the President. It is very easy for him to change it into a call, if he should see fit to do so. The thing being done essentially according to his right under existing laws, there is nothing for us to do but to make the appropriation.

Mr. HALE. Is there a law for it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; a law of long standing; that is to say, not exactly in its present shape; but it is always in his power to call out the militia to suppress insurrection and repel invasion; and two years ago we altered that law, and extended the time for which he might call out the militia.

Mr. WILSON. We extended the term of the militia called out to nine months.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Under the old law the militia were authorized to be called out for a term of three months. At the last Congress we extended the time to nine months. In the present instance these troops have been tendered; the highest military authorities have recommended their employment; and under present circumstances it would be wise, and under some contingencies may be very important. They will relieve a large number of troops in different localities, and enable them to be placed in active service. Whatever, therefore, might be my own opinion, which would be good for nothing on the subject, as it is a military matter, the law standing as it is, the thing being done, and the House of Representatives having passed it with great unanimity and at once, I did not feel authorized, and the Committee on Finance did not feel authorized, to say that they would not recognize it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the law which authorized it to be done, and it makes it perfectly clear that the President has the power to call out the militia:

"That whenever the President of the United States shall call forth the militia of the States, to be employed in the service of the United States, he may specify in his call the period for which such service will be required, not exceeding nine months; and the militia so called shall be mustered in and continue to serve for and during the term so specified, unless sooner discharged by command of the President."

The only question that could be raised, therefore, would be whether the acceptance by the President of an offer of militia by the Governors of the States is a call within the language of the law. On that subject I do not think there is any reasonable doubt.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not seen; and I do not know that there is any specific call; but it is taken in that way. The troops were offered and accepted. It is very easy for the President to change it into a call, and he would undoubtedly do it if it were necessary, but that would only occasion delay. They can be brought out and duly mustered into the service of the United States just as well under this tender by the Governors as under a specific call by the President. It may be said that we give it our sanction by passing this resolution; but that is a mere matter of form.

Mr. POMEROY. I should not like to oppose any measure that the Administration might think necessary for the suppression of the rebellion; but it does seem to me that this is a most expensive service. When we consider the cost of transportation of these men, their outfit and their arming, and the short time they will render service, I repeat it seems to me the most expensive service that the Government could employ. I should not like to vote against it or oppose it; but I confess the whole policy of it looks bad to me.

Mr. HALE. If I understood that anything was done under this call which the public faith was pledged to meet, of course I would not hesitate to vote the appropriation, more or less; but I do not understand it so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that after this offer was accepted by the President, the militia of my own State, which had been organized under the law of the State, was actually called into the service; and I notice in the Ohio papers that I receive that many of the regiments met at the rendezvous yesterday and to-day, with a view to receive orders, and they are now actually under orders. Whether this kind of service is a very expensive one or not is a question on which I may differ with the Administration, but undoubtedly the President has the power to call out the militia of the States, under the act of 1795, and also the act to which I have already referred, the act of July, 1862. That he has accepted the offer of these troops, which is substantially a call, there is no doubt; and, indeed, they are to-day mustered into the service of the United States, and are being organized and enrolled. They were mustered yesterday and to-day in Ohio, and I notice in the papers that in Indiana the same process is going on.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not like to give up entirely in regard to these public measures the discretion which is vested by the Constitution in members of Congress. I do not pretend to be a military man, nor to have the slightest knowledge on earth about this subject aside from that which necessarily accompanies a little mite of plain common sense, which I do pretend to have; but in my humble judgment a more unwise measure than this has not been started since the war commenced. I think it would be well for the Senate to vote against this appropriation in order that it might be taken as an expression of opinion by the Senate of what was wise and what was unwise; and then, after we have refused this appropriation, if we shall refuse to give our sanction to what I think is a very unwise measure, I would go with the Senator from Ohio or anybody else, as far as anybody, to meet the public faith and keep public faith with the soldiers who have been called out under this offer of the Governors of the States and accepted by the President. Believing it, however, to be unwise, believing it to be a measure that can operate no practical utility under heaven for the country, I am opposed to this appropriation of $25,000,000. I wish to take this opportunity of expressing that opinion; and I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. What will the Senator do with the troops called out?

Mr. HALE. I have just stated, if the Senator had listened to me.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose this resolution is intended to appropriate funds to pay the troops alluded to by the Secretary of War in his letter to General SCHENCK, of the House of Representatives, of the 25th of April, in which he says:

"The Governors of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin have tendered to the President, on the 23d instant, a large number of volunteers from their respective States for service during the present campaign. They are expected to number from eighty thousand to one hundred thousand men; their term of service one hundred days from muster in. It is believed they can render useful service. They are to be paid no bounty, and are not to diminish or delay the draft for three years' men in States where the quota of pending draft is not filled up."

I have not looked to ascertain whether the President has the right under the existing laws to call out one hundred days' men; but I presume that an affirmative vote upon this resolution on my part would indicate to the President that I was in favor of calling out this force of one hundred days' men. I will state to the Senate what I believe to be the case: I do not believe the one hundred days' men will be of any service. I think it is perfect humbug; and although I am disposed to support the Administration in anything and everything calculated to put down the rebellion, I will not vote for this measure. I will not vote for it under any circumstances whatever. I do not think the financial condition of the country is such that we can afford to throw away $25,000,000 and perhaps $50,000,000 upon an unavailable and unserviceable lot of men that will do no good whatever. Why, sir, can you drill these men in one hundred days? Will it be possible to have them so that they could be taken into battle within the one hundred days? But it will be answered that they can go into the fortifications; that they can be placed behind our armies; that they can guard trains—

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator will allow me to ask him how long the troops that fought at Wilson's Creek, and who I believe fought very well, had been in the public service?

Mr. HENDERSON. The battle of Wilson's Creek, I believe, was fought in August, 1861. It was fought by troops in the State of Missouri who had been principally in military companies in the city of St. Louis and had been drilled for a number of years. They were as well-drilled men, generally speaking, when they went into the service as there are now in the army of the Potomac. I do not mean to say that all the men who were engaged in that battle were such; but I speak of the Missouri troops. I believe there were some Iowa troops there, but I cannot speak with reference to them.

But, sir, in my opinion, the body of men now called out will be of no service whatever. If it is intended that my vote affirmatively upon a proposition of this character is to authorize the President to call out this body of men, I cannot give it. If the President takes the responsibility of calling out one hundred thousand men for one hundred days to aid in suppressing this rebellion, and then calls upon us to make good their payment by an appropriation here, I will go back and look to the law and see whether the President had the power to call out those men, and if so, I will vote to appropriate the money. But, sir, he must take the responsibility of this act, not myself. I will not vote for any such measure. If the draft is to be enforced why not go on and enforce it? Why not raise troops for three years or during the war? That is the character of troops we want. I see that a draft has been ordered in my State and one or two others; perhaps in Ohio. Am I correct?

Mr. SHERMAN. In all the States named the quota is full, except in the State of Ohio, where there is a deficiency, I am told, of between seven and eight thousand, and that, I have no doubt, will be filled up this week by draft or voluntary enlistments; so that in all the States named the quota of three years' men is full.

Mr. HENDERSON. That cannot be so in Ohio, because a draft has been ordered there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that in Ohio there is a deficiency of between seven and eight thousand, which is being filled up now, and I suppose will be entirely filled up this week.

Mr. HENDERSON. If troops are needed for three years or during the war, the length of time required originally, let them be called out, and I will vote to appropriate any amount of money to pay those men; but I am not in favor of calling out a mob that five or six thousand disciplined troops could run off any field of battle.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the Governors were here I stated to the Governor of my State my objection to this mode of calling out three months' or one hundred days' men. I did not believe it was wise to do it. My opinions on that subject are well known. I think the draft ought to have been enforced long ago, and we ought to rely on a draft for men to serve during the war. But that is not now the question. This offer of the Governors was a patriotic one, intended to enable the Government to withdraw all the regular troops along the frontier and replace them with these one hundred days' men to serve during this campaign. The offer was made from patriotic motives by the Governors representing these great States of the West when they were here. It was accepted by the President of the United States. The men were called out. When I looked at the law I found that the power of the President was ample. By the act of 1795 the President is authorized to call out the militia of one or more of the States to suppress insurrection or repel invasion. Under the act of 1795, therefore, he would have had ample power to call out the militia of any State in the Union for that purpose; but under the law of July 17, 1862, his powers are still more enlarged. It provides:

"That whenever the President of the United States shall call forth the militia of the States, to be employed in the service of the United States, he may specify in his call the period for which such service will be required, not exceeding nine months; and the militia so called shall be mustered in and continue to serve for and during the term so specified, unless sooner discharged by command of the President."

The only question that can arise is whether these men were called for by the President. I take it as a matter of course that an offer by the Governors of these States which is accepted by the President, and a general order issued in pursuance of that acceptance, amounts to a call. It is a call even in the technical sense. He may call for the militia of one State, or of one State and a portion of another State, or of three States; so that there is no doubt about the power.

Mr. HENDERSON. While the Senator is on that point, lest I should forget it, permit me to ask him if an order has been issued by the President on this subject. I have seen no such order, and I have looked to this matter because I was astonished at the proposition when I first heard of it. But I have not seen any order from the President to this effect, and I desire to know if such an order has been issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only refer the Senator to the Military Committee. I suppose as a matter of course that such an order has been issued, because we are asked by the Department for this appropriation. That of itself is sufficient; and I know as a matter of public notoriety that the militia of my own State have responded in regiments to this call, and are to-day being mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the Senator if the militia of Ohio were not being mustered into service by the Governor of the State of Ohio previous to the date of the letter of the Secretary of War, the 25th of April?

Mr. SHERMAN. The militia of Ohio was organized under a law of the State a year or two ago.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did not this recent muster by the Governor take place before the date of the Secretary's letter?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it is taking place in consequence of this call. Governor Brough telegraphed a very patriotic order from here, which I suppose has been seen by Senators, which has been published in the Ohio papers, calling on the enrolled militia to turn out. A number of the militia of Ohio are ready now and probably mustered into the service. The only question is whether we shall deny to these men the pay provided by law. On that question I have no doubt.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me there is a very small question before us. It is admitted on all hands that the President has the authority to call for these troops. He is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and authorized by the laws that we have ourselves enacted to call for them. And now the question simply is, will we pay for them after they have thus been legally called for by the President of the United States?

Mr. HENDERSON. Where is the evidence that they have been called for?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. They have been regularly called for by the Secretary of War, who issued the call with the indorsement of the Governors of these several States; and in accordance with that call very many of these men have volunteered. Perhaps more than ten thousand in my own State have been mustered in.

Mr. GRIMES. That seems to put to rest the question as to whether they have been regularly called for by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; and now the question is, whether we will do our duty by making the necessary appropriation, in order to pay these troops after they have thus been regularly called for. We may entertain whatever opinions we see fit individually or as a body as to the value of these troops when they are called out; but it matters not what may be our opinion on that point; the person who is constituted by the Constitution and the laws of the United States the proper authority to determine their value has settled that question.

The Senator from Missouri will, I trust, permit me to refresh his memory a little in regard to the battle of Wilson's Creek. If I remember correctly, several of those independent companies from the city of St. Louis, who fought so well and to whom is to be attributed, in his estimation, that victory, were under the command of General Sigel, and made a detour around the force of the enemy and did not acquire any particular glory.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa if he understood me to take the glory of that battle for Missouri troops.

Mr. GRIMES. That was the fair inference that was to be drawn from the Senator's remarks.

Mr. HENDERSON. I neither said then nor do I say now anything from which such an inference could be drawn.

Mr. GRIMES. I am indebted to the Senator for correcting me, for certainly such was the impression I had from his remarks.

Mr. HENDERSON. You will find that no such inference can be drawn from my language as reported.

Mr. GRIMES. In the first place, the Senator failed to allude to any other troops than those of Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understood the Senator to ask me in regard to my own personal knowledge of the length of time the troops of Missouri engaged in that battle had been in the service. I stated distinctly that I could not tell in reference to the troops of Iowa, but only in reference to the troops of my own State. Of course I had no personal knowledge of the Iowa troops.

Mr. GRIMES. I think there were two Kansas regiments in that battle; one, certainly.

Mr. POMEROY. Two.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe that to be the case.

Mr. GRIMES. And there was one from the State which I have the honor in part to represent. Neither one of those regiments had been in the service, I think not even the Missouri regiments, but certainly neither the Kansas nor Iowa regiments, had been in the service exceeding one hundred or one hundred and two days. I believe the regiment from my State staid in the service twelve days over their time for the sake of having a fight.

Mr. POMEROY. That battle was fought on the 10th of August, and the Kansas regiments engaged in it had been in service only thirty days.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state once for all, if the Senator will permit me, that the troops on the other side at Wilson's Creek were just as raw as our troops, and the whole argument amounts to nothing. I do not know that there was anything very glorious in the battle. If there was any glory about it the glory was just as much shared by the raw troops on the rebel side as on our own. I suppose it was a victory for the rebels. However, they had some three or four to one of our troops. I know there was some very brave fighting done there. I know that there was some very brave fighting by the Iowa regiment, because I believe General Lyon was leading the Iowa men at the time he fell. I think that was the case; and I do not wish to detract anything from the Iowa troops; but that is no argument in favor of the employment of these one hundred thousand troops now, because the rebels were then just as raw as our own men.

Mr. GRIMES. It only shows that these troops will fight if you put them in the right positions, and if they are properly handled. Why, sir, at the battle of Gettysburg, as I understand, three regiments from the State of Vermont stood in the forefront of the fight, and no troops behaved more bravely or rendered the country more service than those regiments did from Vermont, freshly recruited from the Green mountains. It depends altogether on the character of the man who handles the troops. Whatever may be our opinions as to the value of these troops when brought into the public service—and we do not know in fact where they are going to be placed; we do not know whether they are going to be placed in fortifications that are almost impregnable now or not—it seems to me there is only one course for us to pursue, and that is to pass the appropriation that is asked for to pay them, they having been, as all admit, legally and constitutionally called into the public service.

Mr. CARLILE. Mr. President, if the history that we get of this call in the papers be correct, there cannot be very many of these troops as yet mustered into the service under it. It has only been about a week or ten days since the Governors of these States made this visit. This call did not proceed upon the motion of the President himself, upon whom the law confers the power to call out the militia of the States; but these Governors assemble in the city of Washington and ask the President if they may bring into the service of the United States for one hundred days one hundred thousand men from the different States. To this proposition of these Governors, after a day or two, we are informed, the President has assented.

Now, sir, although, strictly speaking, the law may confer on the President this power, which is given to him to provide for emergencies when the exigencies of the country will not admit even of a consultation of the representatives with the people, I think it would have been at least respectful on the part of the Executive to consult with that department of the Government to whom belongs exclusively the right of imposing taxes on the people to pay the expenses of these calls before he assented to this proposition made to him by the Governors of the States. I am therefore disposed to let this matter stop here at this point—the call being acknowledged to be within the power of the President—to meet the expenses already incurred and which it may be incumbent on Congress to bear; but stop it here. Let us in that way express our opinion to the President that when the representatives of the people are assembled in the Capitol of the nation he should consult with them before he accepts propositions made to him by the Governors of the several States for incurring an unknown liability. A proposition like this places the Treasury of the Union directly under the control and power of the President, who it was intended by the organization of our Government should not control and dispose of it, and the representatives of the people merely sit here to vote money out of the Treasury, without discretion left to them to determine whether they ought to so vote or not. I shall therefore vote against the resolution.

One word more, sir. I doubt if there is a Senator here who is prepared to say that the sum appropriated by this resolution will defray the expense of these one hundred days' men. It may amount to double $25,000,000. We cannot tell what will be the cost. It is not only the pay that is due to them, but they are to be clothed; their transportation is to be paid for; and they are to be taken from the industry of the country at a period of the year when their labor would be more valuable and more productive, so far as the legitimate results of this war are concerned, than any services they can render by being in the Army of the United States for the short period of time for which they are called into the service.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in the lights of the present this call for militia does not appear to me to be a wise one. After this offer by the Governors was submitted I expressed the opinion that I did not believe it ought to be accepted. But, sir, we, the Congress of the United States, have authorized the President at his discretion to call out the militia for any period not exceeding nine months. The Congress of 1795 gave the power to the President to call out the militia. It has existed for about seventy years. The last Congress extended the power and the time for which the militia might be called out. The President, therefore, is clothed by Congress with ample power to call out any number of militia he pleases.

Mr. POMEROY. Under the law of 1795, was not his power to call out the militia limited to the time when Congress was not in session?

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will remember the law was amended so as to give him power to call them out at any time; and we also extended the term of service. The President is clothed with the power to call out the militia. The authority on his part to accept them is in accordance with the laws of the country. I doubt very much the wisdom of this call, for I fear that the money we expend will be to a great extent thrown away. I think the troops we raise ought to be raised for a longer period. In my judgment, the energy, the vigor, and the enthusiasm that will be gotten up in these western States to place these eighty or one hundred thousand militia in the field will spend itself for no great purpose. If this money, this vigor, and this energy were expended upon raising troops for a longer period, we could obtain them. However, the President had the right to do it; and he has made the call, or rather he has accepted the offer of these Governors.

I think it was unwise for another reason—Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if this acceptance is in writing or is it a mere verbal acceptance? Did the Governors call on the Executive and propose to him to do this thing, and did he verbally accept the proposition? If there is anything in writing, I should like to hear it.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the offer was made and that it has been accepted officially and formally, and that before it was accepted the commander of the Army in the field, General Grant, approved of it and advised it. I may be mistaken in this information. This joint resolution was enclosed in a letter written by the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. I think, therefore, nothing can be said in regard to the power of the President to call out these troops; nothing can be said in regard to the mode in which they have been called out. We may doubt the wisdom of this call for militia. If the question were submitted to us to authorize the President to call out one hundred thousand men for one hundred days, I would not vote for it; but the President has exercised the power with which we have clothed him; he has made the call; and many thousands of these men are already embodied and organized. I shall therefore vote for the proposition and leave the responsibility where it belongs, upon the President of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the letter of Mr. Stanton to General SCHENCK. At the close of it he says:

"The impending operations render it expedient that there should be early action by Congress upon the proposition, so that, if sanctioned, all needful provisions may be made in due season."

Meaning thereby that he would not accept the proposition until Congress acted upon it, and if Congress accepted the proposition then he would make provisions for calling out these troops. This is a very late letter, dated on the 25th of April, and I have seen nothing from the President since in regard to it at all.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator must be satisfied that the call was made, or rather the offer accepted, formally and officially; that these Governors have issued their proclamations; and that several thousand men have been embodied or are now organizing under this action of the President.

I understand that these troops are to be used in the fortifications and posts to be held in order to allow the veteran troops to go forward and join the armies in the field. There have arrived in this city to-day several companies of heavy artillery from Massachusetts, who have been brought here to man the fortifications while the veteran troops go forward to the front.

We need all the men we have on our farms, in our workshops, and in our manufacturing establishments. I have urged that we should have authority to raise men by the use of our State and local bounties in the rebel States, both black and white; and it has been met with persistent opposition. I think one of the greatest objections to calling out these eighty or one hundred thousand western men is, and will be felt to be, that it takes those men from the cultivation of their farms—from the raising of crops which are necessary to support the country. I want to put all the men in the field that we need, and overwhelm the rebels; but I want to raise all the men we can in the rebel sections of the country to help to fight our battles. The price of labor has risen every where; the needs of labor are every where upon us both in the workshops and in the fields; and we ought to raise all the black men and all the white men we can in the rebel States. I hope, therefore, that Senators will remember when I call up the bill from the House, as I hope to do in a day or two, to allow us to raise men in the rebel States, that we should favor our own loyal sections of the country, take care of our own labor and material interests, and put the burdens of the war as much as we can upon those States that have raised the banners of treason.

Mr. CLARK. I concur with much that has been said in regard to the calling out of these men for one hundred days; but it seems to me there is another and a further view which the Senate ought to take in regard to this matter. It is admitted that the President has the power to call them out. We gave him by law the liberty to exercise his discretion. He has exercised that discretion.

Mr. POWELL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire be kind enough to tell us what law authorizes it?

Mr. CLARK. I cannot tell the precise date of it. It is the law which has been referred to by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POWELL. That is the law of 1862. I have just examined it, and in my opinion it does not meet the case at all.

Mr. CLARK. That is not the point I propose to argue. I understand the law to give him the power to exercise his discretion to call out troops. I understand him to have exercised that discretion, and to have determined that it was wise to call out these men. It appears that he has done it on consultation with the general commanding in the field and on high military authority. It is known to the country that we are undertaking a great campaign. It is said by the Senator from Massachusetts that money is plentier than men. It is known to the country that we have not got all the men required under the last call; that some places have not filled up their quotas. Now this is the point: when this great campaign is coming off; when our armies are expected daily to meet the enemy in the field, when we need every man we can muster, when the General-in-Chief has said these men are needed, when the Governors of the States have offered them, and when the President has concluded to accept them, I want to know where is the Senator that will say these troops shall not come upon the knowledge he has? I would not have ordered them without more information than I now have; but I certainly will not take the responsibility of casting a vote which shall prevent their coming. It may be that this great campaign may fail for the want of these very men, and the man who refuses them takes the responsibility of defeat.

It is very true, as has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the troops which were enlisted to remain in the States for their defense have been ordered forward. The troops that were enlisted to defend Boston harbor as heavy artillery have been ordered here. Troops enlisted in my State with a promise that they should not be called without the State have been called here, and the men come without a murmur. They say, "We are ready if the country needs us." They enlisted for the State service, but they say, "We will go if we are needed." The Governor of my State has found it necessary to call into the field troops to replace those he has taken out of the fortifications. Will Senators say that these troops shall not come, when the President says he needs them, when the Secretary of War says he needs them, when General Grant says he needs them, and advises that they be brought? Here are five or six companies of a regiment of cavalry that was being enlisted in my State. They could not remain at home until they were mounted. They are ordered here for an emergency; and if those men are wanted in the front they will take their arms and they will go on foot.

The Government mean, I hope, to make this campaign decisive, and will you say it shall not be decisive? Will you say that for $25,000,000 these troops shall not come to the aid of the Government? I for one shall not take the responsibility of throwing a vote against this measure. If my opinion had been asked some time ago, I might have said it was not wise; I might say now, with the information I have, that it may not be wise; but the President has adjudged upon it, the Secretary of War has adjudged upon it, these Governors have adjudged upon it, the commander-in-chief has adjudged upon it, and these men are asked for and called for. Shall they not come? I shall not take the responsibility of giving a vote against it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I feel bound, having reported this joint resolution, that so far as I am concerned the Senate shall not act under any misapprehension of fact. There has been no call, in the technical sense of the word, to my knowledge, and I presume there has not been. The simple fact is that the Governors of these States, believing that it would be well to liberate the regular soldiers there and that these troops would render essential service, and all of them, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, having filled their quota, offered the services of a certain number of men to the Government for a specific period of one hundred days just at the most important period of the campaign, and the President agreed to accept their services. The arrangement was made so that the matter stands precisely thus: the President expected a certain number of men for a certain number of days. The ground on which I put it is, though it is not a call technically it is substantially; under the law the President undoubtedly has the power to call out the militia of the States.

Mr. POWELL. I ask the Senator to tell me what act gives the power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The act which the Senator has in his hands.

Mr. POWELL. I think if the Senator examines that act he will be of a different opinion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator is right I am mistaken.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me get through. I rose simply to set myself right, because I never want to convey to the Senate any idea that is wrong. My notion was that the President had the power; that he could exercise it at any moment. If we do not choose to accept it as it stands, he can, if he pleases, make a formal call, and then we must do it, unless we repeal the law. If I am right in my construction of the law, that having been decided upon, I think it unnecessary and unwise to raise any technical questions upon the manner in which he has acted, he being Commander-in-Chief and having the authority to call out troops.

To be sure it may be said that by this appropriation we take the responsibility, we indorse it. So we indorse action whenever we make an appropriation. All the power that we have in these cases, beyond the power of merely looking into the matter and seeing whether the law has been specifically complied with, is to make or to withhold appropriations. In a time of war, when the military authorities are conducting it, whatever may be my opinion as to the wisdom of their action in a particular line, I am not to cripple the authorities, especially when I cannot understand and there is no reason why I should be made to understand (not being a military man or connected with these things) the wisdom of a particular thing; but I know what my duty here is, and that is to furnish the means. It is very different, as my friend from New Hampshire says, in these days from days of peace, when we can scrutinize their action as much as we please. If I were to be asked my opinion I should say that the men at the head of the Government are but men, and are liable to mistakes, a good many of them; and I think they have in some instances made them; but at the same time when I say that I should say in addition that I do not claim to be even as wise as they are, and not having their amount of knowledge I am more liable to be mistaken than they are in reference to the wisdom of their action, because they are acting in their sphere and I am acting in mine, I believe I have said all I know about this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I know of no statutes upon this subject except the original statute of 1795 and the act to which the honorable member from Ohio referred of the 17th of July, 1862, which is an amendatory act to the act of 1795, or, in the language of the profession, supplementary to the act of 1795. The two acts, therefore, are to be considered together.

It was assumed by my friend from Ohio—of course he thought it was very clear at the time, and the honorable member from Maine has taken the same view—that it was very clear that under the supplementary act of 1862 the President would have had a right to call for the troops who have been offered and accepted by him, and that it is therefore merely a question more of etiquette than anything else, a question of form, whether these men are properly in the service of the United States or not.

The act of the 28th of February, 1795, was passed for the purpose of meeting one of two emergencies: the first was an invasion by a foreign nation or by the Indian tribes; the other was an insurrection in some one of the States, and it was proposed, in anticipation of such an insurrection as we had afterwards in Pennsylvania, to give to the President the authority to call out for a limited period the militia upon the occurrence of either of these events, foreign invasion or domestic insurrection. The act therefore provides—

"That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper."

That is, without consulting the States or the authority of the States; and the next clause covers the case of an insurrection, and is in these words:

"And in case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."

In relation to the last, therefore, domestic insurrection, he is only authorized to call the militia from a State in which the insurrection does not take place, as he may be requested by the Legislature of the State if it is in session, or, if it is not in session, as he may be requested by the Executive. Then the second section of the act provides—

"That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of the militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress."

It is obvious that under that act the President would have no right to do what is done in this instance.

Mr. COLLAMER. That does not confine him to calling them out only when Congress is not in session.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then what is the meaning of saying that they shall be continued only until thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress? "Then next session of Congress" to what? To the call.

Mr. COLLAMER. But if he calls them during the session they would remain in service until thirty days after the beginning of the next session.

Mr. JOHNSON. I may be wrong, but as I understand it the law goes on the assumption that Congress, when in session, will take care of the matter itself. It is a quasi-matter of war, and the whole war power being in Congress, the object of the act was to put it in the power of the President to provide for a contingency which could not be provided for by Congress because Congress was not in session, and it therefore stated that if he made the call the militia called out should be continued until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress. "Then next session of Congress" to what? The next session of Congress convening after the call.

Mr. COLLAMER. That does not deny him the authority to call them out during the session.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rather think it does. He is only authorized to call them out by the law, and the men he is to call out are to go out of service within thirty days succeeding the next session of Congress; and it seems to me just as plain as words could make it that he cannot call them out when Congress is in session; Congress must do that. Then comes this act of 1862, and it provides—

"That whenever the President of the United States shall call forth the militia of the States, to be employed in the service of the United States, he may specify in his call the period for which such service will be required, not exceeding nine months."

It is not necessary to read further, except the next sentence:

"And the militia so called shall be mustered in and continue to serve for and during the term so specified, unless sooner discharged by command of the President."

The whole difference between the powers given by the supplement and the powers given in the original act, if I am right about the meaning of the second section of that act, in regard to which I differ from the honorable member from Vermont, is, that in his call the President is to specify the period for which service shall be required, but not to make it more than nine months, and the militia so called and so mustered shall continue in service for and during that specific period unless sooner discharged by command of the President. It repeals that part of the provision which says they are to go out of service at the expiration of thirty days after the meeting of Congress by providing that they are to remain for the whole number of days that the President by his call specifies; that they shall be in the service that number of days, but not more than nine months from the period they are mustered in.

It seems to me, therefore, that under neither of these acts could the President do what has been done in this case, and, in my judgment, it was unwise as a mere matter of expediency. We are all anxious to put an end to the trouble in which we are; all equally anxious, I am satisfied. So far as any Senator has spoken on the subject, there is a concurrence of opinion that if he had been asked to decide upon the propriety of such a call as this he would have decided against it. I assume, therefore, that every member of the Senate thinks that this measure is a very imprudent one, a very impolitic one, certainly a very costly one. The only question is, if we shall be of that opinion, whether we are to sanction it by an appropriation of $25,000,000, which in all probability will not be more than one half the expenditure that will be actually required, or stop it here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator that this is an estimate of what will be required for the pay, equipments, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand. There are always estimates, and yet at every session we have to make provision for very large deficits. That, I think, judging from the past, is likely to be the case in the present instance; but that of course is mere matter of speculation.

Two things to me seem rather singular, if not unaccountable. How did it happen that the Governors of only three States of the United States thought proper to make this suggestion?

Mr. HENDERSON. Five.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have they consulted the Governors of the other States? I suppose not. Has the same thing suggested itself to the Governor of any other State? I suppose not. How happened it that neither the President of the United States, nor any member of the Administration, nor the commanding general in the field, nor any man in the military service of the United States, as far as we have any knowledge, ever had the thought in his own mind of calling out these troops for this period of time? The Governors come here and they make the proposition to the President, and the President after a while agrees to accept it. If he has accepted it so as to bind us under a law which we have passed giving him the authority to accept it so as to bind us, there is an end of it; good faith requires that we should make it good; but taking the view I do, that we are under no such obligation, I feel constrained to vote against this appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. There is one law to which the Senator from Maryland has not referred that I think makes this subject very clear—the act of July 29, 1861, which provides—

"That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President of the United States, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of any or all the States of the Union, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed."

Then the next section provides—

"That whenever, in the judgment of the President, it may be necessary to use the military force hereby directed to be employed and called forth by him, the President shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time."

The third section provides—

"That the militia so called into the service of the United States shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the troops of the United States, and be continued in the service of the United States until discharged by proclamation of the President: Provided, That such continuance in service shall not extend beyond sixty days after the commencement of the next regular session of Congress, unless Congress shall expressly provide by law therefor."

Mr. JOHNSON. That law has expired.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. It was passed during the extra session of Congress in 1861, and the President has availed himself of the right to call out the militia under it; and the militia were called out, it will be remembered, in 1862, to the extent of about seventy thousand men; and we passed a law subsequently, allowing them to be called out for a period not exceeding nine months.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, as I shall cast a vote, I desire to say why it shall be cast in the way it will be upon this measure. Ordinarily I sit here from day to day and vote affirmatively upon all measures that are deemed necessary by the administrative power for carrying on this war. I frequently give those votes when I have considerable doubts as to the propriety and wisdom of the measures; but I feel it my duty in these times to give by my vote such support as it can give to those who are engaged in administering the Government. Whenever those measures coincide with my judgment it affords me a peculiar pleasure to give those votes. I regret to say that the measure now before this body does not secure the concurrence of my judgment.

When the enrollment bill was before the Senate the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, proposed to limit the services of the troops to be called out under that act to two years rather than three. It will be remembered that I made some opposition to that suggestion of the honorable Senator. I did it because I believed that no half-way dealings would ever result in the suppression of the rebellion. I did it because I believed that such a proposition as he made would dampen the spirit of the country and would affect the confidence of the country in the administrative and legislative branches of the Government. But, Mr. President, what shall I say of this measure, which proposes that one hundred thousand men shall be called into the field for one hundred days, at an expense proposed now to be appropriated of $25,000,000, perhaps to be doubled, perhaps to be quadrupled?

And, sir, what account do we get of this measure? The first knowledge that I had of it came to me from the public press. It was stated that certain gentlemen, Governors of the States, were coming to Washington to propose a measure of this kind, and next it was stated that they had arrived in Washington and were engaged in making the proposition. I have great respect for those gentlemen; I believe each one of them to be a patriot and a valuable adjunct of the country at this time; but I ask who appointed them to generate and originate measures for carrying on this war? Is the measure before us in any respect properly one of their functions, or is it not, if it be a measure of war at all, more properly, and indeed exclusively, the function of the President of the United States and his Cabinet? I would have respect for this measure, even with its one hundred days hanging to it, if it had originated in the mind of the President, was the reflex of his Cabinet, or was an original demand of the lieutenant general commanding the armies of the United States. That, however, is not the case. It is a proposition coming from patriotic Governors, and then accepted by the President, we are told, and then accepted by General Grant. If that be so, this part of the war is clearly being conducted by the Governors of the States, five of them. I object to that. It can get no vote of mine. I think that is not the way to deal with this war. I ask the question here as a Senator, and as one who can say without any boasting that he feels as profoundly impressed with the exigencies of these times as a human being can; I ask in God's name why the President of the United States, if he wanted additional men now, did not call for one hundred thousand three years' men, two hundred thousand three years' men, or five hundred thousand three years' men, and inspire the nation, rather than trifle with its temper, engage in modifying its courage and abating it, and in proposing, for that goes with it, an expenditure of money that we know we do not possess, though we may vote it here to-day.

Mr. President, it must be known and understood that I make these remarks as a friend of the Administration, for it has no better friend within the confines of this nation, though I say it; but it belongs to the people, it is their due—it belongs to us—to seize this rebellion and grapple it by its throat, not with hundred day men, but with the strong arms of the nation, as many of them as are needed; and we all say here from day to day that we have the power to summons them to the field, to command their services, and if they are not yielded, to compel their services in behalf of the Republic. I think, sir, and I feel, it is time we resorted to other measures than this. I often vote away my judgment. I do it willingly. I differ from my friend on my right here in that, [Mr. DAVIS.] I consider my judgment a small consideration in view of the great conditions and considerations that are passing in review before me, and I am willing to repeat that action. But I confess that when I am asked, as an Administration measure, as a measure to put down this rebellion, to strengthen the hands of the Government, to vote these $25,000,000, and thus initiate an expenditure that promises no results of equal profit and benefit to us, it sickens me at heart, and I cannot, sir, I cannot yield the vote.

I do not raise the question which has been presented by the honorable Senator from Maryland, as to whether this or that statute gives the President the power. I but ask from him and from those that are his constitutional advisers manly, strong, firm, decided action; action that gives promise of results, promise of compensation for the great expenditures that we are making. I think it would be wise to vote this measure down here to-day, and I am free to say that if the country did not approve it I would yet do it, for we know that measures like this will never win this great fight in which we are engaged. Nearly every man of us feels in his heart that means of this kind do not become us as a nation; do not become us as a Senate.

But it has been said by some that this call has been made; by others that it has not been made. I care not whether it has been made or not. I say it would be wise, in my opinion, to stop it here, and to demand that the President shall issue his call for half a million of men if necessary, and, as I said before, inspire the nation and talk to the nations of the earth, and show them that we mean to sustain this Government, though the entire face of the land be devastated in the process of doing it. Let a little spirit of that kind be manifest, and I tell you that these rebel armies will soon dissolve before the spirit and blows of the nation. But your one hundred day men and your measures suggested by patriotic Governors that make a tour to the national capital, will not, in my judgment, accomplish that result. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall content myself by voting, and taking the responsibility of voting, against this bill.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, and their kind indulgence, I will say a very few words to give my opinions in reference to the joint resolution now pending before the Senate. As I understand it, this is a resolution to appropriate $25,000,000 for the payment of certain troops who have been offered by the Governors of five States, and accepted by the President of the United States, to serve for one hundred days after they shall have been mustered into the United States service. I take it for granted, from the two acts to which reference has been made, that the President had the power to make the call. I am equally certain that the President has made the call substantially. I have here a proclamation of Governor Morton in reference to twenty-five thousand troops to be raised in Indiana under this call, in which he recites the offer of the Governors of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin to raise one hundred thousand volunteer troops for the service of the Government; and of that hundred thousand the Secretary of War and President of the United States accepted to the extent of eighty thousand, and upon that acceptance proclamations have been issued by these several Governors, in which they recite the offer and the acceptance of the offer by the President of the United States; and that is to all intents and purposes a call for these troops, an effectual call for these troops, and an acceptance of the offer.

Now, how can the President raise troops upon a call under your laws? In one of two ways: either by conscription and draft, or by accepting volunteers. Here he proposes to accept volunteer troops. Here is no draft proposed in any of these States to raise these troops. It is voluntary on the part of the Governors, voluntary on the part of the soldiers. But we are told that the proposition came first from the Governors, and did not originate with the President and his Cabinet. Why should not the call have come first from the Governors of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois? Only last year Indiana and Ohio were invaded by John Morgan, and several millions worth of property were destroyed, and many lives sacrificed, and John Morgan marched for more than six hundred miles unimpeded through those two States simply because there was not upon the border such an organized force as we now propose; and recently within sight of the shores of Illinois there was a bloody attack upon Paducah, in Kentucky, and within sight of the shores of Missouri the terrible massacre at Fort Pillow. These Governors, whose sworn duty it is to command the militia of their respective States, to suppress insurrection and repel invasion, and preserve the peace within their borders, saw the importance of the immediate organization of this force. It was right and proper and patriotic that the call should have come from these several Governors.

Sir, I have uniformly opposed short enlistments and favored a vigorous conscription law, a law which shall deny the right of commutation, and I am prepared to-day to vote for a law which shall also deny the right of substitution. I have always been prepared to draft soldiers for three years; but yet I am not prepared to say that this is not a wise measure now, and the wisest possible measure that the wisest men upon earth could have devised to meet the emergency which now stares us in the face. What need have you for your soldiers, and what duties have they to perform? We have a frontier line of more than fifteen hundred miles; we have a blockade system involving a coast line blockaded of more than a thousand miles. We have taken posts there, and made them depots of provisions and arms and munitions. They have to be garrisoned and defended, or you give up your whole blockade system. You have ordered your armies into the rebel States. We have to keep up their communications, to defend their munitions and arms by garrisoning posts along that line of fifteen hundred miles of frontier. We need soldiers to advance into the rebel States to crush their military power, and we equally need soldiers to man the fortifications and preserve our communications. I believe that these troops mustered in for one hundred days will be as effective as any other troops within these fortifications to defend the fortifications and to keep up your line of communication and to protect the transportation of arms and munitions to your armies in the field.

How many soldiers have you now in garrison on your coast and in garrison on your frontier and protecting your communications? More than eighty thousand; and for every single volunteer accepted under this call you release a veteran soldier to go into the armies to fight the battles of the country; and you will need them all, and need them all within the next ten days. There are two great strategic points where the two contending armies are being concentrated, upon the Rapidan and in northern Georgia. You need every veteran soldier you have. These volunteers, if immediately called into the service, will fill the places of the veterans now in garrison, and the soldiers in garrison will march to the front; and I believe it is a wise provision.

But gentlemen say you call for these men just at the planting season in the planting States, and take them from their ordinary labors. Who complains of that? This call has been made some six or eight days in the State of Indiana, and in every county, town, and township in the State, almost, we have called meetings, characterized with the utmost enthusiasm; and perhaps while we are deliberating here to-day, Indiana has ten thousand of these volunteer soldiers in rendezvous at Indianapolis ready to go wheresoever you order them. They have not complained, and they have the most interest. I am receiving letters daily, and I have watched our papers, and no one in Indiana or in Illinois, or in any of these other States, so far as I know, has complained of the hardship of the call. Let the complaint come from those who are interested. Let us not imagine it.

I do not know that the Administration, strong as it is in patriotism and in the confidence of the people, is prepared to disregard the patriotic suggestions of five Governors from noble loyal States.

I think, under all the circumstances, this is a wise measure. Whom does it take from the workshop and the farm? No one who is not willing to go.

But gentlemen argue as though these were raw troops who had never been drilled, who had never held arms. We have in the State of Indiana sixteen thousand of the home legion, who have been armed and drilled for some twelve months; and many companies, without a single exception, have volunteered for this hundred days' service, and many regiments have volunteered almost entire. I think we need their services; we need to swell our armies; and I believe that within twenty days you may have under this call eighty thousand troops who will take the place of eighty thousand veteran troops, and in fortifications do good service. But, sir, the history of the war shows the raw, green regiments that gentlemen speak of have done noble fighting in the open field. One brigade at Pittsburg Landing, composed partly of Ohio and Indiana troops, three days after they received their arms, went into that bloody fight and covered themselves with glory. I hope much from this volunteer force, and I trust the joint resolution will be passed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the resolution by adding the words "after their muster into the service of the United States by regiments," so as to get a hundred days' service out of them after they are mustered in as regiments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that amendment will not be adopted. These men are called from labor which would yield them from two to ten dollars a day; they drop their tools at the workshop; they leave the farm; they leave the counting house; they answer your call in a moment; and it seems to me that from the very day their militia organization moves from the place of their residence their pay ought to commence; and remember they ask no bounty. There is not a man of this force who will come from the State of Ohio that will not make a sacrifice more than we are called upon to make here, and I think therefore it is a very idle thing to undertake to limit their term of service except from the time when they leave their homes.

Mr. WILSON. I am certainly in favor of paying these men for every day's service they render, and if the Committee on Finance think we have got security that these men will serve the country a hundred days, I am willing to withdraw my amendment. What I desire to accomplish is to prevent the hundred days being squandered in raising and organizing these regiments without securing their actual service.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is one of the objections to the system. They are called only for one hundred days. If you make the one hundred days to commence from the time the man first volunteers his services, we shall not get the benefit of him for sixty days at least. There is now a dispute between the Government and some of the soldiers belonging to the regiments of New York and a large portion of some of the regiments of Pennsylvania, and the Legislature as well as the Executive of Pennsylvania are siding with their troops, as to whether their term of service expires at the expiration of three years from the period when they enlisted or three years only from the time they were mustered into the service. The Government have decided, and I have no doubt decided properly—certainly if they have not the right to do so, they ought to have it—that the service commences from the time they were mustered in.

Now you are about to provide, unless some such amendment as that suggested by the chairman of the Military Committee is adopted, that these three months' men are to be paid from the day they leave their homes. If you do that, you will have to pay the troops of Pennsylvania and the rest too for the additional period they are made to serve by the decision of the War Department. I know the Department and the officers of the Government think it all-important that the obligation of the United States to pay should commence from the period of muster into service in order to compel them to go into the service at the earliest moment. It may be hard on these men from Ohio, I know, that they should lose their time altogether without any compensation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to make a suggestion here. There are thirty regiments ordered from Ohio, I think, almost two from every congressional district. Now, there are no mustering officers at their places of rendezvous. They are called upon to rendezvous at the centers of their regiments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me set my friend right. He is going on a supposition. If Senators think it necessary to provide for this by law, it can be done; but the Secretary of War expressly stated to me that the offer of the Governors and the President's acceptance was specific; that the men are to serve one hundred days from the time they are mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any stipulation of that kind I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then they will not be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. And there is no use in the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the statement made to me; and I think there is something said about their being mustered in in the resolution itself. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nothing is said there except that they are for a period of not less than one hundred days; and the Secretary stated to me expressly, for I inquired about it, that the term of service was to be one hundred days from the time they are mustered into the service of the United States. Of course they cannot be paid for more.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the mischief of which the Senator from Ohio speaks will occur.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no mustering officer at the place of rendezvous, and they will march to Cincinnati before being mustered in; but I am perfectly willing to leave that without any provision of law, for I think the justice of the Government will pay them, but I do not wish them to be excluded by an amendment like that of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The offer was as I have stated, and that was the acceptance, and of course they will not be paid for anything except the service they render according to the tender and the acceptance.

Mr. HOWE. I would not have said a word in this debate but for one feature that has developed itself in it. Several Senators have spoken upon this proposition as if it was a boon they were about to grant to these States to be allowed to raise eighty thousand men to serve for one hundred days. So far as the State of Wisconsin is to participate in this bounty, I feel authorized to say that she would be entirely willing to relinquish it. The State of Wisconsin has furnished her quota under all your calls for all your periods that you have assigned to the service of the different detachments of your Army, and now she stands ready, I understand, to furnish her quota of these eighty thousand men to serve for one hundred days. If the Government wants these men she is willing to supply them in addition to all she has done heretofore; and labor is as much to her as it is to any State in New England or any State in the Union. She is willing to make this sacrifice, but it is not a privilege for her citizens to enter upon your service and serve one hundred days, or ten days, or one day, for thirteen dollars a month. It is not a favor that she asks, it is not a privilege that she craves. If you want these services she will contribute them; and if she contributes them I ask you in common justice to give to her citizens the pay of soldiers—that is small enough, everybody knows—and give them that pay from the time they enter into your service, and do not treat this offer as if Wisconsin came here a mendicant asking to fight your battles for you. The Senator from Indiana has told you rightly that this proposition puts not merely eighty thousand raw troops into the service, but it makes eighty thousand veteran soldiers available in fighting the battles of this coming campaign. I do not undertake to say for that reason that it is a wise measure. I believe it is a wise measure. I believe the General-in-Chief who now leads your armies knows how to dispose of eighty thousand raw troops so as to add to your securities for success. I think so; and therefore I do not unite with those who pronounce this a silly, and absurd measure; but if you think it an absurd measure reject it altogether, and do not draw our men from home; but if you draw them from home pay them honestly and squarely.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand there is no amendment pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is none pending.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That it shall be conditioned by the War Department that the troops to be organized under the call referred to herein shall, if the public exigencies require it, be required to serve for the period of six months from the time of muster.

I fear that if this measure shall pass these troops will be mustered out of the service or will be entitled to be mustered out just when we want them most. On the 1st of August or thereabouts these troops will be entitled to their discharge. It appears to me that this war is going to last beyond that, and that if the campaign of this year amount to anything, we must make calculations beyond that time.

It also occurs to me that if the soldiers are willing to serve for three months, so far as they are concerned, they will be willing to serve in the midst of the war, but it is our duty to provide that they shall before this measure shall pass. I hope the amendment will receive the concurrence of the Senate. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. These troops were offered by the several Governors for one hundred days. That offer was accepted. A great many of them have already volunteered under that call. Now, can we extend the time to six months without releasing all who have volunteered? It strikes me as utterly absurd.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Davis, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, and Sprague—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer this amendment to come in by way of proviso at the end of the resolution:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in paying, subsisting, or transporting troops that may be mustered into the service after the 10th day of May, 1864, unless they shall be mustered in for a period of six months, if not sooner discharged by the President.

I presume that the object of this measure on the part of its friends is to have a large force thrown into the field to assist in the spring campaign. There is, however, no limitation upon the resolution as it now stands, and I suppose these troops can be received, one regiment after another, during the whole summer and fall. If there is any virtue in it, let them all be called in at once and immediately. I insist that some limitation of time should be fixed by Congress beyond which these troops shall not be received unless they enlist for a longer term. If we are bound to adopt this proposition because the President has accepted the offer made to him, though we were in session, I think we have a right to put some limitation upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have you not made it too short?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not; but if it is, let additional time be allowed. My impression is that if these troops are to be of any service, they ought to be at the points where the battles are to be fought in the course of the next two or three weeks. I understand from Senators these troops are already organized and ready to be mustered in. I understood the Senator from Ohio to say so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is only so in Ohio.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. And about half of them in our State.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then it will not require more than eight days to get the rest. I am willing, however, to modify my amendment by fixing the 15th of May as the date.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I hope no such amendment will be adopted. Here was an offer of troops for one hundred days which has been accepted, and the Governors have all issued their proclamations under it. In the first place, if you make any amendment the resolution must go back to the House of Representatives and be subjected to delay there. In the second place, if you adopt this amendment, the Governors will have to issue new proclamations and resort to new machinery. I hope we shall let the matter stand as it is.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly the Senator does not understand the amendment. It does not affect the calling into service of those troops that may be mustered in prior to the period limited.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the leave of the Senator from Missouri I will mention a case. Troops will be organized all over the State of Ohio. They cannot find a mustering officer probably for eight or nine days; probably Cincinnati is the first point where they will reach a mustering officer, and it may take some of them ten days to get there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Cannot mustering officers be easily sent to the various points?

Mr. HENDERSON. The amount of it is that we are called upon now to vote an appropriation of $25,000,000, and, as has been very properly stated by the Senator from Maryland and other Senators, this is only a beginning; it will take twenty-five or thirty or forty or fifty millions more in order to meet all the requirements that will be thrown upon us by the passage of this resolution. I am as well satisfied of it as I am that I am standing here. The transportation alone of one hundred thousand men to the seat of war and back again is an immense item at the present prices of transportation. Then they are all to be armed, and the arms never will be returned; they will be as effectually destroyed in the hundred days as if they were in the hands of men to serve during the war, for these troops will not expect to need them longer than their time, and there will be extravagance and folly among them, as we all know exists with troops of this character. Besides we are passing the resolution in such a shape that during the whole summer and fall and next winter the President may go on receiving hundred day troops, and it will amount to nothing. If there is any virtue in this proposition it consists in the fact that these men are to be thrown in a vast body into the field in the course of ten, fifteen, or twenty days from the present time to enable veteran troops to go to the seat of war in order that the rebels may be crushed. For that reason I desire to have some limitation placed upon the time when these men shall be received for this purpose; and I modify my amendment by inserting the "15th" of May, instead of the "10th."

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the language of his amendment should be, "at least six months," leaving a discretion for a longer time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that; and I will so modify my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification requires unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment will be so modified.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Willey, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Sherman, and Van Winkle—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time. On the question of its passage,

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. There was an old lawyer in Kentucky a good many years ago who established a manufactory of young lawyers, [laughter,] and he required his apprentices to serve for three months, when he turned them out. He turned them out about as good lawyers as this term would make soldiers, and I think his mode of tuition was about equivalent to the system on which it is proposed to get these volunteers. But, sir, the ways of the President of the United States to me are past finding out. Kentucky knocked at the door of the Executive Mansion and of the Senate for about eighteen months, for the privilege of raising twenty thousand volunteers to serve for six months or twelve months in defense of that State. That State was subjected to continual raids and invasions along about half its exterior border. There never was a people on earth more anxious for the passage of a measure than were the loyal men of Kentucky for the passage of that measure. Our Governor and one of our principal generals came on here together to importune the Government, and to beset members of Congress, in season and out of season, to get that measure passed.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to remind the Senator that the objection to raising those troops was that they were to be raised for the service of Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. It was proposed that that force should be a volunteer or State militia force for the defense of Kentucky. When Lee invaded Pennsylvania and Maryland last summer, the President, impromptu, of his own motion, issued first a proclamation to raise one hundred thousand six months' volunteers for the defense of those States, and in two or three days he enlarged the number to one hundred and twenty thousand. After a long delay we succeeded in securing the passage by the House of Representatives of our bill authorizing us to raise twenty thousand volunteers, by a vote of about two to one, and after it had been suspended before the Senate for twelve or fifteen months this body did us the grace and the special favor to pass it, with an amendment providing that all the force which might be raised under the bill should be at all times subject to be ordered by the President in other service than the defense of the State. That condition did not satisfy us, but we accepted it, and our Governor went on and raised upwards of seven thousand troops under that law, and he had scarcely got them assembled together at a general rendezvous when the President ordered them all into other States. Here is the difference between localities. It shows that "kissing goes by favor."

Mr. GRIMES. That is the way the world over. Mr. DAVIS. Yes, the world over. Pennsylvania and Maryland could get a spontaneous proclamation from the President to raise one hundred and twenty thousand troops for their defense, and here these five Governors can get authority to call out these troops, though I have heard it insinuated that they originated this measure for electioneering purposes, and to carry their States at the next fall election. I suppose under the interior lights that have been given to the President and to gentlemen who are in the secrets of the party the measure is to pass for that special service, and that is the amount of duty that these one hundred thousand hundred day men are to perform at a proposed cost of $25,000,000 now, but which, I have no doubt, will eventually rise to $100,000,000 before Uncle Sam has paid all the bills.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Harding, Henderson, Johnson, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, and Sprague—13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting; no other business is in order. Mr. POWELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, May 2, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports to go upon the Calendar, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

J. W. NOKES.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of J. W. Nokes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, a bill concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and amendments ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The committees having been called through, the next business in order is the call of States for resolutions.

AFRICAN SLAVERY.

Mr. FRANK presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York for the final abrogation of the system of African slavery; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTIES TO VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CHANLER presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York in reference to bounties to volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. PIKE introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be requested to inquire into the practicability of making such change in the Hall of the House of Representatives as shall carry at least one side of the Hall to the outer wall of the building, and report the most feasible plan and the probable expense of the same.

The call of States having been completed, the House proceeded, as the next business in order, to the consideration of resolutions laid over one day under the rule.

DEBT INCURRED BY THE STATES.

A resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report the amount of debt incurred in the several States in their efforts in suppressing the rebellion, introduced by Mr. BLAINE on the 7th of January last, was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TWO PER CENT. LAND FUND.

A resolution offered by Mr. MORRISON on the 11th of April last, requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish to the House, at as early a day as possible, information showing, first, the amount received into the Treasury of the United States from the two per cent. fund, arising from the net proceeds of the sales of public lands made in the State of Illinois since January 1, 1819, and reserved in her enabling act for road purposes; giving the dates from time to time when so received, and the respective amount of each payment opposite such dates; secondly, whether anything is charged in the Treasury Department against any fund, or any offsets exist against it there, and if so, when and how did such charges occur or were such offsets made, and upon what basis, stating particularly the amounts and dates of said charges or offsets, and the respective times, mode, or manner in which such two per cent. fund was expended, and where, if at all, and the evidence of such expenditure, and the authority therefor, was next taken up for consideration.

Mr. MORRISON. Upon that resolution I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

RESTORATION OF REBELLIOUS STATES.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of resolutions upon which debate had arisen, and which had been laid over under the rules. The first resolution in order of this class was the following resolution offered on the 14th of December last by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDING:]

Resolved, That the Union has not been dissolved, and that whenever the rebellion in any one of the seceded States shall be put down and subdued, either by force of the Federal arms or by the voluntary submission of the people of such State to the authority of the Constitution, then such State will be thereby restored to all its rights and privileges as a State of the Union under the constitution of such State and the Constitution of the United States, including the right to regulate, order, and control its own domestic institutions according to the constitution and laws of such State, free from all congressional or Executive control or dictation.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Speaker, some time since in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union I delivered something like the remarks I intended to have delivered when this resolution came up in its regular order. I take it for granted that no Union man can object to this resolution. It takes the ground that the Union has not been dissolved, and the remainder is the necessary sequence from that.

Mr. ASHLEY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The resolution gave rise to debate, and went over, and it is now in order to debate it.

Mr. HARDING. The question upon which this whole controversy turns is whether the Union has or has not been dissolved. If it has not been dissolved, then whenever the rebellion in any one of these States is subdued the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States are immediately restored, and neither the President, nor Congress, nor any other department has any shadow of constitutional right to dictate to the people of those States in regard to the form of government which they shall set up, nor in regard to any matter pertaining to their local jurisdiction. Whoever contends that this resolution is wrong places himself in the position of declaring that this Union has been dissolved. He must either be a revolutionist or he is a secessionist. A man who takes the ground that the Union is dissolved can oppose this resolution, but no other man can.

I know, sir, that it has become quite common nowadays for gentlemen who once espoused the cause of the Union with great ardor, men who once stood where President Lincoln stood in his inaugural address when he declared that the Union was not dissolved and that it could not be dissolved, who are now repudiating that whole doctrine, to take the ground that the Union has been dissolved, and that these southern States constitute a foreign government.

Sir, if it be true that the Union has been dissolved, then by what authority is it that taxes are being collected in the seceded States; by what authority is it that their lands are being sold and parceled out? If the Union has been dissolved, how did it take place? Was it by virtue of these ordinances of secession? Is there any gentleman here prepared to acknowledge that there was virtue in those ordinances of secession to dissolve this Union? If not, then how did the Union become dissolved? Was it by force of the confederate arms? Could that which was void and nugatory be made operative by violence and force and bloodshed? Were their ordinances of secession utterly null and void? Gentlemen say they were. How then was the Union dissolved? Was a void act made operative and obligatory by force and bloodshed? No man can say that. The Union, therefore, has not been dissolved. What then is the matter? Why, there is a rebellion there among a portion of the people. When that rebellion shall be subdued by force of the Federal arms the only justification of the war will be gone. The only thing that could justify the President in moving at all by force of arms is the rebellion, and the moment that rebellion is subdued and put down the cause of the war ceases, and with it the war must cease also; and if the President or this Congress should, for abolition purposes, protract the war a solitary day beyond the suppression of the rebellion, then you become rebels; you rebel against the Constitution; you change places with the rebels, and become revolutionists and rebels yourselves.

My resolution then takes the ground that the Union has not been dissolved, and that when the rebellion is suppressed by force of the Federal arms, or by the voluntary submission of the people of those States to the authority of the Constitution, then that State is thereby restored to all its rights and privileges under the Constitution, may send Representatives to Congress, and do all other acts which any other State in the Union can do.

Sir, what difference is there between the States in the Union, the rebellion being suppressed? There is no more constitutional power to intermeddle with the local institutions of the State of Louisiana than with those of Massachusetts, and any attempt to do it is nothing more nor less than a revolution, as unjustifiable in its character as the revolution in the South, because it is equally a revolution against the Constitution of this Government; it seeks its subversion and utter overthrow. Any attempt to control a State organization after the rebellion shall have been overthrown proceeds upon the ground that the Union is dissolved. What right can we have to reestablish State governments in the South if the southern States be still in the Union? The very idea of reconstruction is an absurd and revolutionary idea, because it admits the dissolution of the Union. There can be no reconstruction of a State government that is still in existence. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move that the resolution be referred to the committee on the rebellious States.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order during the pendency of the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 67, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Denning, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. So the resolution was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. STILES stated that his colleague, Mr. MILLER, had been called home on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATE RIGHTS.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was a resolution introduced on the 14th of December last by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] and laid over under the rule (debate arising thereon,) declaring that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people, and the Federal Executive can neither directly nor indirectly exercise any of the powers thus reserved, or lawfully restrict or obstruct the exercise thereof by the people.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the resolution be referred to the committee on the rebellious States, and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. HARDING. Representing my colleague who is absent, I had risen to move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the resolution on the table, for the purpose of getting a vote on its merits, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays. I will vote in favor of the resolution if I get a chance.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 6, nays 118; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Dawes, Dawson, Denning, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Charles M. Dowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Upson, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—118.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. COX. Is not the next question on the motion to refer?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to withdraw that motion and let us have a fair vote on the resolution instead of smothering it. It is part of the Constitution of the United States. [Calls to "Order."] Will not the gentlemen give us a vote on the Constitution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to commit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. #### MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

WASHINGTON CANAL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the health of this city is of paramount importance, and the same is greatly endangered by an immense accumulation of filth in the Washington canal, from which a most deleterious miasma is continually rising to impregnate the atmosphere already charged with poisonous vapor from surrounding hospitals, which, in all probability, will be largely increased during the present summer: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to inquire into the expediency of draining by culvert, or in some way improving the Washington canal that it may be cleansed and the health of the city preserved, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. STILES, by unanimous consent, leave of absence for ten days was granted to Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania.

RECORD OF VOTES.

Mr. WHALEY. Some days ago I paired with Mr. STROUSE, on account of feeble health. After returning, though still in feeble health, I thought it right to allow Mr. STROUSE to vote. I forgot to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I could not possibly be here to vote upon the passage of the internal revenue bill, and Mr. STROUSE voted upon the passage of this bill. Under these circumstances, I ask permission to record my vote in the affirmative upon that bill.

There being no objection, the vote of Mr.

WHALEY was accordingly recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH. I ask consent, also, to record my vote upon the passage of the internal revenue bill.

Mr. ANCONA. I will make no objection if the same courtesy is extended to gentlemen on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing all gentlemen who desire it to record their votes on the internal revenue bill?

Mr. SPALDING. I have objected uniformly and I now object.

Mr. SMITH. I desire then to say that if I had been here I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. LE BLOND. I desire to say that I was unavoidably absent, from illness, from the House on Saturday. I ask the consent of the House to record my vote upon the various amendments to the bill in regard to soldiers.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I ask the consent of the House to record my vote upon the internal revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] objects.

Mr. SMITH. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SPALDING. If I were to withdraw my objection for our friends I certainly could not object for gentlemen on the other side. I will withdraw my objection altogether.

There being no objection, several members recorded their votes upon the passage of the internal revenue bill. The vote as changed stands as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with all the information in his possession concerning the construction of the rebel ram which participated in the recent rebel attack on the United States forces and vessels at and near Plymouth; also, to inform the House why the construction of said ram was not prevented; whether any steps were taken to prevent the same, or to guard against the action of said ram; also, what action was taken in relation to the subject of this inquiry, and why the same was not effective.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

LEAVE TO RECORD VOTE.

Mr. L. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent to record my votes upon the various amendments to the bill equalizing the pay of soldiers, which was considered by the House on Saturday.

ADMEASUREMENT OF TONNAGE.

On motion of Mr. ELIOT, the bill (H. R. No. 119) to regulate the admeasurement of the tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table for consideration.

First amendment:

On page 1, line three, strike out "six" and insert "five;" so that the words shall read "eighteen hundred and sixty-five."

Provided, That any ship or vessel built within the United States after the passage of this act may be measured and registered in the manner herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution of the House of Saturday last, calling upon him for copies of certain orders, messages, telegrams, &c., referred to by him in his message relating to the appointment of FRANCIS P. BLAIR, Jr., as major general.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the message be referred to the Committee of Elections, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act for the relief of settlers upon certain lands in California; when the Speaker signed the same.

DAMAGES BY INDIANS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with an amendment a bill (H. R. No. 377) making appropriations for the payment of the awards made by the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863.

The bill, which was read, appropriates the sum of $928,411, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the several amounts awarded by the commission appointed under and by virtue of an act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians, approved February 16, 1863, to the several persons and firms respectively to whom such amounts were awarded by the commissioners, excepting certain persons and firms named in the bill.

It also appropriates the further sum of $241,963, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of so much of the awards made by the commissioners to the persons and firms specifically named in the first section of the bill, as the Secretary of the Interior shall upon examination find to be due to them respectively, under the act approved February 16, 1863.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House the same as it would be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount appropriated is very considerable, and it seems to me the bill should be considered more deliberately than it can be in the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I propose that it receive the same consideration in the House as it would in committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course then it will be subject to the same rules as to amendments, &c.

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir.

No objection being made, the House proceeded to consider the bill under the same rules as if in committee.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee have reported an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and before it is read I will say that it is substantially the bill as printed. As there were some fifteen or twenty mistakes made in printing the names of parties contained in the bill, the committee thought it the easiest way to correct the mistakes by offering a substitute.

The substitute was read.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that a letter from the Secretary of the Interior on this subject may be read.

The letter was read, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 15, 1864.

SIR: After a perusal of House of Representatives bill No. 377, making appropriations for the payment of the awards made by the Sioux commissioners, I have to express my satisfaction with its provisions, and hope, in view of the extreme want of a large majority of the claimants, your committee will meet with no difficulty in pressing the bill to a speedy passage through the House.

Owing to the pressure of business incidental to the presence of Congress, I regret to say that I have found it impossible to give that close personal attention to the claims of the merchants and traders which justice to the claimants requires, and have, therefore, in preference to hasty conclusions, which may be damaging to these gentlemen, determined to retain them until such an examination can be had as will prove to my own mind that the proper basis has been gained, and the Department thereby enabled to adjust the claims satisfactorily, as I trust, to all concerned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. P. USHER, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN REFUGEES, ETC.

Mr. WINDOM also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 198) to aid the Indian refugees to return to their homes in the Indian department.

The bill, which was read, appropriates for the removal and temporary relief of Indian refugees and destitute Indians in the southern superintendency, $52,000; for temporary subsistence in the Indian country to the close of the present fiscal year, $153,000; and for seeds, plows, and agricultural implements to enable them to raise a crop the present season, $18,000.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF KANSAS INDIANS.

Mr. WILDER also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, bill of the House No. 425, for the relief of the Wea, Peoria, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians of Kansas.

The preamble recites that the sum of $89,865 72, being proceeds of the lands of said Indians sold at Paola, Kansas, in June and July, 1857, under the treaty of May 30, 1854, was vested in stocks of the following States: Florida, $37,000; Louisiana, $15,000; North Carolina, $42,000; and South Carolina, $3,000; and that the interest in arrear and up to July 1, 1864, on said stocks amounts to $19,455, but calculated at five per cent. on said sum invested amounts to but $14,010 35.

The first section of the bill provides that the sum of $89,865 72 shall be placed to the credit of the Wea, Peoria, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians, on the proper books of the Treasury of the United States, and bear interest from the 1st of July, 1864, at the rate of five per cent. per annum till paid, as hereinafter provided.

The second section directs that the aforesaid sum shall, on the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior, be paid at such times and in such installments as may be found necessary, on a consultation with the Indians, by the President of the United States, from time to time; and in each such payment shall be included the amount of interest then accrued at the rate aforesaid.

The third section provides that the sum of $14,010 35, the interest up to the 1st of July, 1864, at five per cent., on the said sum of $89,865 72, shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States the 1st of July, 1864, on the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior, and that no further appropriation shall be required to carry out the provisions of this act.

The fourth section provides that the bill shall be in force from its passage.

The bill, which by unanimous consent was considered in the House, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to know what has become of these funds.

Mr. WILDER. I have a letter here from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, March 28, 1864.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 25th instant, requesting me to inform you if I have any knowledge of a consultation having been held by the President with the confederated tribe of Kaskaskia, Peoria, Wea, and Piankeshaw Indians, after the sale of their trust lands at Paola, Kansas, in the year 1857, in reference to vesting the proceeds of said sales; also, wishing to learn whether the amount thereof that said tribe needed or desired was paid to them, I have to state that by reference to the records of this office, I can find no evidence of such consultation having been held, but do ascertain that on the 3d of August, 1857, Agent M. McCasin addressed a letter to the Superintendent at St. Louis, who forwarded the same to this office, calling the attention of the Commissioner to the treaty of 1854, and stating that the sales of their trust lands had taken place, and that he was requested by a council of said tribe to say that a small delegation of the tribe would be held in readiness to go to St. Louis, Washington, or elsewhere, as might be directed by the Commissioner, for the purpose of settling points contemplated by the treaty of 1854. It not being deemed expedient to incur the expense of a trip to Washington by said delegation, a report was made by the acting Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior, stating all the facts in the case, and recommending that $275,000 of the proceeds of said sale be invested in bonds, that $10,000 be paid to the agent for disbursement to the tribe per capita, and the balance be held to pay the expenses attending the survey and sale of said lands. The Secretary of the Interior referred said report to the President for his approval, which was approved by him and returned to the Secretary, a copy of which was then forwarded to this office, after which the investment was made, and the $10,000 forwarded to the agent as recommended in the report.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. DOLE, Commissioner.

Hon. A. C. WILDER, House of Representatives.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to know what has become of these bonds.

Mr. WILDER. The funds were invested in bonds of South Carolina, Florida, and other southern States, and no interest has been paid on them.

Mr. SPALDING. What does this bill propose?

Mr. WILDER. Merely to pay the interest on the funds thus invested by the Government.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. This question, in my judgment, ought certainly to be further investigated. It is one of considerable importance. The bill establishes a new principle. It proposes that the Government shall assume the debt of Florida. I would rather that the vote should be reconsidered, and the bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING. I wish to make some explanation in reference to this matter, but perhaps I had better wait until the question is taken on reconsideration.

Mr. MORRILL. I think this is a question of sufficient importance to be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. KING. I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that if the matter of the sale of the lands of these Indians which yielded $367,000 in gold were thoroughly investigated it would be shown that there never has been such bad treatment in all the bad management of the Indian department as has been shown toward these Indians.

In the first place, by the seventh article of the treaty, the proceeds of these lands, after deducting the expenses, were to be invested by the Government. When these Indians, who live in Kansas on the border of Missouri, were persuaded to sell their lands, they were induced to take what are called "head rights," and in consideration that they were induced to do that and to put themselves in the way of learning the arts of agriculture and farming, such part of the money derived from the sale of their lands as they might designate was to be applied to settling them up in that way, and the balance, upon consultation with the President of the United States, was to be invested, in the language of the treaty, by the United States in "safe and profitable stocks." Instead, however, of consulting the Indians or allowing them to consult the President and to make their wishes known, a part of the money was invested in these stocks.

A part of the bonds purchased for these Indians were among those abstracted from the Interior Department some year or two ago. By an act passed in 1862, I believe, Congress assumed the amount of those abstracted bonds and made them good to the Indians at five per cent. Now, if they had had the benefit of the treaty of 1854, and had been allowed to designate how the money should be disposed of, and had taken it all for themselves, as they could have done if they had chosen to, it would have been worth ten per cent. to them. But Congress assumed to allow them five per cent., and there is no trouble or controversy about that. I only mention it to show one of the circumstances of the case.

The Government invested a large part of their funds, not in "safe and profitable stock," but in stocks of Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Louisiana. In utter violation of the seventh article of the treaty, the money was invested in these stocks. The Indians have thus been deprived of their means of subsistence for a number of years, and they ask that Congress shall assume the amount to the extent of five per cent. and take these stocks. No gentleman will contend that they were "safe and profitable stocks." The Indians never gave their assent to the investment. The investment was made in violation of the treaty, because the Indians ought to have been consulted. They notified the President that they were ready to come on here and consult with him as to the disposition of the money; but instead of inviting their delegation here, the money was invested in these stocks without consultation with them at all.

The question is, will the Congress of the United States refuse to indemnify these Indians under the circumstances under which their money has been disposed of? Their lands were sold for $365,000 in gold. Forty thousand dollars of it was kept five or six or seven years without investment. On that not one cent of interest has been paid to these Indians. According to the treaty, such sum was to be retained as would pay the expenses of the sale. Here is an account showing that the officer who conducted that sale, which lasted only three weeks, had $17,000 allowed to him. I suppose it came out of the Indian money. The register and receiver of the land office received each $2,500. Four thousand dollars was charged for clerk hire—the whole amount running up to seventeen or eighteen thousand dollars. The Indians have a right to come before Congress on this subject.

But the simple proposition in this bill is that Congress shall assume the amount of the bonds invested in Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Louisiana stock, amounting to $89,000. The Indians only ask that this amount shall be invested for them in bonds of the United States at five per cent. The Government invested the money of these Indians without their consent and against their protest.

And, Mr. Speaker, there is a precedent for this act. I find one, at least, in which where States have been in default, the Government has assumed the interest on the bonds in which it had invested. When Indiana was in default at one time for two or three years, the interest on its bonds invested in behalf of the Indians was assumed and paid by the Government. It is a matter of simple equity and justice toward these Indians. The Government of the United States stands in the nature of a guardian or curator to these Indians; but they have not been treated as wards ought to be treated by their guardians or curators, but rather as step-children, and are very badly treated at that. The seventh article of the treaty shows precisely what I have stated in regard to the position in which the Indians stood toward the Government as regards investment of their money.

Mr. MORRILL resumed the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. This being a new question before the House, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri whether there is any charge of bad faith against the Government in the management of this fund, and whether, if the Government made an investment of this fund with such reasonable care as a trustee might be required to exercise, the Government should be held responsible for the losses that have accrued?

Mr. WILDER. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the letter from the Commissioner shows the fact that the Indians were not consulted as to the buying of these bonds, although it was expressly stipulated that they should be consulted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The main point is this: the gentleman from Missouri puts the case on the ground of the ordinary liability of a trustee. That liability does not exist where the trustee makes a bona fide investment which proves to be unfortunate. I ask whether in this case the Government was required to consult the Indians?

Mr. KING. It was.

Mr. HOLMAN. And if not so required, was the investment made in good faith, or not?

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, this appropriation may be all right, but my experience in this House leads me to look at all these Indian claims with more or less suspicion. This claim comes up here in a form which, if we sanction it by the passage of a law recognizing the fact that the United States is to guaranty all the bonds of the southern States in which it may have invested, will involve large sums of money.

Then the question of fact in relation to our obligations, that we ought to have consulted the Indians in relation to the investment of their money, is a matter that should be thoroughly investigated. I trust that a measure of this importance will not be allowed to pass by merely a dozen votes in the House, for I certainly think there were not more than a dozen members who were paying the slightest attention to the matter. I trust the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and will be examined by them before it shall be allowed to become a law. I demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be upon the motion to reconsider.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 50.

Mr. VOORHEES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say a word upon this motion.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire, then, to ask the Chair a question. I inquire whether this bill was not reported regularly by the Committee on Indian Affairs, considered in the House, and passed; and whether the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont is not now to recommit this bill, not to the Committee on Indian Affairs, who have had the matter under investigation, but to the Committee on the Judiciary, who have not had it under consideration?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Vermont to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed.

Mr. VOORHEES. Does not the motion also include the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. It does not. That motion would not be in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say, however, that if the motion to reconsider is carried, it is my purpose to move to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope it will be done.

Mr. DENISON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, Chanler, Denison, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Marey, McBride, McCune, McDowell, McClure, Noble, Perham, Perry, Price, Rafford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, John B. Steele, Stiles, Thayer, Voorhees, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Alvey, Allison, Ames, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Freeman Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Ashel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Longyear, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Anos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pike, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Thomas, Upson, William B. Washburn, and Wilson—54.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF WISCONSIN INDIANS.

Mr. McINDOE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill providing for the removal of certain stray bands of Indians from the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. McINDOE. I ask that the bill may be put on its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is the safest to refer these bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. This bill makes an appropriation, and I make that question of order.

Mr. McINDOE. I move to suspend the rules to enable us to consider the bill in the House.

The motion was not agreed to, two thirds not having voted therefor.

The bill was therefore referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

OREGON INDIANS.

Mr. McBRIDE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to negotiate with certain Indians of middle Oregon for the relinquishment of certain rights secured to them by treaty; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think these bills all require some consideration, and I therefore make the question of order that this bill makes an appropriation, and must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the question of order. The bill is therefore referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN UTAH.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that they do pass, the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 220) to vacate and sell the present Indian reservations in Utah Territory, and to settle the Indians of said Territory in the Uinta valley.

The amendments were taken up for consideration.

First amendment:

Strike out the words "and so situated as to best adapt them to the natural facilities of the country for the purposes of irrigation," and insert in lieu thereof the words "under the general direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office," so as to cause the lands to be surveyed under the general direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Insert after the word "advertisement," in the clause "shall cause said tracts or lots to be sold upon sealed bids, to be duly invited by public advertisement, to the highest and best bidder," the words "for a period of not less than three months in a newspaper of general circulation, published in the Territory of Utah, and also in a newspaper published in Washington."

The amendment was agreed to.

Third amendment:

Insert after the word "bidder," in the same clause, the following:

And said bids may be filed with the Governor of said Territory, at the seat of government thereof, and with the Secretary of the Interior in Washington; such bids as may be received by said Governor shall, without opening the same, be forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, when the same, with the bids filed with him, shall be opened in the presence of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Public Lands, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and any bidders who may choose to be present at the opening thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

After the word "shall," in line thirteen, insert the words "Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the several

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS J. GALBRAITH.

Mr. WINDOM also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Thomas J. Galbraith, of Minnesota.

The resolution was read a first and second time.

The resolution directs the proper accounting officers of the Interior and Treasury Departments to settle and adjust the money and property accounts and claims of Thomas J. Galbraith, agent of the United States for the Sioux Indians of Minnesota, upon principles of equity and justice, under certain regulations and restrictions prescribed in the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to state briefly the grounds upon which the committee reported the resolution. Mr. Galbraith was agent for the Sioux Indians. At the Indian outbreak in 1862 his office was broken open and his papers destroyed. There are certificates of his own to the amount of $5,507 for which there are no proper vouchers. This resolution authorizes the proper accounting officers to settle with him upon his affidavit, and if they think proper to call in other evidence to substantiate the affidavit to do so.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MANAGEMENT OF THE INDIANS.

Mr. WINDOM also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill for the benefit of and better management of the Indians.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOUIS ROBERTS.

Mr. WINDOM also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 234) for the relief of Louis Roberts.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Louis Roberts the sum of $2,740 99, that being the amount of money advanced by said Roberts out of his own means to replace certain Indian indemnity goods accidentally destroyed by fire in November, 1855, while being transported by him from St. Paul to Redwood agency for R. J. Murphey, Indian agent, for the Sioux Indians, in Minnesota.

Mr. ANCONA. As that bill contains an appropriation, I object to its being considered in the House.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (No. 216) to grant the rights of preemption to certain settlers on the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, in the State of California; and

An act (No. 223) to regulate the foreign coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, and for other purposes.

B. F. KENDALL.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 414) for the relief of the estate of B. F. Kendall.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of B. F. Kendall, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Washington Territory, the sum of $2,108 30, the same being the amount shown to have been disbursed by him in his lifetime, and for which no vouchers were to be found.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to raise a point of order upon this bill. I understand that it was introduced into the House and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I make the point of order under the act organizing the Court of Claims. The second section of that act provides that all petitions and bills praying or providing for the satisfaction of private claims against the Government founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of any Executive Department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, shall, unless otherwise ordered by the resolution of the House to which the same are presented or introduced, be transferred by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House, with all the accompanying papers, to the Court of Claims.

Now, it is very true that if this bill did not come within either of those definitions it might have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but if it comes within either of the classes embraced in the law, it must go to the Court of Claims.

I make this point of order because I find that the Senate are making the same point of order on the bills which go from this House to that body.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that the House has ordered by resolution that this bill should be sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs. They have, therefore, complied with the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where a bill is introduced into the House and ordered, without any special resolution, to be referred to a particular committee, does the Chair regard that as a resolution of the House, within the meaning of the law?

The SPEAKER. It is an order of the House, which is a resolution of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the bill does not make an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It is not in technical language an appropriation.

Mr. ALLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] if this Mr. Kendall is the Indian agent who was murdered last year?

Mr. WINDOM. He is the Indian superintendent who was murdered.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say, then, that I understood incidentally his accounts were behind. I would like to know how that is.

Mr. WINDOM. I would like to know what the gentleman means by "incidentally."

Mr. ALLEY. I heard soon after the murder that his accounts were in a bad state.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to have a letter from the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs read, which will explain this matter.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, April 27, 1864.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, inclosing copy of House bill No. 414, for the relief of the estate of B. F. Kendall, late superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, and asking my opinion as to whether the account should be allowed, and other information touching said account from papers and documents on file in this office.

In reply, I have to state that the final accounts of late Superintendent Kendall were presented for settlement by Edward Lander, administrator of his estate, and upon examination they were found correct and in due form, excepting the sum of $2,108 30, under the head of Nez Perces agency, appropriation for beneficial objects, &c., which Superintendent Kendall brought on to his account current as disbursed under that head, referring to a receipt marked "A." This receipt was not with the accounts when presented to this office for settlement, and from the statement of Mr. Lander, it was not found among any of the papers of the deceased when he took charge of his affairs. The entries upon the accounts appear to have been made by Mr. Kendall himself before his death, and it is fair to suppose that he would not have brought this amount upon his account as disbursed, the same time referring to a certain voucher or receipt, without first having the proper receipt for the money so disbursed.

I inclose herewith a copy of the statement of Agent Hutchins made to this office relative to a conversation that took place between himself and Superintendent Kendall when Mr. Kendall turned over to him the balance of the money in his hands belonging to the Nez Perces agency, which seems to corroborate the statement of the account.

There are no papers on file in this office that give further information on the subject than what I have before stated. But in view of the circumstantial evidence in the case, and the fact that all of Mr. Kendall's transactions with the Department heretofore having been found correct, I am of the opinion that no further testimony can be adduced in the premises, and have no reason to presume that the amount, $2,108 30, was not faithfully disbursed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES E. MIX,
Acting Commissioner.

J. T. WILLIAMS, Esq.,
Clerk of Indian Committee, House of Representatives.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to say, in further answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that it appears from this letter that all of Mr. Kendall's accounts were settled with the exception of this item. It also appears from the statement of Judge Lander, on file in the case, that among his accounts there was found after his death a paper in his own handwriting stating that this amount had been paid as per voucher "A." That voucher has never been found. There is another item of proof tending to show that this money was actually paid, to wit, that in a conversation with Hutchins, he declared to Hutchins, in paying him an amount of money, that that was all that was due to this Nez Perces agency, showing that previously to that there must have been some other money paid. The fact is, that Mr. Kendall was killed in his office, and never had an opportunity of speaking to any one in reference to his accounts.

The Committee on Indian Affairs were unanimous in reporting this bill, believing that the claim is a just one and ought to be paid.

Mr. ALLEY. I will state that I made the inquiry because I remember distinctly that shortly after the time Mr. Kendall was murdered, I was at the Department, and they were there relating the circumstances; the statement was made that his accounts were in a bad state, and that he was probably a defaulter to a small amount. I am perfectly satisfied, however, with the explanation of the gentleman from Minnesota, and shall vote for the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. M. CLENNEY.

Mr. WINDOM also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a petition for the relief of A. M. Clenney, of New Mexico; which was laid on the table.

NORTHERN INDIAN SUPERINTENDENCY.

Mr. WINDOM also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 399) to abolish the northern Indian superintendency, and asked that it be laid on the table.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, that appears to be a bill which I introduced; and I apprehend that the Committee on Indian Affairs has come to a wrong conclusion in respect to it.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would like to have the bill referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that I may bring it up and discuss it at some suitable time.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection.

The bill was thereupon referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) the business reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs having precedence.

INDIANS IN WISCONSIN.

The first business before the committee was a bill providing for the removal of certain stray bands of Indians from the State of Wisconsin.

The bill was read. It authorizes the President of the United States to appoint two commissioners whose duty it shall be to collect together certain stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians and transport them to their tribal homes in Kansas and Dakota. The second section provides that the commissioners shall receive such reasonable compensation, in proportion to the time employed, as the Secretary of the Interior may deem just. The third section appropriates $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the first section, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The report was read.

Mr. MCINDOE. I ask for the reading of a letter from the Department of the Interior:

The letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, February 10, 1864.

SIR: I herewith return a communication addressed to you on the 9th instant by Hon. W. D. MCINDOE and by you referred to this office for report, in which that gentleman states that he is directed by the House Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire as to the necessity for the removal of certain Pottawatomie and Winnebago Indians from the State of Wisconsin to their respective tribes in Kansas and Dakota.

From the best data in my possession it appears that there are from seven to nine hundred of these Indians. They are disconnected from their tribes, have no agent residing with them, do not receive annuities, have no settled habitation, and are not under the control of this Department.

They appear to be Indians who have refused to go with their respective tribes at the time of their removal or have since abandoned them, and are now leading a wild vagabond life, gaining a precarious subsistence by the chase, petty pilfering, or begging. They are doubtless a source of great annoyance to the settlements through which they roam, and during last summer caused great alarm by the threatening attitude they assumed toward the whites and by the commission of several murders attended with circumstances of peculiar atrocity. For full and specific information upon these points I respectfully refer to the recent annual report from this office, pages 356 to 374, inclusive.

I have no doubt that the situation of the Indians would be much improved if they were removed to and compelled to remain with their respective tribes; and it is quite certain that the prosperity of the settlements through which they now wander is retarded by their presence, and that the Indians are exceedingly troublesome and vexatious to the whites composing those settlements.

In regard to the probable expense of removing these Indians I can only say, that in case they can be collected without an unusual amount of trouble the expense will, in my opinion, not exceed thirty five dollars per head, which (estimating their numbers at nine hundred) will amount to $31,500, for which an appropriation must be made, there being now no funds applicable to that object. It should, however, be remarked that in consequence of the indisposition of the Indians to remove to their respective tribes there is reason to apprehend that a military force will be required to collect them and enforce such removal.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. F. DOLE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. P. USHER, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the third section by striking out $30,000 and inserting $20,000. I submit the amendment for the purpose of saying a word upon this subject. This bill is in very wonderful contrast with the humanitarian theories which now prevail in this country. There is a general desire to ameliorate and alleviate all classes of people everywhere; and it is the theory of the philanthropists all over the country that if you would improve the condition of the Indian you must bring him under the influence of civilization, and subject him to the restraints and moral forces which pervade civilized society. That theory has been applied to another race, a subject race in this country, and there seems to be no good reason why it should not also be applied to the Indian tribes. While so much humanity is being displayed in other fields of benevolence, it is a remarkable fact that you propose by this bill to appropriate by military force these scattered bands of Indians to a region of country where they can be under no humanizing influence. I do not know but that it might be better for the single State of Wisconsin that the Indians shall be removed, but at the same time it is tremendously in conflict with the theories of humanity which seem to pervade the country. If we were to apply the same principle to the other race to which I have alluded, and which was brought here, to be sure by force, while the Indians are here by nature—if we were to propose to remove the Africans, there would be a universal expression of indignation. The proposition would shock public sensibility everywhere. It would not be tolerated for a moment, and yet you cannot say that in the one case you would be acting humanely and in the other acting inhumanely.

If I lived in the State of Wisconsin I think I should be in favor of the removal of these Indians. But I do submit that gentlemen who favor these schemes of philanthropy and humanity, and who profess to carry them out to their utmost limit or extent, show a rather singular mode of exhibiting that sentiment in reference to these unfortunate sons of the forest who happen to be living within the reach of civilization.

The proposition is not only to appropriate money out of the public Treasury to remove these Indians, but to remove them by military force, to drive them out. And it is put upon the ground that the General Government having bought their land and sold it to white settlers, now owes it to white settlers to remove these incumbrances from their land because they are troublesome. Now I think it would be better to try to humanize and civilize these Indians, to make them proper inhabitants of a civilized community, rather than by the sword and the bayonet to drive them out, and remove them beyond all the influences of civilization, and consign them to the life of the barbarian and savage.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I can hardly appreciate the argument which my friend from Indiana uses, coming from the source it does. If it had come from any of my friends on the other side of the House I think I should have fully appreciated it. He seems to be "chuck-full" of humanity to-day, and I believe that it is a new thing with him.

I am further inclined to think that the gentleman only makes use of the argument for the purpose of suggesting to our friends on the other side of the House in support of his position. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a pressing necessity for the removal of these Indians from the State of Wisconsin. They are constantly committing depredations upon the inhabitants to whom the Government has sold lands, and which they perhaps purchased from these Indians in the first instance. These depredations are not confined merely to thieving and robbing, but they actually commit murder and every crime known to the law. If the parents are gone the children are maltreated and perhaps murdered. If the husband is gone the wife is the object of their violence. There are many instances I could relate, upon the border settlements of Wisconsin, where all these crimes have been committed upon the inhabitants. It is not proposed to drive them out by military force; it is proposed that we should appoint commissioners who will go there and induce them to go and join their own tribes; that they shall gather up the scattered individuals of these tribes and take them to their homes, where the great body of the tribes are located.

I do not know as to the amount that will be required for the removal of these Indians. My colleague, [Mr. MCINDOE,] who has had charge of the bill, is satisfied that the amount named is the proper one. I have not considered that question at all. But as to the necessity for their removal, both as regards their interests and the interests of the inhabitants living upon the borders, I say to the House that there is a pressing necessity for it. It ought to be done.

The gentleman admits the necessity of this bill when he says that if he lived in Wisconsin he would want these Indians removed. Yes, sir, I apprehend that if he lived there, and his wife and children were in the border settlements of Wisconsin, he would want them removed. Well, sir, I cannot see how he should oppose it with that admission, although he does not reside in Wisconsin. It seems to me that a Representative upon this floor ought to go somewhat beyond the State bounds of Indiana, that he ought to be willing, acknowledging the necessity for the removal of these Indians, to make the necessary provision for it, even if they are in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I made the few remarks I did upon this bill for the purpose of showing gentlemen upon the other side of the House where their own policy would lead them, and for the purpose of illustrating the difference in the policy of gentlemen upon the other side of the House in reference to two classes of population, neither of which, at least in my State, are considered desirable.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I thought I comprehended the gentleman's position in time, and I did not expect it was necessary for me to do anything more than to draw the tap to have another just such speech as he made upon the subject of philanthropy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment. Mr. ELIOT. I move to amend by inserting the following proviso:

Provided, That the compensation to be paid to the commissioner shall not exceed the sum usually paid for similar services.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

INDIANS IN OREGON.

A bill (H. R. No. 442) to authorize the President of the United States to negotiate with certain Indians in middle Oregon, for the relinquishment of certain rights secured to them by treaty, was next taken up.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the President of the United States to negotiate with the tribes known as the confederated tribes of middle Oregon, for the relinquishment of certain rights guaranteed to them by the third article of the treaty made with them in 1859, and appropriates the sum of $5,000 for that purpose.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask to have an extract read from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"At the Warm Springs reservation are located the confederated tribes of middle Oregon, numbering from one thousand to twelve hundred souls. Their reservation is completely isolated, and on that account is valuable for the purpose for which it is intended. The Indians are reported to have made greater progress during the past year than in any preceding period of five years. Many of them have built for themselves houses, and have opened and are cultivating small farms, from which they derive a comfortable subsistence. But for an unfortunate provision in their treaty, by which the privilege of leaving their reservation for the purpose of fishing and grazing stock is secured to them, it is not doubted that the Indians would rapidly improve. Under this provision they claim and exercise the right of leaving the reserve and visiting the fisheries upon the Columbia and other rivers, and are thus enabled to procure large quantities of whisky, which, besides its pernicious effects upon them, causes them to be exceedingly annoying to the whites. The superintendent is of the opinion that for $3,000, in presents of agricultural implements and other useful articles, they would be willing to abrogate this provision of their treaty. If this be so, I know of no like expenditure that would be productive of more beneficial results, and I respectfully request that an appropriation of that amount be solicited for the purpose indicated."

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask that there may also be read an extract from the report of the superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"On the contrary, there is an ample amount of good land to raise food for all the Indians located upon it, a sufficient supply of timber and water, and its location, far away from any of the great routes of travel and the new gold fields, will permit the Indians, if confined to the reservation, to be kept away from the contaminating influences of white associations. But, unfortunately, the treaty of April 18, 1859, with the confederated tribes and bands of middle Oregon, provides in article one that the Indians shall have the right to fish in common with the citizens of the United States at the fisheries on the lower Des Chutes and Columbia rivers, and to pasture their animals, hunt, gather berries and roots, on unclaimed lands outside of the reservation. The effect of this unfortunate provision of the treaty is to permit the Indians to leave the reservation whenever they choose, and they really reside at the reservation but a small portion of the year. Under pretense of fishing and herding their stock, they infest the towns along the Columbia river, and defy all the efforts of the agent to prevent their procuring whisky. The sales of fish and ponies, and the prostitution of their women afford them plenty of money, and render them less desirous than they otherwise would be to engage in agriculture."

"From information received of Agent Logan, and from conversations with the Indians during my visit in June last, I am confident that for a moderate sum invested in clothing, agricultural implements, team, &c., they would be willing to give up the right, and consent to be confined to the reservation. This, if accomplished, would relieve the white settlements of a very great nuisance, and very much better the condition of the Indians. I recommend an appropriation of $3,000, to be paid in two annual installments, for that purpose."

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

TITLE TO INDIAN LANDS IN UTAH.

A bill (H. R. No. 222) to extinguish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes, with the amendment thereto in the nature of a substitute, was next taken up.

The substitute, which was read, authorizes the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to enter into treaties with the various tribes of Indians of Utah Territory, upon such terms as may be deemed just to the Indians and beneficial to the Government of the United States, provided such treaties shall provide for the absolute surrender to the United States, by the Indians, of their possessory right to all agricultural and mineral lands in the Territory except such agricultural lands as by treaties may be set apart for reservations for the Indians; and provided also that all such reservations shall be selected at points as remote as may be practicable from the present settlements in Utah Territory. It further provides that in agreeing with the Indians upon the amounts to be paid to them under the provisions of the treaties to be negotiated in pursuance of the act, care shall be taken to obtain from the Indians, to the greatest possible extent, their consent to receive for such payments agricultural implements, stock, and other useful articles rather than money.

The bill further appropriates the sum of $25,000 to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe there is no provision in the substitute for the appointment of any agents. Is there a general provision of law fixing the salaries of agents who may be appointed?

Mr. WINDOM. There is. This substitute was prepared by the Secretary of the Interior, and it meets with his approbation.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the committee rise and report the several bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and especially certain bills referred to it from the Committee on Indian Affairs; and had directed him to report the same to the House, two with and one without amendments.

WISCONSIN INDIANS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 441) providing for the removal of certain stray bands of Indians from the State of Wisconsin; reported to the House with an amendment.

Mr. WINDOM demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The first question being on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIANS IN OREGON.

A bill (H. R. No. 442) to authorize the President of the United States to negotiate with certain Indians in middle Oregon for the relinquishment of certain rights secured to them by treaty was next taken up, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McBRIDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN LANDS IN UTAH.

A bill to relinquish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes, reported from the Committee of the Whole, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, was next taken up.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. McINDOE and Mr. SCOTT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 18, noes 80.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The substitute reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STAFF OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce and have passed a joint resolution, to which I think there will be no objection. It is a joint resolution in relation to the pay of staff officers of the Lieutenant General.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that staff officers on the staff of the Lieutenant General shall be entitled to receive the same pay, emoluments, and allowances as staff officers of the same grade on the staffs of corps commanders, the same to take effect on the day of their appointment on the staff of the Lieutenant General.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the House desires any explanation on the subject, I will send up a letter from the Lieutenant General. [Cries of "Oh, no!" and "All right!"]

The joint resolution was received and read a first and second time.

It was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MINNESOTA RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 31, making a grant of lands to the Mississippi and Lake Superior Railroad Company in the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of the railroad of said company from St. Paul to Lake Superior. The bill passed the House with certain amendments; and the Senate has made certain amendments to those amendments, which are chiefly of a verbal and unimportant character. I ask that the bill be taken up, and that the House concur in those amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read, and, no objection being made, the bill was taken up.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire of the Chair what would be the effect of a motion to lay the amendments of the Senate upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It would carry the bill with it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I make that motion.

Mr. DONNELLY. Let me say that the principal amendment of the Senate limits the company to the alternate sections, whereas the amendment of the House allowed them to take lands within fifteen miles from any of the sections. The amendment of the Senate is, therefore, against the railroad company and for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the amendments of the Senate. But this bill, and the series of bills of which it is one, passed through the House, in the first place without more than the usual consideration, and no test vote as to the policy of appropriating public lands for this purpose has yet been taken. I have no more objection to this bill than I have to all of the series of bills of this character which will be brought before the House for consideration by Senate amendments. I make the motion to lay upon the table for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the question, so that we may decide upon the record whether we propose to appropriate this vast body of public lands for this purpose at this time, when every acre of the public domain ought, if possible, to be retained as the basis upon which the credit of the country shall rest, or else for the next best purpose, that of providing homesteads for actual settlers. It is for that reason and that only, that I make the motion.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will say, with the gentleman's permission, that it is hardly fair to raise this question at this time. This bill has passed the House. The amendments of the Senate, now before us, are either merely verbal or are against the interests of the railroad company. I trust that if the question of the appropriation of public lands for railroad purposes is to be raised in this House it will not be upon this bill or at this stage. It is not fair, Mr. Speaker, and especially upon a motion which precludes debate, to raise that question. I am occupying the floor only by the sufferance of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table unconditionally.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will say, then—although I did not expect to have to discuss this question at this time—that if any bill which has passed this House appropriating lands for railroad purposes has merit, this certainly is that bill. It proposes to connect the great Mississippi valley, around the head waters of which our State lies, with the head of Lake Superior, forming part of the northeastern boundary of our State. It thus proposes a connection between the two great navigable water systems of our country, the Mississippi river and its tributaries, and the chain of great lakes. The distance between those two water systems is one hundred and forty miles. The greater part of that distance is through a country of comparatively little value, most of it being in the nature of a water-shed, as it is termed, the land being to a great extent poor and swampy.

This road affords to the people of Minnesota an outlet to the great lakes. Before the outbreak of the rebellion the outlet for the grain crop of our State was, to a great extent, by way of the Mississippi valley to the city of St. Louis. The war and the derangements of commerce consequent upon it have interfered with that outlet, and the people of Minnesota now have to reach a commercial market by way of the great lakes. Heretofore their course has been over the railroads running across the State of Wisconsin to Lake Michigan, a distance in all of three or four hundred miles. The people of Minnesota are a frontier people, and are dependent entirely for their prosperity upon the growth of wheat and the other cereals. And I say to this House that the monopoly of the Wisconsin railroads, by means of which alone our people gain an outlet to the great lakes, is worse than the monopoly of which we have heard so much here of the railroads running across the State of New Jersey. Three or four years ago these railroads carried the wheat raised by the farmers of Minnesota at the rate of from eight cents to twelve cents a bushel; the next year the rate of freight was raised to fifteen cents a bushel, and the following year to eighteen and twenty cents a bushel; and now it is proposed, as I am informed, to tax the raisers of wheat thirty cents a bushel. The House can easily see that where wheat is raised in the frontier States at a considerable distance from the great markets, the imposition of such a tax as this is the virtual annihilation of the main support of the people, and the destruction of the industry of the State. They therefore unanimously ask Congress for a grant of land to enable them to construct this road, one hundred and forty miles in length, from the head of navigation of the Mississippi river to the head of Lake Superior. So important do the people of my State esteem this measure to all their interests, that the State has already granted to this railroad company a grant of the swamp lands lying within a certain distance of the road, and the city of St. Paul, the capital of the State, has voted $250,000 as a bonus to the company. Our whole people watch the course of this bill with the greatest anxiety, because, as I have attempted to show, their agricultural prosperity rests upon its passage.

I have nothing to say, Mr. Speaker, as to other land grants made by Congress for similar purposes. I have no doubt they have been all proper and just; but I will say one word in answer to that doctrine which has been very extensively broached here of late—that we should reserve these lands for the benefit of the creditors of the country. On the route on which this road is proposed to be run, the lands have been in the market for twelve years without being purchased; not an offer has been made to purchase them; and they will remain a quarter of a century longer without being purchased unless they are opened up by this railroad. If you would make the public lands valuable to the nation it must be by their development. If you go to any of the land offices in my State, even in the most favored regions, as, for instance, the country west of St. Cloud, you will find whole tracts of country, entire counties, that have been put up for sale without finding purchasers. Lands in such a condition are not a security, and are of no benefit to the country; but if you do as proposed here, if you encourage capital to build great lines of roads through them, the Government reserving to itself the alternate sections, those alternate sections will be worth more than the whole land before the grant was made; the country will be settled up and become populated, and you can then obtain a ready sale and a remunerative price for your lands, and in addition you will find that you have added to the taxable population of the country new, vast, and prosperous communities.

I shall not trespass further upon the time of the House, except to repeat that I think it unfair and unjust to raise such a question at this stage of the bill. This bill was introduced into the Senate at the commencement of the session; was passed by the Senate; was for two months in the hands of the Committee of the House on Public Lands, was reported back unanimously by the committee, (with the exception of one member [Mr. DAWSON] from Pennsylvania,) and passed this House without division; and I therefore think it most unfair and unjust to raise such a question at this time and in this manner. Let the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] introduce a prospective resolution, declaring it to be the sense of the House that no more such land grants shall be made; and let him test the sense of the House fairly and fully on that question. Or let him attack, if he chooses, all the other bills of this character, of Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, &c., and ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which they all passed; but let him not raise a general and abstract question of public policy on this particular local measure at the stage which it has now reached.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota give way to me for a moment?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has referred to the monopoly which Wisconsin at present enjoys of the carrying trade of Minnesota. It is true as he states it, but I can assure him and the House that Wisconsin does not desire to control or monopolize that great carrying trade at the expense of the interests of Minnesota. We fully appreciate the fact that this road, to aid in the construction of which it is proposed to give this grant of land, is of vital consequence to the State of Minnesota, and hence the members on this floor from Wisconsin favor it.

In answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I desire simply to say a word. If the gentleman seeks to make these lands lying in the northern portions of the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin of any value whatever to the Government, he must give us railroads for opening them up to settlement, for they will never be sold unless railroads are built. In all these land grants the alternate sections reserved by the Government where the roads are built are worth more to the Government than all the lands would be without the roads. And it is the only means by which these lands will ever be settled. They will remain a waste for twenty, thirty, or forty years, unless these roads are built.

In relation to the other point made by the gentleman from Indiana, that these lands should be reserved for homesteads for actual settlers, I can tell the gentleman that any man who is familiar with that section of country, the northern part of Minnesota and Wisconsin, knows that settlers will not locate on these lands unless they have facilities for carrying their produce to market and bringing back the necessities of life to the settlements. Any man in that section of country who is located more than twenty miles from the line of a railroad has gone so far that it is utterly impossible for him to cultivate the soil, or engage in agricultural pursuits with any hope of profit to himself. It is a losing business for him; he cannot afford it. The only means by which that country can ever be settled will be by Congress exercising the wise policy of giving these grants of the public domain in alternate sections for the construction of railroads. In that way a population will be brought to settle in that portion of the country. The country itself is desirable; the soil is fertile, susceptible of cultivation, and its settlement will add to our wealth and prosperity. It will add a hardy people to the population of this country.

In my judgment the views which have been expressed upon this floor in hostility to these land grants are based upon a narrow, illiberal policy, and upon an ignorance of the true condition and wants of that great section of our country.

The section of country in Wisconsin, through which the line of road passes for which a grant of land has been made, for a hundred miles contains no settlements whatever, but remains an unbroken wilderness stretching away to the shores of Lake Superior. By giving these alternate sections of lands you will introduce a population and settlement upon these lands, and by that means the Government will be able to sell the lands reserved by it.

I do not desire to occupy the attention of the committee, but it seems to me the arguments are strong and irrefutable in favor of grants of this kind. No gentleman, even though he may live upon the seaboard, who has given any attention to the condition of this country should refuse, in view of the great interests at stake, to give his vote in favor of these grants.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make a single remark in reference to the last observation of the gentleman from Wisconsin, from which the inference would be drawn that it is from gentlemen on the seaboard that the opposition to these land grants comes. Let me say to the gentleman that there is no class of Representatives in this Hall who have voted so consistently and generously for grants of lands for railroads in the West as those coming from the seaboard.

Mr. HOLMAN. Maine, I believe, has had a little railroad matter on hand lately.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine that we do not regard the gentleman from Indiana as living in the West.

Mr. HOLMAN. My State is not, in the proper sense of the term, a western State.

I desire to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota. Upon my own part there is no hostility to the granting of public lands having public ends only in view for proper purposes. I submit, however, that the argument that this is the only way by which the lands in the western sections of the country can be populated is not sustained by the history of the population of the Northwest. The great States of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa, to a great extent, and indeed almost the whole western country, have been settled by the great advancing tide of population from the East to the West, without any artificial aids; and a more solid, homogeneous population was never gathered together on the face of the earth, possessing one remarkable attribute—that of almost perfect equality in wealth and knowledge. A country populated at once from various sections, under the influence of artificial agencies, must inevitably be a country in which there will be great differences and extremes among the people—extremes of wealth and poverty. The railroad power is a centralizing power. It is so in the old sections of the Union; and it is found to be a tremendous centralizing power in the western States, furnishing to fortunate adventurers facilities for immense fortunes.

I know there is an anxiety upon the part of gentlemen to have the western country settled at as early a day as possible, but it will only hasten on the bitter fruits of the dense population of the Old World. It is infinitely better and wiser that the lands should be settled slowly, thereby securing a solid population, equal in wealth and equal in condition, securing a continued outlet for our people, than that they should be settled and the lands appropriated at once. We ought not to legislate for a day or a year, but with reference to the permanent and enduring interests of the country. And I say again that the monopoly of this vast amount of public lands, millions upon millions of acres, held by overgrown corporations, has the inevitable tendency to centralize the wealth of the country, aid the tendencies of this centralizing war. Take, for instance, the great Illinois Central Railroad Company, which now holds one quarter of the public lands originally granted to it by the Government. It now proposes to sell those lands at enormously advanced prices, not prices advanced by the influence of the railroad itself, but by the tide of population which has invaded and which would have invaded that State had there been no railroad in the State, robbing the people of homesteads. I would far sooner see the country fill up gradually with a population equal in wealth and condition, than to see it filled up by those artificial agencies, by which inequality of wealth, education, and condition is inevitably created, tending to subvert those republican principles of free government which must ever rest on the comparative and general equality of the people.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire to say to the House that this bill has already passed both Houses, and that we are only acting now upon amendments proposed by the Senate.

Mr. DONNELLY demanded the previous question upon the Senate amendments.

Mr. DAWSON. I demand the yeas and nays, because I am opposed to the bill, and want to vote against it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the several amendments of the Senate were agreed to.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the several amendments were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAMES OF VESSELS.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, the bill of the House for the prevention and punishment of frauds in reference to the names of vessels, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken from the Speaker's table, and the Senate amendment concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the House now take a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House (at four o'clock, p. m.) took a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at seven o'clock, p. m.

REBELLIOUS STATES.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill in regard to the rebellious States, upon which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the task is imposed upon this Congress of prescribing the shapes into which the institutions of the rebellious States shall mold themselves when the mighty agitations of the civil war have subsided and peace is once more restored to society. It is not possible to avoid the responsibility of this task. We must meet it in all its magnitude. The necessities of the time—the time itself—require it of us.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the human mind never addressed itself to the solution of any problem more grave or more momentous than this. The immediate consequences to ourselves of any course we may see fit to adopt are great enough to give us pause; but when we look down the long vista of the world's future we cannot but perceive that the results of our presentation will stretch away through all the coming ages, and act and react upon human society so long as our race continues to inhabit the globe.

The great struggles of European politics—hitherto the chief subjects of history—dwarf and shrink into insignificance beside this mighty problem; the destiny of a hemisphere, and in that destiny the fate of mankind.

The past history of the struggle in which we are now engaged has been comparatively simple.

It was not difficult to foresee that the mass of the people, influenced by all those ties which bind men to their flag and their country, would gather to the defense of the nation against destruction. Even about the condition of war itself there is a certain degree of simplicity. It is but physical force contending against prescribed obstacles, and it goes forward with all the directness and precision of a purely physical power. But when the war is ended, when physical force has played its part, when the sword is sheathed in the scabbard and the face of the soldier is turned homeward, when the country is restored to that condition of things out of which the war arose, then, and not till then, will come the true difficulties of our position. The struggle will pass from the field of battle to the arena of politics; to that terrible arena where death can be inflicted and no sword be lifted, where a nation can perish and no blood mark the spot where it fell.

It is easy to say that the fate of this rebellion will prevent all future rebellions. Great events do not repeat themselves. This has been a struggle in which insurgent populations struck at constituted authority; the next may be waged by the forces of evil clothed in all the sanctities of office against the liberty of the nation. We cannot draw precedents out of revolutions. It is not given to the cunning of man to conceive the thousand hues which the warp and woof of circumstances will assume under the shifting hand of time.

We have already had upon this continent many instances wherein republican institutions have given birth to a long succession of anarchical revolutions; not one where the dreadful progeny has stopped with the first birth, and where an appeased struggle has been followed by a perpetual peace. It would seem to be a rule of nature that these monsters of the political world should procreate their species; and it will require upon the part of the American people the broadest wisdom, the wisest statesmanship to root out from the soil of the country forever the spirit of anarchy which has obtained such a strong foothold upon it.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we should approach this grave and solemn question with none of the bitter sentiments of partisans. Ages after the froth of our declamations has disappeared in that oblivion which swallows up so much of human toil and endeavor the consequences of our present action will remain, massive and momentous in the midst of the world, working misery or conferring happiness upon untold millions of men. In the presence of that august future the language of reproach and recrimination should die upon our lips, and we should address ourselves to the problem before us with but one absorbing thought—the safety of the nation.

This, after all, Mr. Speaker, must be the central core of all that can be said on this question. The safety of the nation! Beside this what can be counted important? Laws, constitutions, governments, are but means to this end, and this end includes all for which laws, constitutions, and governments are valuable.

The mass of the people should understand that they are the stake involved in this contest. The rich and the great float above the reach of misgovernment and thrive even upon the surface of despotism; but as we descend the scale of society the consequences of misgovernment become more and more apparent, and when at last we reach the basis of the social structure they stand out in characters never to be mistaken. The contrast between the prosperous laborers of America, the peasantry of France, and the lazzaroni of Italy, marks with precision the difference between the three Governments. It is upon the poor man, after all, the base of the column, that the whole weight of the superincumbent mass must rest. Let no man think, therefore, that his poverty or obscurity will screen him from the results of an unwise adjustment of our present troubles; those results will be as universal and as inevitable as death itself; they will follow him to his hovel; they will track him as he flies out into the pathless wilderness.

What, then, will insure the safety of the nation? There is but one answer: the prevention of that state of things out of which the rebellion arose.

I need not stop to discuss the right of the nation to take all measures necessary for its own existence. When a human being enters into the dreadful vortex of death the hand of the law is withdrawn from him. To save that life which God has given him, his first great right, he may commit all the crimes in the calendar. The sinking mariner has a right to shake off into the jaws of the tempest the drowning wretch who clings to the plank beside him. The claim to life stands higher than any known law.

Shall less be said of a nation, which is an association of men, with a life as dear to all as the life of any one man is to himself? Who shall assume that among the very safeguards which surround a nation something may be found with which to assassinate it?

While events move forward with gigantic steps they are rapidly trampling into the ground that poor, lame, blind absurdity, State sovereignty, that bastard of the old Confederation, that prolific parent of many of the woes which have fallen upon us, that bulwark behind which even yet treason betakes itself in its hour of terror. The American people are determined to be one nation; one absolute, supreme, irresistible nation; not in the words of Washington, as applied to the Confederation, "one nation to-day and thirteen to-morrow," not a Polish diet with as many vetoes as members, not a mere rope of sand, but one nation, for good and ill, now and forever one nation. The absolute power which rests somewhere shall rest in the hands of this Government. It matters nothing in what way the nation arose; whether from its creative abundance it gave birth to the States, or whether it grew from a congelation of the States. Possessing existence and being sovereign it has a right to all things necessary to a continuance of its life and sovereignty.

We who come, Mr. Speaker, from the far West have not that deep and ingrained veneration for State power which is to be found among the inhabitants of some of the older States. We have found that State lines, State names, State organizations, are in most cases, the veriest creatures of accident. To us there is no savor of antiquity about them. Our people move into a region of country and make the State. We feel ourselves to be offshoots of the nation. We look to the nation for protection. The love of our hearts gathers around the nation; and there is no prouder and no gladder sight to our eyes than the flag of the nation fluttering in the sunshine over our frontier homes. We are willing to trust the nation. We have never received aught at its hands but benefits. We need erect no bulwark of State sovereignty behind which to shelter ourselves from the gifts which it so generously and bountifully showers upon us; and when the order of nature is reversed and it calls to us in its extremity for help and protection, the farmer will be found leaving his plow in the furrow, and the woodman the tree half felled in the forest, to fly to its assistance. Part of a mighty nation, we feel that our fame and our greatness reach to the uttermost ends of the earth, over all the seas, and through all the continent. Citizens of States, we are lost and buried from the gaze of mankind, the tributary Nubias of those governments which control the mouth of our Nile; without commerce, without a navy, without a flag; the merest insignificant accidents. Be assured, sir, those interior States will forever insist upon "the Union," and will continue to insist upon it, even if abandoned by all the rest of the nation. It is their right to reach the sea in every direction over kindred territory; nay, it is more than their right; it is their necessity.

There is, then, one solidified sentiment in the hearts of our people, one sentiment which will not be denied, one sentiment which rises above all political considerations—this nation must live. What shall stand in the way of its life? The institution of slavery? Put the nation and slavery in the balance and ask the people of the Northwest to choose between them. What is slavery to them? Unfitted for their climate, repugnant to their tastes, destructive to their interests, bloody with the blood of their children, onerous with the weight of taxation to themselves, and terrible with portents of ruin to the nation in the future, what interest have they in the preservation of slavery? Will they for slavery give up that kind and generous Government which has so long blessed and protected them? Will they for slavery see their fair, bright flag, with all its clustering stars and all its lines of light, torn into shreds and trampled in the dust? Will they for slavery drag down upon themselves the fabric of their Government and bury themselves beneath mountains of anarchy and destruction? Never! It needs but to present the question to call forth a unanimous answer. Let that man step forth who is willing to bring calamity and ruin upon himself and family that a gigantic crime may continue to exist, undisturbed, a thousand miles away; who is willing to sacrifice the enjoyments of earth that hell may escape annoyance.

But it may be said slavery and the nation may continue to exist in unison. I appeal to history. Scarce had our Government taken shape when the anti-slavery agitation commenced under the lead of that great and good man, Benjamin Franklin; he who dragged the lightnings from heaven and the scepter from the grasp of tyrants. From that day to this the history of the country has been the history of slavery. For this end were our acquisitions of territory—Louisiana, Florida, New Mexico. For this end was the Mexican war. For this end were our conventions, our platforms, our fugitive slave laws, our compromises. Not content with the wide scope afforded in our own country, the demoniacal energy of slavery swept over the margin of the nation and invaded with armed expeditions the islands of the Gulf and the territories of the Isthmus. It even plumed its dark wings for a wilder flight, and sought the reopening of the African slave trade, the terror, the horror, and the disgrace of mankind. At length assailed and resisted by a people who had either to resist or fall prostrate before it, its accumulated vengeance burst forth in a tempest which now shakes the world to its center.

And now—what now? Why, we are asked to call, nay, to coax back this restless, insatiate, grasping, ungovernable monster, now clouding the horizon of the world and filling the air with the clangor of his arms, into the casket from which he escaped, to be held in peace forever under the Solomonic seal of the Constitution! It was permitted us to make of the cub of the lion a plaything and a pet; but the beast has reached the age of maturity; his eye-balls have learned to roll and his mane to bristle; he has broken loose from his fastenings, and betaking himself to the forest has brought horror and death upon a whole country-side; and now, now we are soberly asked to restore him, untamed and unharmed, to the tender bosom of our family circle, to become once more the fondling of our laps and the plaything of our children!

Mr. Speaker, so surely as God lives, there is no safety for this nation so long as a spark of vitality remains in the institution of slavery. Let us read history, and gather from it, as Lord Bolingbroke advises us, "not heat but light."

What have caused the most continuous and persistent wars? The answer is, the attempts of de-throned dynasties to regain power.

Turn to England. What were the wars of the Roses but the struggles of families? How many bloody battles, persecutions, and insurrections did not the Stuart family bring upon England? Cromwell supposed when he had lopped off the head of the king and driven the heir apparent headlong out of the country that the nation had seen the last of them; but scarce had the Lord Protector grown cold in his grave before the whole troop came back amid bonfires and illuminations. Once more, in the person of James II, they were driven out, and again, not only England, but Ireland and Scotland, were drenched in blood in their mad efforts to regain power.

Turn to France. The men of the great Revolution recognized both king and nobility as their natural enemies, and proceeded to behead them as fast as they laid hands upon them; it was their purpose to annihilate them. But the vitality of the dynasty and the caste survived the wrath of the people; it survived the reign of terror; it survived the consulate; it survived the empire; it survived even the mighty triumphs of Napoleon, and rose again to power upon his ruins. Again it fell; and now, seventy years after its first downfall, the Bourbon stands without the gate of France, patiently waiting for that hour when he may rush in and once more, at any cost of blood and treasure, seize upon the throne.

And yet what dynasty, what family, what race of men so permanent or so powerful as this institution of slavery, appealing at once to the pride and the purses of its votaries? It has in it the soul of a thousand Stuarts; the blood of ten thousand Bourbons. If the lapse of three quarters of a century has not taught the royal family of France forgetfulness, what lesson shall it bring to this proud, ambitious system, humiliated but not subdued, scotched but not killed? And yet the comparison is scarcely a just one. France drove forth the Bourbons, and England the Stuarts. Let us suppose them retained in their midst; let us suppose that they had nurtured and fostered them, and in the engrossment of other pursuits had afforded them free scope for every machination which cunning and ambition could devise. What, Mr. Speaker, would have been their fate, but well-deserved, complete, and continuous ruin?

Yet this is what we are asked to do with this dynasty, slavery! Worn with fruitless struggles against us, dusty and bloody from a thousand fields, with drooping jaws, glazed eyes, and dejected visage, he asks shelter at our feet, repose, protection; space to stretch his weary limbs; time for the exhausted juices of his body to resume their accustomed flow. Spare him but this little while, and once more the monster will be upon his feet, once more his roar will shake the world, once more his talons will be clothed with the flesh and blood of those near and dear to you and I and all of us. God in His infinite mercy spare us such a fate! Let death fall upon the offender, slavery! This is no wrestling match which the nation can relinquish and resume at pleasure. This struggle means, and has meant from the beginning, death to one of the combatants. Why hesitate? Death let it be to the conquered. Let slavery die that the nation may live!

But we are told that we cannot subdue the South. Our answer is, we are doing it!

But we are told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] that no purely agricultural people ever have been subdued. Our reply is, that if that be so, we are great enough to create precedents.

But I deny the statement. The gentleman from New York has read history to little advantage if he does not know that the record of the world is underlaid by two great facts—conquest and subjugation. Turn to any point and the instances crowd upon us. There are the vast conquests of the Romans, and in turn the conquest of Rome itself and its provinces by the northern tribes, a conquest and subjugation which have endured from that day to this. Upon what does the dynasty and the nobility of England now rest but upon a conquest achieved in a single battle, and upon a subjugation which has remained unquestioned for nearly a thousand years? Upon what, until the close of the last century, did the dynasty and nobility of France rest but upon a similar conquest and subjugation? The great Revolution was but the rising up of the subject Celt against the dominant Goth. To come to a later epoch: did not the French people, the most warlike in the world, but a short time since fall utterly conquered and subdued at the feet of Europe, and accept at its hands and obey for fifty years a form of government and a dynasty repugnant to its desires? Where is Poland? Alas! we hear its unhappy cries ringing in the air. Is there no such thing as the conquest and subjugation of a purely agricultural people? Let Poland answer! In short, if we take away from the history of mankind this rising up of race over race, this giving way of the weaker people to the stronger, its great salient features are destroyed, and it ceases to be a record of our race.

How then does this question present itself? If the destruction of slavery, its utter and absolute destruction, is necessary to the safety of the nation, nothing must be left to chance in reaching that end. The seeds of evil take root in the interstices of chance.

If, then, the system proposed by the President, while admirable in its general intent, is deficient in the machinery which will insure safety, it is our duty to supply that defect. The plan of the President, unsupported by any action on our part, hangs upon too many contingencies. It may be repealed by his successor; it may be resisted by Congress; it may be annulled by the Supreme Court. It rests the welfare of the nation upon the mind of one man; it rests the whole structure of social order upon the unstable foundation of individual oaths.

The events of this war have not strengthened popular faith in the efficacy of oaths. One of the rebel generals, Jeff. Thompson, tells us that in traveling through those regions alternately overrun by the contending armies, when he spoke with the citizens they would consult their notebooks to see which oath of allegiance they had taken last before daring to express their sentiments. How many hundreds, yes thousands, of rebel dead have been found upon our battlefields with oaths of allegiance, sworn and subscribed, in their pockets? If oaths could bind these men we should have had no rebellion; for what leader among them has not sworn a score of times fidelity to the Constitution? No, sir, it is the conscience of the Thug makes him an assassin; and these men conscientiously commit perjury. But even if such perjury be a violation of conscience, will that man shrink from violating conscience who has set his all, wealth, family, and life itself, upon the hazard of the die? Is perjury greater than treason and murder? Verily, this is attempting to bind Samson with burnt withes!

Can any sane man doubt that if you give the powers of State governments into the hands of any part of these people you will not only have to protect them from the rest of the population but you will have to protect yourselves from them? It was but the other day, as we are informed, that the wise counsels of one man were all that prevented the Union Governor of Kentucky from plunging that State into rebellion and civil war. And this was Kentucky—not South Carolina!

All other considerations aside, the safety of the nation requires that we should never permit this assassin, slavery, to rise to his feet, though he should fill heaven with his oaths and promises.

Is there any man who desires to see this war fought over again? If so, let him stand forth and raise his protecting hands over slavery. Is there any man who desires the nation to recommence where it commenced in the dark and awful days of 1861? If so, let him step forth and protect slavery. Are there fathers who have new sons, yet scarce bearded, for new battle-fields in the bloody South? If so, let them step forth and protect slavery. For one, I prefer the honesty and the candor of banners and long lines and glittering steel and bellowing cannon, rather than the bitterness of battle hidden under the honey of peace, rather than the stiletto of some eloquent traitor driven home into the heart of an unsuspecting and unguarded people in the hours consecrated to peace and rejoicing.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I am for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] and if any measure of greater security can be devised I am for that. I am for an amendment of the Constitution to prohibit slavery as soon as that is attainable. I am for any and every measure which will add, in this respect, to the security of the people.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the great claims which President Lincoln has upon the people of the United States. I recognize that popularity which accompanies him, and which, considering the ordeal through which he has passed, is little less than miraculous. I recognize that unquestioning faith in his honesty and ability which pervades all classes, and that sincere affection with which almost the entire population regard him. We must not underrate him even in our praises. He is a great man. Great not after the old models of the world, but with a homely and original greatness. He will stand out to future ages in the history of these crowded and confused times with wonderful distinctness. He has carried a vast and discordant population safely and peacefully through the greatest of political revolutions with such consummate sagacity and skill that while he led he appeared to follow; while he innovated beyond all precedent he has been denounced as tardy; while he struck the shackles from the limbs of three million slaves he has been hailed as a conservative! If to adapt, persistently and continuously, just and righteous principles to all the perplexed windings and changes of human events, and to secure in the end the complete triumph of those principles, be statesmanship, then Abraham Lincoln is the first of statesmen.

In so far as his amnesty proclamation springs from the tenderness and kindness of his heart, it is worthy of him, and worthy of the merciful, christianized, and civilized American people, who, while demanding all things necessary to their own safety, will ask nothing for revenge.

If the end of the war is to be a restoration of the appearance of the old Government; a patching together of the broken shreds and fragments; a propping up of the fabric in such style that the next Administration may possibly get out from under it before it falls, then that proclamation may be found all-sufficient. But for all other purposes it will be utterly unavailing. It does not reach the heart of the distemper:

"It will but skin and flim the ulcerous part,
Whiles rank corruption, mining all beneath,
Infects unseen."

We owe more than this to ourselves; we owe more than this to the South. We must regenerate the South. We must plant a free press firmly upon its soil; we must guaranty freedom of speech throughout its entire length and breadth; we must enforce education upon its people, black and white. The day of ignominious martyrdom for opinion's sake is past forever within the limits of the United States. Never again shall the reading of a certain newspaper or the holding of certain political doctrines be an indictable offense. Resting as our Government does upon the enlightened judgment of the people, we cannot permit crops of ignorance to ripen into harvests of rebellion. Thought must range unfettered over the whole extent of the South, and education be everywhere as free, as pure, and as abundant as the air we breathe.

It is said that we propose to oppress the people of the South. It would be well if such oppression could cover the whole surface of the known world! Ours is an oppression which makes free; ours a despotism which builds the school-house and the printing-office; ours a tyranny which sets the plow moving in the furrow and covers the lakes and the rivers with the white wings of commerce. God give the world abundance of such oppression!

But there is behind all this a further consideration. There is a vast population of human beings in the South hitherto held as slaves. They are now freemen. Many of them have fought under our banners and suffered wounds in our cause. Can we permit a doubt to rest upon the future of these men? Can we permit their freedom to hang upon a hazard? Can we leave them, helpless and ignorant, to the mercy of their late masters? Can we give them the name and the semblance of freedom and yet leave them to all the horrors of renewed slavery? Is it the part of a great nation

"To keep the word of promise to the ear,
And break it to the hope?"

No; the Government must be present to protect these men from a hate and a prejudice bitter than death. It must educate them; it must civilize them; it must afford them every opportunity for development and advancement; it must faithfully carry out, in spirit and in letter, the promise of liberty held forth to them.

Shall we have no return for all this? Ah, Mr. Speaker, we shall then have, not alone a miserable and dissatisfied population clinging to an institution which the nation abhors, which the civilized world abominates, ready to vote for it, to fight for it, seething in one perpetual mass of discontent, and ready at all times in all emergencies to rise against the nation. No, Mr. Speaker; no such miserable sight presents itself to my eyes; but I can see down the long vista of time a vast population to whom the word "Union" shall signify home, hope, prosperity, liberty; and as they rise—for they will rise, for who can live in the midst of civilization and resist its influences?—as they rise, Mr. Speaker, every new privilege wrung from prejudice by the sweat of their industry or the development of their intelligence, shall light up in the heart of that swarthy multitude new devotion to the great word "Union," new love for that banner which is at once to them a glory, a protection, and a prophecy. God grant them prosperity and the fullest development of which they are capable; I say God grant it from the very bottom of my heart! Not that I would rate them above or even equal to our own proud, illustrious, and dominant race—our imperial race, the colonizers of the continents, the rulers of the seas, the masters of the globe. But these men are our human kindred—poor, patient, helpless, and unhappy—appealing by their miseries to our mercy, by their manhood to our sense of justice. Who will lend a hand to crush this poor and unfortunate people still further into the dust? Who will beat down those whom fortune has already so bitterly afflicted? Let that man stand forth who will give to patience blows and to poverty oppression, and who can find in the dreadful extreme of human suffering and degradation only opportunity for the exercise of brutality and cruelty. For myself I shall strive at all times to do them complete and entire justice; and I thank God that the work of justice to the wretched goes hand in hand with devotion to the best interests of our beloved country.

But there is still another consideration. So far I have striven to conduct this argument with a view only to its political relations, to the effect of the questions involved upon the material welfare of the people.

But there is something beyond all this. There are considerations as far above all this as the heavens are above the earth. To every man comes home this question: Shall I take my place in the ranks of that continuous and unending procession of events, which, since the revival of civilization in Europe, has been steadily pressing forward over the world and through the centuries? Or shall I be of those frail and feeble ones who present their breasts as barriers and bulwarks against the rising flood which the breath of God is swelling and lifting over all the wrongs and iniquities of the world?

And who will dare to say that in the long fight of the centuries error is not hourly losing blood and strength and life; that truth is not each day arming itself with new and more formidable weapons, shining each day with more glorious and more effulgent radiance?

Let us take to ourselves the consolation afforded by this thought—that truth is imperishable, and that no human power is sufficient to destroy it. It is a subtle essence—the soul of the material world. The heavens and the earth may pass away, but truth shall not pass away. We have seen it in all the past liberated by the blows aimed at its destruction. We have seen it passing, upon golden wings, out through all the meshes with which the perverted skill of the human mind sought to entangle it.

Let us remember, then, that in so far as we contribute, however humbly, to the cause of truth, we are identifying our temporary existence with an eternal work. This is a posterity which shall never die; this shall live and brighten and keep green our memories when the descendants of our bodies have disappeared from among the things of the world.

For myself, I can see the welfare of my country only in those things which widen the opportunities and elevate the dignity of mankind. I cannot perceive the advantage to any man of the degradation of any other man; and I feel assured of the greatness and perpetuity of my country only in so far as it identifies itself with the uninterrupted progress and the universal liberty of mankind.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill under discussion, and I am gratified with this opportunity to explain my views upon the subject. The name of the bill is "A bill to guaranty to certain States, whose governments have been usurped or overthrown, a republican form of government."

The object of the bill is to change the relations between certain States and the General Government, and to make it impossible for the States referred to, under any circumstances, to hold slaves or to be organized under a constitution which permits slavery. I do not think that any political party, or any great number of men, excepting the abolitionists in the northern States, ever cared anything about the extension, perpetuity, or destruction of slavery. They have not been interested in the subject further than they were benefited by the cheap system of labor in the South, and the market which their manufactures found in that portion of our country. But that the General Government should assume the right to control, by act of Congress, the domestic institutions of sovereign States, is a different question.

The State of Pennsylvania a few years back in her history determined to abolish slavery. What would have been the condition of the question if the General Government had denied the power of that State to dispose of a mere question of property in any manner which the people of that State might choose? Such assumption of power would have been resisted by all the people of every State in the Union as an encroachment upon the reserved rights of the States. And such would be the case if the people of that State should see fit to adopt slavery at this time. There is not, under the theory of our Government, any power delegated to the General Government to prevent that condition of things, or we have all greatly misunderstood our own Government and the relation which each of the States has held to the national Government. The proposed law will change that relation, not over new States asking admission into the Union, but over States heretofore existing as a part of the national Government, and which still exist as States as fully as ever they did, even if the language of the bill be true that the State authority has been usurped or overthrown. If the people of the State have committed treason the municipal corporation cannot be guilty of treason, nor forfeit any of its rights as a State any more than a township could cease to be a part of a county because all the able-bodied men should move out of it, or be convicted of larceny. When other men should come or children grow to be men to fill the offices necessary in a municipal corporation it would still be a township and a part of the county as much as if the municipal offices had never been vacant. And such will be the condition of the States referred to unless by this law or the amendment of the Constitution now pending we change that state of things.

The law proposed is especially intended to govern men who are not represented in the passage of the bill, and at a time when we have not the power to reconstruct a single State, and if such law could ever become proper that time has not arrived. This is only one step further toward centralizing all power in the General Government which has been pursued by Congress in the passage of laws, and by the President in his proclamations. Each of these departments of Government has treated the States as if they had no reserved rights. State lines have been disregarded, and all State constitutions have been trampled upon, and the rights of the citizen everywhere have been placed at the mercy of the military power, and a solemn act of Congress has been passed to indemnify and protect the agents of this military power in the perpetration of any crime which they may see fit to inflict. The passage of this law will be the final gathering up of the reserved rights of States, and the last vestige of protection of the citizen under State constitutions will be taken away, and all power centralized in the General Government. This state of things I am not prepared to sanction by my vote.

But I have another reason for my opposition to the bill, and it is the fact that it is founded upon and intended to legalize and perpetuate the unconstitutional acts and proclamations of the President. I say unconstitutional acts of the President, and if my position be correct then any laws founded upon these proclamations will be looked upon and actually be the extreme of folly.

The acts and proclamations of which I complain and to which I allude are those which the President has done and proclaimed in pursuance of his war power and as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. The Constitution makes "the President the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service of the United States." But before entering upon the duties of his office he is required to take his oath that he will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and to the best of his ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. It is by virtue of these provisions of the Constitution that a President elect enters upon his duties and gets control of his powers. It will be observed that the only thing which the President is required to take an oath to do is to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." In all other of his official acts nothing is required of him but to act faithfully; but in the defense and protection of the Constitution there must be no question, and that is the only one thing especially mentioned in his official oath.

As if the framers of the Constitution regarded the protection and defense of that instrument as the paramount and principal business of the President, and in order that he might have the necessary power to perform that duty, he was made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and of the militia of the States whenever in the actual service of the United States.

But he must, from the nature of the case, be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy in a qualified sense of the word. It is not presumed that a mere civilian should have the qualifications of a general in the field, and if he were qualified he could not attend to the duties of a military commander and all the various duties of his office as President at the same time, nor could he command the Army and Navy at the same time. The Constitution presumes that the President is a statesman. It is not the presumption of that instrument that he is either a military or a naval officer. And with very few exceptions the Presidents of the United States have not possessed any knowledge of either military or naval affairs. By virtue of his office he can remove and fill the places of all the civil officers of the Government, and by virtue of his office as Commander-in-Chief he can appoint and remove the officers of the Army, and in that way may control the Army as he does control the Treasury Department and Post Office Department, and in fact all of the Departments of Government. Nor was it intended by the framers of the Constitution that he should be Commander-in-Chief of the Army in any other sense than as he is controller of the Post Office, the Treasury Department, the Mint, &c. He had taken an oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution." The Constitution was the dearest thing in the minds of the American people. That Constitution had made their Union of States, it contained the civil and religious liberties of their children, and was their Government, the life of the nation, and without this great covenant between the rulers and the people there was no Government and no nation; and to "preserve, protect, and defend" that evidence of the sovereign will of the people, it was necessary to lodge power somewhere, and the Constitution placed it in the President. They could look back over the history of the past and see the whole ocean of time filled with fragments of republics which had fallen sacrifices to the usurpations and encroachments of military ambition and military power, and therefore the Constitution, which he had sworn to "preserve, protect, and defend," gave him power to remove any military chief who should encroach upon the Constitution. He had power to surround the civil office of President with a wall stronger than adamant, and that power he had taken his oath to exert in the protection of the Constitution. That such is the war power of the President is shown in the history of the country. No former President ever attempted to act as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, except in this qualified sense.

At the time of the whisky rebellion in Pennsylvania the President, General Washington, refused to take command of the Army as Commander-in-Chief. He went as President in his civil capacity. The reason given for this military usurpation is the example General Jackson set at New Orleans; but he was not then President, but a purely military officer, and he suspended the writ of habeas corpus only in the city of New Orleans and in the immediate vicinity of the operations of the Army and only for the time necessary to prepare for and fight the battle, and then it was restored, and he submitted to and paid the fine imposed by the court, and thus acknowledged the supremacy of the civil over the military authority under the Constitution. And the American Congress, after a period of many years, approved of his use of this war power, and confirmed the interpretation which I claim for the Constitution by refunding to him the fine and its interest.

The Constitution provides "that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus" shall not be suspended, "unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." This power is not among those enumerated in the Constitution as belonging to the President, nor among those granted by that instrument to Congress. If this power belongs to the President as a part of his war power then the Government and the people and all of their rights are at his mercy and liable to share the fate of all former republics. But if the actual commander of the Army in the field is the person intended for the exercise of this power, he would have the opportunity of knowing when the operations of the Army were likely to be interrupted by the civil authority, and he could suspend the writ without danger to the liberties of the people; and if he should make an improper use of the power and encroach upon the liberties of the people without this necessity, there would stand the President, armed with his war power and bound by his oath to remove such officer and place a safer and better man in his place. And that, in my view, is the limit of his legitimate war power.

Nor have any of the Presidents of the United States, from the foundation of the Government, taken upon themselves any of the responsibilities or duties of a Commander-in-Chief of the Army in the field, until since the 4th day of March, A. D. 1861. Since that time a new interpretation has been given to the President's war power.

This power was given to the President that he might defend himself and the dignity of his office, and that he might have power to maintain the supremacy of the civil over the military power of the country, that he might "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," that he might secure to the people the elective franchise free from military interference, and to every citizen of this broad land the right of trial by a jury of his equals, and, above all other rights, to protect the people from the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by his military commanders, excepting in cases "when the public safety" might require the suspension. This new interpretation makes the war power of the President a weapon for the overthrow and destruction of the very powers and rights which it was placed in his hands to protect and defend from the assaults and usurpations of the military power. The liberties of the people and the perpetuity of our form of government cannot be preserved under any such interpretation of this war power of the President, and the proof of this position is written in the history of this country during the past three years.

Look a moment at this history, marked and bloody with the record of blunders occasioned by this new interpretation of the President's war power. It was from this city and from this power that emanated the cry of "On to Richmond!" that ended in the disgraceful defeat at Bull Run, and sent our Army back to this city a disorganized and a dangerous mob. It was the controlling influence of this power in the hands of the President that disposed of our forces and led to our defeat at the battle of Fair Oaks and the seven days' fighting in front of Richmond. And when Burnside asked that he might not fight the battle of Fredericksburg, his orders from our Commander-in-Chief were to fight the battle, and thousands of our best and bravest men were left heaped up dead upon that unfortunate field, sacrificed to the military ambition of a mere civilian, in his attempt to be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and one hundred thousand widows and orphans are to-day heaping curses upon his head for thus attempting to use a power that was placed in his hands for a different purpose. When we look through this history we cannot fail to see enough to make us doubt the interpretation that places this war power in the President to control our generals in the field, embarrass our armies, and sacrifice our soldiers. It must have been placed there for a very different purpose. The assumption of this war power has made the army of the Potomac almost worthless in this war; and it now remains to be seen whether General Grant will be permitted to command that army or whether the disappointments and disgrace of his predecessors await him. This power proved the disgrace of Pope and Burnside, and the sacrifice and removal of McClellan. If the President believed McClellan incompetent for his position, or dangerous to the liberties of the people, or liable to encroach upon the Constitution, then it was his duty to remove him and appoint his successor, and that was the limit of his war power under the Constitution.

But when we turn from the consequences of this new interpretation of the war power upon the Army to its effects upon the Government, the Constitution, and the civil institutions of the country, we see the danger of this interpretation. It was to protect this Government, the Constitution, and these civil institutions, that he, as the servant of the people, was invested with this power, and it was for this purpose alone that his official oath was required of him. Our fathers left us, reared and finished, a temple of liberty, so high that the oppressed of all lands could see it, and its shadow fell upon and protected the rights of every human being in this great land, and so simple and so beautiful that a child could comprehend and admire it. This bright temple has been torn down, and a most cruel, wicked, and monstrous military despotism has been reared upon its ruins. The rights of citizens are not respected under the laws of States or the Constitution and laws of the United States, and all the protection afforded by State courts and State laws and constitutions to the citizen is set aside and disregarded.

The Constitution declares that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." What rebellion has there been, or is there now, in the State of New Hampshire? In what respect did the public safety require its suspension in the State of Pennsylvania? And yet there is not legal power enough in that State to take a man, unjustly restrained of his liberty, from this military power and secure him a trial. Men are arrested without warrant, condemned without trial, and punished without conviction.

It is said in the discussions upon this subject that slavery must be abolished to produce sameness in our institutions, our interests, and our opinions; and it is called "homogeneity," and is stated in another way by the words "irrepressible conflict." The man who first made use of the term "irrepressible conflict" did not say a new thing, but a very wicked one. Philip II of Spain was accomplishing the same thing when he attempted to make all of his subjects of one religion; he inaugurated an "irrepressible conflict" to compel all of his subjects to think and believe as he did, and at a period when Spain was the most powerful nation on earth, with a continual stream of gold running into his treasury, he carried on a most cruel and destructive war for thirty years, with all the power of his great empire, against a few Dutchmen in the Netherlands and was beaten and defeated in the contest. He failed to either "conquer or exterminate" them. The Puritans of New England were attempting the same thing when they burned the Quakers and drove clergymen from their colonies. And if it were not the negro and the South toward which this fanaticism is directing its energy, its zeal, and its vengeance, it would be the Quakers, the Catholic religion, or some temperance question.

The trouble is not that slavery existed, but that a wild, unrelenting, vindictive, wicked, and cruel fanaticism existed, and happened to fasten its deadly fangs upon slavery. This necessity for abolishing slavery is an effort upon the part of the strong to justify its crimes against the weak. This sameness of institutions, interests, and opinions cannot be accomplished, and it would be wrong to do so if it could. As well might we attempt to level the mountains and fill up the valleys and the rivers and lakes and oceans, and make the whole earth one dead level plain and worthless.

God made the mountains and the valleys and the rivers and oceans for our good, and He gave men different minds, interests, institutions, and opinions for our good, and the remedy for those who differ with others in institutions and opinions is for every man, and the people of every State and of every Government, to mind their own affairs, and respect the opinions and the interests and institutions of others, and not arrogate to themselves the right to manage the affairs of others. Our system of government is founded upon this idea, and it had better be respected.

The bill speaks of States whose authority has been usurped or overthrown. That happens to be the condition of all the States, North and South, and we might turn our attention to the reconstruction of our own States; or it might be interesting to inquire whether some gentlemen in the southern congress, (rebel, if you please,) like the author of this bill, anxious for notoriety and perhaps a position at the head of a bureau, might not be organizing a system for reconstructing the northern States, with constitutions requiring a republican form of government with slavery. Neither party has power to enforce such law if passed.

This word reconstruction appears to charm the advocates of the bill. The only reconstruction there ever can be is to spread the broad powers and the kindly influence of the Constitution and laws over all the land, when the usurpations of this military war power shall be removed; and this applies as well to the North as to the South. I do not justify the secession of the southern States. It was brought about by wicked and foolish men, who deserve punishment—wicked, for they preferred their ambitious projects to the good of their country; foolish, because they should have fought their battles within the Union and under the Constitution and the laws, and not upon their ruin. But I have believed, and still do, that there are good men, patriots enough, North and South, to control and dispose of the abolitionists and secessionists and once more restore our glorious old Union.

The Constitution was the only bond of union that bound the States together, and that instrument has been equally suspended and destroyed North and South, and there is no Union; all laws and all constitutions have been swallowed up by the new interpretation given to this war power. There is no Union to-day among the States not in rebellion; they are kept together by this war power, the force of habit, and the influence of money and plunder, and the necessity of meeting a common foe. We are now floating at the mercy of chance and the waves upon a mere fragment of our broken Union, and our pilot is bewildered by the contradictory "pressure" of his advisers. And the New England wreckers are not burning blue-lights to render aid and comfort to the enemy, but they are holding up false lights that will complete the wreck.

One set of men tell him that universal emancipation and reconstruction without slavery, as proposed in this bill, will save his craft. I tell him it will extinguish State rights and make our form of government different from that left us in the Constitution. Another set of men tell him to confiscate the lands of the South in fee and in violation of the plain provision of the Constitution will restore the Union. I tell him that it will destroy the last hope of reconstruction, and bring us to the painful alternative of recognizing or annihilating the South, and to neither of these conditions am I prepared to give my consent. You speak of bringing the South back. I ask, back to what? back to where? It cannot be back to the Constitution, for that Constitution has been destroyed, and all civil rights have been destroyed with it. And should they come back to the crude and chaotic proclamations of the President's military war power, that has made a camp of the entire land? They have enough of war power at home; and with this war power and its proclamations, and our confiscation acts and reconstruction bureaus, there is no motive for the South to come back. They can but fare worse than to fight, and fight they do.

One hundred and forty thousand of the American people in my district have sent their sons to the Army to fight for and maintain their Government as laid down in the Constitution. They have sent me here as their representative to maintain the same thing, and in their name I ask what you have done with their Government? On the 4th day of March, 1861, they placed their Government in your hands. And in that Government was secured to the people free speech, a free press, security of person and property, and the elective franchise undisturbed by military power, and to those suspected of crime a fair and speedy trial, and to all the benefit of the great right of the writ of habeas corpus. What have you done with this Government? The one which you have furnished secures none of these rights. Shall I tell them you are not bound by your oath in time of war; that when you made your oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution" it was upon condition that we had no war? When do you propose to restore to the people their Government?

The interpretation which I claim for the President's war power is the only one which will perpetuate our republican form of Government. The history of every day which passes over our heads is full of meaning and confirms this position.

There does not exist on earth a more despotic Government than that of Abraham Lincoln. He is a despot in fact, if not in name. The constitutional right of the citizen to bear arms has been denied, and houses searched and arms taken from the citizen; the right of trial denied, and citizens have been banished the country without trial or conviction; and I only mention some of the outrages perpetrated by this war power to say that if our Government has been fairly administered under this new interpretation of the war power for the last three years it does not matter how soon it is destroyed. It is not worth to the people a dollar or a battle or a man. And it does not matter to the people whether their liberties have been taken away by Abraham Lincoln as President or as Commander-in-Chief of the Army; he is no less a despot and they no less slaves.

It is more than eighteen hundred years since a Roman emperor first employed spies and informers to watch the citizen, overhear his private conversation in hours of social intercourse, for information to convict the best and wealthiest citizens of disloyalty, and their property was then confiscated and divided between the Government and the informer. This was less than seventy years before the Roman empire was put up at auction by the imperial cohorts and city guards to the highest bidder. And the right to govern that vast empire was purchased by a jeweler, who had heaped up great wealth by selling jewelry to the army contractors, the men who had made haste to get rich out of the corruptions of the times; but the city of Rome had then been founded more than eight hundred years before an emperor could be found wicked enough and a people corrupt enough to inaugurate this state of things. We have not existed as a nation a century, and yet we hear of spies and detectives, and are pained to know that American citizens can be found debased enough to act in that capacity; and this is one of the results of the exercise of this war power.

The President, by virtue of this new interpretation of his war power, makes laws by proclamation, and does really dispense with the action of Congress. He usurps in himself all the powers of Government—judicial, legislative, and executive—and believing, as I do, that his proclamation of freedom to the slaves is not only a violation of the Constitution but of his official oath, I shall not vote to sanction any such interpretation of the Constitution, nor for any law intended to perpetuate that proclamation. And the hour is just before the American people when they must choose between the Administration, with its peculiar views of its war power, and their liberties. If the people permit this power, as assumed by their agents, to be continued another term of four years, whether by votes or military dictation, I for one shall regard our old form of government and the liberties of the people as at an end, gathered up by this stupendous war power. And it is for the people, whose liberties have been trifled with, and whose business it is to make their decision, to settle this great problem for themselves. I have thus warned them, and I have cleared my skirts of the responsibility.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to say a few words which have been long delayed, as I was unwilling to interrupt more important business. What I have to say is mainly supplemental to a speech which I made early in the session. I desire to restate some of the positions I then advanced, that they may not be misunderstood nor longer misstated as they have sometimes been. I should have preferred an earlier time, when some members now absent were present. I wish to reassert them, as I deem them essential to the final success of the cause of the Union. I have offered a substitute to the bill of the committee because that does not, in my judgment, meet the evil. It partially acknowledges the rebel States to have rights under the Constitution, which I deny, as war has abrogated them all. I do not inquire what rights we have under it, but they have none. The bill takes for granted that the President may partially interfere in their civil administration, not as conqueror, but as President of the United States. It adopts in some measure the idea that less than a majority may regulate to some extent the affairs of a republic. But what I deem most objectionable, it seems to me to take away the chance of the confiscation of property of the rebels. But I will proceed to the main object of my remarks.

When the confiscation bill was under consideration I stated my views as to the condition of the seceded States. I spoke of their rights under the Constitution and municipal laws of the Union. I came to the conclusion that they were entitled to no rights under the Constitution and laws, which as to them were abrogated; that they could invoke the aid of neither in their behalf; that they could claim to be treated during the war as belligerents according to the laws of war and the law of nations; that they could claim no other rights than a foreign nation with whom we might be at war; and that they were subject to all the liabilities of such foreign belligerent.

I did not undertake to examine what rights the parent Government might have against rebel individuals under its claim for violated sovereignty when the laws should resume their empire. I inferred that under the laws of war the conqueror had the right to seize the property, real and personal, of the enemy and appropriate it to the payment of the expenses and damages of the war, and make provision for our wounded soldiers, and for the families of the slain. I stated that although the women and children and all persons domiciled within the belligerent territory were enemies, yet in enforcing the rights of conquest the innocent should be spared; that even those actually bearing arms against us who were compelled by the laws of their government to enter their armies should also be spared; but that the property of the morally and politically guilty should be taken for public use.

These positions have been extensively and sharply criticised. That was neither unexpected nor unpleasant. New ideas are always received with distrust, and even when true either rejected or accepted with reluctance. Thorough examination is always desirable. If the positions are sound, discussion will eventually establish them; if unsound, they ought to be exploded.

The discussion in this House was conducted with unusual ability, and until lately with great courtesy and great fairness, except by a single member. His remarks, fraught with demagogical insinuations and personal allusions, excited more disgust than surprise. He belongs to no recognized party. Having apostatized from all the principles which once gave him credit with the people, he has no sympathy with any body of men, in or out of the House, except his own family circle. He stood amidst us a political Ishmael.

I will now notice some of the objections taken to my views. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] has conducted the argument with great ability and with equal candor and courtesy. He agrees with me that the Confederate States are a belligerent power; that they are entitled to the treatment accorded by the laws of war and the law of nations, both in their rights and liabilities; that they have no rights under the Constitution of the United States, and could plead none of its provisions in their defense. He adds more stringent penalties against them than the course of my argument renders it necessary for me to discuss. He says that they are still liable to be proceeded against for treason when peace shall be restored. I agree with him, as I long ago stated on this floor, that before they became belligerents they had, many of them, committed treason. But under the laws of war they cannot be tried for that offense by a military tribunal. A belligerent composed of traitors and rebels stands in a much worse predicament than an innocent foreign nation. And when we come to enforce the rights of conquest we should be justified in insisting upon the extreme rights of war, without yielding to the mitigations dictated by modern usage with regard to belligerents originally composed of foreign nations engaged in war which they deemed just.

The fact of their being rebels as well as belligerents only extends our rights and justifies the summum jus of martial law. To allow them to plead in palliation that they were our "erring brethren" would be to allow malefactors to take advantage of their own wrong.

But it is said that the confiscation of the property on land of private individuals is not sanctioned by modern practice. As a general rule this is true. But that is owing to the forbearance of the conqueror. The right still exists and may be exercised when the offense of the belligerent is so great, the war so unjust, as to deserve punishment.

Halleck, following all other writers, says, page 457:

"Some modern text-writers, Hantefeuille for example, contend for the ancient rule, that private property on land is subject to seizure and confiscation. They are undoubtedly correct with respect to the general abstract right, as deduced from the law of nature and ancient practice; but while the general right continues, modern usages and the opinions of modern text-writers of the highest authority have limited this right by limiting the rule of general exemption."

When nations wage war for what they suppose their rights, each party has a right to call the war just. Modern usage then does not sanction the forfeiture of private property on land for purposes of punishment. But when the war is palpably unjust, then Vattel says:

"The whole right of a conqueror is derived from justifiable self-defense, which comprehends the support and prosecution of his rights. When, therefore, he has subdued a hostile nation, he undeniably may, in the first place, do himself justice respecting the object which has given rise to the war, and indemnify himself for the expenses and damages he has sustained by it."

And further, page 389:

"A conqueror who has taken up arms not only against the sovereign but against the nation herself, and whose intention it was to subdue a fierce and savage people, and once for all to reduce an obstinate enemy, such a conqueror may with justice lay burdens on the conquered nation, both as a compensation for the expenses of the war and as a punishment."

In short, the well-established rule is that as a strict right the conqueror can confiscate all the property of the conquered nation; but unless the enemy has engaged in an unjust war requiring punishment, or are a stubborn people requiring severe treatment, the private property on land of individuals is left untouched.

I leave the House and the country to decide whether this is an unjust war, worthy of vengeance; whether the enemy is obstinate and fierce who ought to bear the burdens of the war. If they answer in the affirmative, then the strict right attaches. But in my remarks I did not insist on the execution of the strict right. I thought that the women and children, the non-combatants, and those who were forced by the laws of their State into the armies, should be spared; and the property of the guilty, morally as well as politically guilty, only should be taken. And yet we hear a howl of horror from conservative gentlemen at the inhumanity of the proposition. A band of men, sufficiently formidable to become an acknowledged belligerent, have robbed the Treasury of the nation, seized the public property, occupied our forts and arsenals, severed in twain the best and most prosperous nation that ever existed, slaughtered two hundred thousand of our citizens, caused a debt of $2,000,000,000, and obstinately maintain a cruel warfare. If we are not justified in exacting the extreme demands of war, then I can hardly conceive a case where it would be applicable. England and France compelled China to pay the expenses of the war because they said they were waging a just war. In this, however, the world does not agree with them.

The learned gentleman from Kentucky contends that only the property of the sovereign should be taken. I have conceded that in a war which each party could claim as just such was the modern practice. In responsible or limited monarchies the private property of the king is spared, because it does not belong to the Government, but to the individual who occupies the throne. In many European nations now, however, the law vests such private property in the Crown.

But when a monarch is absolute, when he holds the whole sovereign power, his private property is subject to confiscation according to the most modern construction of the law of nations. In Chitty's Vattel, in note to page 366, it is said:

"In case the territory of a foreign sovereign or a part of it is captured, the sovereign of the conquering State is entitled to all the property there of the conquered sovereign, (Amerschand's case, Knapp's R., 329); and the same case establishes that there is no distinction in this respect between the public and private property of an absolute monarch."

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] inquired where the sovereignty was lodged in a republic, and he answered very truly in the people. The people are the absolute sov-reigns. They act through their representatives and executive officers, but they are the responsible, the absolute sovereigns. Does it not follow as inevitable logic that when they make an unjust war, if conquered, all their property, public and private, is subject to forfeiture? "Whoever takes up arms without a lawful cause can absolutely have no right whatever." (Vattel, 378.) It was on this principle that the Romans took private property. "In wars between republics, the quarrel was in reality the common cause of all the citizens," says Vattel, 388. The war was theirs and the property was theirs. They were the absolute sovereigns, as was well said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WADSWORTH.] The confederate States is a republic, however bad may be its citizens. The majority necessarily speaks for all. Their sovereign power have declared war, and all their property is subject to the laws of war. As I have often said, no one advises the execution of the extreme right. But the right exists and ought to be enforced against the most guilty. To allow them to return with their estates untouched, on the theory that they have never gone out of the Union, seems to me rank injustice to loyal men.

The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] whose speech contains the distilled virus of the copperhead, who is not present, but has patriotically gone forth to command large armies without a commission, is as unhappy in stating the positions of his opponents as he is in answering the true ones. He says:

"The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] adopts the plan of making the penalty of death and levying a fine and selling in perpetuity the estate of a person attainted of treason, accomplishing what a parliamentary attainder did in England."

I said no such thing. On the other hand I said there could be no such thing as attainder under our laws. The Constitution forbids the passing such a bill; and conviction for treason works no such consequence here. I contended for the forfeiture of the property of the rebels as enemies; and so is the act of Congress.

He says that the gentleman from Pennsylvania "treated with scorn the idea that States held in duress by the rebel power have any right to look to our laws and Constitution for protection." This is a false statement of my position. If the armies of the confederate States should overrun a loyal State and hold it in duress, that State would have a right to appeal to the Constitution for protection. But a State which by a free majority of its voters has thrown off its allegiance to the Constitution, and holds itself in duress by its own armies, is estopped from claiming any protection under the Constitution. To say that such a State is within the pale of the Union, so as to claim protection under its Constitution and laws, is but the raving of a madman.

To escape the consequence of my argument he denies that the confederate States have been acknowledged as a belligerent, or have established and maintained independent governments de facto. Such assurance would deny that there was a sun in the heavens. They have a congress in which eleven States are represented; they have at least three hundred thousand soldiers in the field; their pickets are almost within sight of Washington. They have ships of war on the ocean destroying hundreds of our ships, and our Government and the Governments of Europe acknowledge and treat them as privateers, not as pirates. From whom do privateers get their commissions except from a Power independent either de jure or de facto? There is no reasoning against such impudent denials.

But not only the member from Missouri, but gentlemen of much more importance deny that the rebel States, so far as they are concerned, are out of the Union. It follows that, being in the Union, they have all the rights of other States. If they have such rights and should come here at the next presidential election and claim them, where does such doctrine lead you to? It leads you into subjection to traitors and their northern allies. If they are in the Union, where are their representatives on this floor? Every one of the United States is entitled to have members here and Senators in the other branch. Where are these evidences of existing States? They are at Richmond, where the Congress of the Union does not sit.

But it is said that the Constitution does not allow them to go out of the Union. That is true, and in going out they committed a crime for which we are now punishing them with fire and sword. What are we making war upon them for? For seceding, for going out of the Union against law. The law forbids a man to rob or murder, and yet robbery and murder exist de facto but not de jure.

The gentleman, with characteristic modesty, says that those who declare the States outlawed to the Union preach the doctrine of secession as much as Jeff. Davis. Does the man who declares that murder or larceny exists give countenance to those felonies? The one is as reasonable a deduction as the other. If the fiction sometimes used in courts of equity that whatever ought to be shall be considered as existing be true in fact, then the rebel States are in the Union. If the naked facts palpable to every eye, attested by many a bloody battle-field, and recorded by every day's hostile legislation both in Washington and Richmond, are to prevail, then the rebellious States are no more in the Union, in fact, than the loyal States are in the confederate States. Nor should they ever be treated so until they repent and are rebaptized into the national Union.

The gentleman from Missouri, fatally bent on mischief, anxious to distract and destroy the Republican party, and to alienate the President from his true friends, that he and his household may reign supreme, proceeds through most of his speech to assail the motives of members of the House, to attack a member of the Cabinet, and allege that the doctrines held by a majority of our friends, of all who went for the repeal of the restraining resolution, were uttered with a view to assail the President and play into the hands of a rival candidate for the Presidency. He speaks of the doctrines proclaimed by the organ of the Treasury Department. Who does he mean? Who is the organ of the Treasury Department here? Sir, I believe there is no such organ among us. But in his insatiable hate he must drag in the name of the Secretary of the Treasury to vent his malignity. I had heard of such assaults before. I do not know what cause of offense the gentleman has against the Secretary. His attack, however, will not prevent the people from giving credit to that gentleman for great ability and unspotted purity of character. Since the days of Alexander Hamilton no abler or honest man ever filled that place. But that gentleman would not thank me for attempting his defense until some more dangerous enemy assails him. He speaks of our attempts to sacrifice the whites to the blacks, to introduce amalgamation of the races and to create negro equality. When the gentleman thus accuses the Republican party he knows that he utters a foul and malignant libel. The Republican party never held such doctrines, never uttered such a wish. I rejoice that in the vote which was taken soon after his speech not a man was found with him who ever belonged to the Republican party. He only was found voting with the hereditary enemies of the Administration. That was right. "He went to his place."

The gentleman speaks of my remarks as an "entanglement of contradiction" and "a catalogue of inconsistencies." As this only touches my capacity for argument, I take no offense at it. The gentleman cannot think more humbly of my abilities than I do myself. When he comes to speak of motives, however, it is a different thing. To show the temper which animated him, I will give a few extracts from his carefully prepared speech. He says:

"No gentleman, either North or South, ever asserted the secession cause so boldly in the forum as the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It looks like an attempt to play into the hands of some rival candidate for the Presidency, who would array a party against the President to drive him to surrender his convictions and break his oath to support the Constitution. I am apprehensive that the gentleman is anxious to saddle the President with the odium of doctrines which are known to be those of rival aspirants for the Presidency. Of a piece with the ingenious but rather disingenuous assault of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the President is an occurrence which took place in the other end of the Capitol."

When I state that I had made no allusion to the gentleman from Missouri, that I gave no pretext for hostility, I leave the House to discover if it can the motives which dictated such gratuitous attacks.

The gentleman says that the Republicans do not agree with the President on the question of colonization; that he is for the segregation of the races, while we are for leaving them on the soil to cultivate it for wages. In that he is probably correct. There is a difference of opinion among the friends of freedom on that question. But that does not imply hostility to each other. It is a question on which men may honestly differ. I have never favored colonization except as a means of introducing civilization into Africa. Its effect upon slavery was injurious. It was a salve to the consciences of slaveholders and their advocates. As a means of removing the Africans from the country it was puerile. All the revenue of the United States would not pay for the transportation of one half their annual increase. The scheme of colonizing them in South America (which, I believe, was the gentleman's plan) was a very shallow vision. They were averse to removing from their native land; their forcible expatriation would be as atrocious a crime as stealing them in Africa and reducing them to bondage. Five hundred were lately seduced to go to an island near St. Domingo. Such as have not died in six months have been brought back at our expense. I hope this will be the last of the unwise and cruel schemes of colonization which were fostered and procured by the gentleman's advice.

The gentleman cannot conceive that those who advocated the repealing resolution were actuated by patriotic and disinterested motives. He says it is an attempt to play into the hands of some rival who would array a party against the President. Sir, no one but a mousing politician would seek for such motives for the action of members in the discharge of their official duties. If his supposition be true, how few friends the President has in this House is shown by the vote. Not a man of the Republican party can be found recorded among his friends, for they all voted for the resolution. His friends must be sought for on that theory among the respectable copperheads on that side of the House, and the few non-descript allies who went with the gentleman from Missouri. But, sir, the truth is otherwise. The friends of the President and the friends of freedom are the majority who passed that resolution. I will not say that all others are the enemies of freedom, but they are certainly not friendly to the Executive.

None but demagogues incapable of lofty thought would ever have charged on the Republicans the designs imputed to them by the gentleman from Missouri. No other gentleman was found so uncharitable or ungentelemanly as to do it.

As to rival candidates for the Presidency I know of none such. I do not believe that the present discreet Executive has made any movement or expressed any wish for reelection. I think the same of all the members of the Cabinet. I suppose that no man, whether in or out of the Cabinet, would oppose his wish to the will of the people if they should call upon him to serve. But his appetite for office must be morbid who would covet the presidential chair in these troublesome times unless he believed he could render essential service to the nation.

The charge that these principles are invented to serve a presidential candidate is absurd. I held and promulgated precisely the same doctrine in 1861 when there was no thought of the presidential election. I believe now among the people there is entire unanimity. Every man, except the friends of the great Cunctator, believes Mr. Lincoln to be an honest and patriotic man. So far as I have observed they look to him to end this rebellion and extirpate slavery. I do not believe he is in any danger of becoming unpopular through his own acts; nor do I believe that even the constant boast by the gentleman from Missouri and his kindred that they are the especial friends and organs of the President can sink him. If that cannot, certainly nothing else can. I admit that the organization of his Cabinet is not satisfactory to the country. But the people make proper allowance for the difficulties of his situation; they understand how he has probably been deceived, in common with the Republican party, by the apostasy of men who had his and his party's confidence. The people regret the malign influence which has ostracized one at least of our ablest and purest major generals. If they believed that his next Cabinet would contain men who denounced the ultra-Republican or anti-slavery party as seeking to "make a caste of another color by amalgamating the black element with the free white labor of our land, and would make the manumission of the slaves the means of infusing their blood into our whole system by blending with it amalgamation, equality, and fraternity," (see Rockville speech,) while it might possibly not defeat him and overcome his well-earned fame, it would certainly jeopardize more than one loyal State. It is right to warn the President that the people will not suffer such vile, false, and malignant libels upon themselves, upon all the true friends of freedom, to be uttered and reiterated in the name of the President by those who claim to be his friends par excellence, and see such claim repudiated by no signal act, without expressing their indignant rebuke.

It gives me little concern to see my views or myself severely criticised. But it does give me uneasiness to see such foul assaults made upon perhaps the most important member of the Administration. I cannot help seeing that if anything can defeat the friends of the Union and give the ascendancy to those with whom the gentleman has cast his lot, it is the course pursued by him in stealing the mantle of the President and stabbing his friends in his name.

I have said that the roughest criticisms of my principles can never offend me. But personalities are always unpleasant. I have made it the rule of my public life never to begin a personal controversy; but I did not see how I could permit so wanton, unprovoked, and malignant an attack to pass unnoticed.

In the midst of these perplexities and personal bickerings, there is a compensating pleasure in witnessing the rapid march of correct ideas; in beholding the dawn of the day of universal liberty. The House has already established the fundamental principle for which I contended.

Some weeks since it passed without division the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the present war which this Government is carrying on against armed insurrectionists and others banded together under the name of 'southern confederacy,' was brought on by a wicked and wholly unjustifiable rebellion, and those engaged in or aiding and encouraging it are public enemies, and should be treated as such."

This is the doctrine for which I have been contending. The "confederate States" being declared a public enemy, engaged in a public war, all the consequences which I sought to establish follow as an inevitable corollary. It gives me enhanced pleasure that the resolution was proposed and offered by the able and gallant gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I have lived to see the triumph of principles which, although I had full faith in their ultimate success, I did not expect to witness. If Providence should spare me a little longer, until this Government shall be so reconstituted that the foot of a slave can never again tread upon the soil of the Republic, I shall be content to accept any lot which may await me.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I do not clearly understand what is meant by "reconstruction," but I do know that some immediate healing panacea is demanded of those who have sworn to be the defenders and protectors of the Union, or the "Union" will exist only in theory, or as a matter of the past, and never again in fact.

The act of secession of the southern States was pronounced as treason by jurists and statesmen; and when the rebellion first assumed shape and form by its armed hosts in the field to make war upon the Government of the United States, the people of the North, with one voice and in general accord declared against this most wicked and monstrous outrage. Men of all parties, of all sections, from all localities, went forth to maintain and defend the Union and the Constitution, to preserve and uphold the integrity and entirety of our Government. No conscription act was necessary then; no forced draft was required to raise an army to bear aloft the flag of the Union against secessionists and traitors. No bounties and extra pay and extraordinary inducements were wanted to obtain volunteers for the Army of the Republic. But, Mr. Speaker, "tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis." It is scarcely three short years that the citizens of the North, the East, and the West, singly, in companies, and in battalions, applied willingly, urgently, and most patriotically to the authorities to be permitted to enter the military service in defense of the old flag. No extraneous inducement or mercenary stimulus was needed to arouse the patriotism of the people to rush to the tented field. Men of all classes, of all climes, of all creeds, of all conditions, the citizens by birth and the citizens by adoption, left the peaceful walks and avocations of life at the first blast of the clarion of war.

How is it now? Why this marvelous change? What has wrought this apathy and indifference, this positive aversion in the minds of men to volunteer? The rebellion still exists. The enemy, armed and equipped, is still at our door. Many towns, forts, and public places are still in the hands of the rebels. The authority of the United States is still defied and ignored. The strife, which was then confined to a narrow circle, has assumed the vast proportions of the greatest war of ancient or modern times. Are the American people less patriotic in 1864 than they were in 1861? Have we not the same prize at stake, and is not the country still in great danger of dismemberment? Surely there is yet much danger, and we must not underrate the enemy's strength nor doubt his prowess. I would ask, then, why is it that almost every man in the community fit for military duty is devising "ways and means" to avoid the draft? Certain it is, that some great change has come over the spirit of the dreams of the people. That change, sir, is founded on the fact that the war has been, and is now, perverted from its original object. Independent of and apart from all the "pomp and circumstance" attending the reenlistment of the brave and gallant veterans and the volunteering of men under the liberal operation of national, State, and local bounties, it cannot be denied that the eager desire of the citizens to join the Army, freely and voluntarily, exists no more. The House of Representatives in 1861, immediately after the first Bull Run disaster, almost unanimously resolved,

"That this war is not waged in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

This, Mr. Speaker, was statesmanship. This was the talisman that aroused our people to renewed energies and efforts. The solemn declaration of the popular branch of Congress that the purpose of the war was solely to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, made us a band of brothers in the North, and held out strong hopes of relief to the suffering Union men of the South. There was no division of opinion among the men of the North at that time, whatever their previous political predilections may have been. So many volunteers offered their services during the autumn of 1861 that the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate declared that recruiting and volunteering must be stopped. This rush to arms by the patriotic citizens who left all home comforts, parents, wives, children, occupation, everything behind them, was in pursuance of the sublime declaration I have just quoted. Other and further assurances were given by Mr. Lincoln, by members of his Cabinet, and by high officials in the confidence of the President, that the laws and local institutions of the States should remain unimpaired.

Is it necessary to prove that the plighted faith of the Administration in this matter has been most wantonly violated and disregarded? It is patent to all that the object of the war has been perverted from its original, lawful, and constitutional purpose to that of the abolition of slavery, the confiscation of the property of the southern people, guilty or innocent, the subjugation of the white citizens of the South, the obliteration of State lines, and the reduction of the States or sovereign Commonwealths to territorial lands to be parceled out and to be held as allodial estates by traveling "loyal-leaguers," strong-minded females, and the horde of sycophants and flunkies of our "wise and beneficent" Administration. The flagrant violations of the fundamental law of the land, the substitution of proclamations and orders in place of constitutional enactments, the utter disregard of the rights of the Union men

South, and the wrongs and injuries inflicted on law-abiding citizens of the North, have produced their painful results. We have no peace yet! We have thousands of our best and bravest men slain, thousands of destitute and sorrowing widows, thousands of poor and unprotected orphans, thousands of maimed and invalid men. We have sorrow, suffering, and ghastly want in many, many once happy and prosperous homes; we have a distracted and devastated country; we have a diminished and disturbed commerce; we have irredeemable paper promises in place of the lawful coin of the United States; we have exorbitant prices for every article used by the poor man; we have a national debt of such magnitude, the contemplation of which must appall the heart of every man, except courtly officials, shoddy contractors, and swindlers. We have something more which the good people of this once happy land will not forget, nor their children's children. I mean taxes. It is said that a national debt is a national blessing. If that be so, no people were ever blessed as we are, and it must be consoling that this blessing increases at the rate of $2,000,000 per day. Notwithstanding the frightful condition of our financial affairs, and the impending crash in commercial circles, we are cheerfully informed by the stipendiaries and "Swiss-guards" of the Administration that "we are all prosperous; money is plenty, and everybody is doing well." I will not insult the House of Representatives by discussing this soap-bubble of seeming prosperity. One thing is certain, our heirs-at-law will all inherit—taxes.

Notwithstanding the strength of the rebellion and the desperation of the leading rebels, we would have had peace, ay, a lasting and honorable peace, with all the States restored and true in the Union, if the Constitution, the organic law, in all its sections and articles had been kept inviolate. It was the duty of the Administration to develop and foster the Union sentiment which undoubtedly existed in every seceded State. Not only was it a duty but the very best policy to convince the true Union men of the South that we wage no war for conquest nor for subjugation nor for the emancipation and taking away of their chattels, known in the South as negroes and in Abolitiondom as sweet-scented American citizens, but solely and only to enforce the laws made in pursuance of the Constitution. The acts of the last and of the present Congress, the proclamations and orders of the President, and the general policy of the Administration, have, in my judgment, dispelled all hope of a reunion so long as this policy is adhered to. It has made rebels of those who were well disposed toward us before. What is to be done? What remedy is there at hand? We cannot exterminate this nation of eight million free white men, nor can we hold them in peaceable subjection or in a provincial condition. The history of Ireland, Venetia, Algeria, Hungary, and Poland is the best evidence of the impossibility of affiliating a hostile people with their conquerors. We cannot repeat the atrocities, destruction, and devastation of the Thirty Years' War or the Seven Years' War in continental Europe, the fruits of which, after peace was obtained through the exhaustion of the peoples, are described by the historian as "a country wasted by fire, sword, and plague; a scene of desolation and disorder; a bad currency; a deficiency of laborers, and great want. The art of war was the only thing that gained anything." We want no such trophies.

This Administration ought to retrace its steps and return to the monumental tree of the Constitution as its landmark. In the first place, Mr. Lincoln must divest himself of the fallacy that he is the Government. The Government of the United States is a representative democracy, having for its base the Constitution, the lex scripta, which, as the supreme law, governs the three coordinate branches, to wit, the legislative, the judicial, and the executive. The Administration consists of the persons elected by the people under the Constitution and laws to manage and administer the affairs of the country. The framers of the Constitution never intended to make the President and his Cabinet "the Government." On the contrary, they have clearly defined the powers and duties of the officers as administrators of the laws enacted by the representatives of the people. In absolute monarchies, where no written law exists, where the divine right of kings is acknowledged, where the idea that "the king can do no wrong" is still upheld, the reigning monarch may well be styled "the Government." There the emperor, the czar, or the king, in his own person, is, and represents, the Government. He makes laws by imperial or royal decrees, proclamations, and orders; the people, subjects or plebeians, must obey the peremptory mandate of the one who titles himself "We, by the grace of God!" The laws of the United States, in pursuance of the rights and grants in the Constitution, are enacted by the national Legislature, interpreted and expounded by the Judiciary, and executed by the President and his legally appointed officers. The incontrovertible fact that the officers of the Government are the servants of the people, carries with it the undoubted right to criticize the acts and conduct of our servants whom we have temporarily clothed with limited power. The subordinates of this Administration, acting under "orders," dispute the right to discuss the course and policy of the Administration, and designate every expression of disapprobation as "disloyal practices." In this they are sustained by the leading men of a mongrel party, who are now arrayed against the Constitution and against the maintenance and supremacy of the civil law.

We have had numerous instances of illegal and arbitrary arrests, imprisonments, banishments, suppression of public newspapers, and other tyrannical acts committed against the constitutional rights of the citizen by petty despots of accidental power under the usurper's plea of "military necessity." The doctrine is put forth that "inter arma leges silent"—the laws are silent in the midst of arms. Now, whether this is considered as a civil war or as a public war; whether the secessionists are rebels in arms or belligerents, the laws need surely not be silent in the peaceful northern and western States, or, as the new lexicographers term them, the "loyal States." There is no war raging in the eastern, northern, middle, or western States. Why should the law be silent? Why should the citizen be arrested without probable cause? Why deny the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed? Why suspend the prerogative writ of habeas corpus, the bulwark of the citizen's liberty, grantable under the Magna Charta of England, and under the Constitution of the United States, ex debito iustitia? It is because the public expression of opinion of the conduct of the war to suppress the rebellion is distasteful to the Administration. It is because the Democracy do not approve of the course of our rulers to abolitionize this country and carry on the war for the pecuniary and political benefit of abolition politicians, Army contractors, servile office-holders, mushroom generals, and a brood of abject demagogues and toadies who sing the loyal-league psalms and shout hosannas for the Government and their aromatic brethren and sisters. These are the people—venal and corrupt—who traduce and malign the law-abiding, honest Democratic citizens, whom they in their self-righteousness and loyal zeal are pleased to designate as "secessionists," "sympathizers," and sometimes "traitors." The latter term, however, only when they are two to one!

The Democrats are with heart and soul in favor of restoring the seceded States to their former status, and establishing again what we have had for eighty years, "a more perfect Union." We are in favor of quelling the rebellion for the purpose of preserving the Constitution intact, and grant to the several States their rights and privileges, as they enjoyed them before the rebellion, and to which as commonwealths in themselves they are entitled. We are opposed to waging war for the purpose of equalizing the negro with the white man, and we are opposed to shedding the white man's blood, beggar and devastate the country to satisfy the insane and unnatural demands of the abolition hypocrites of New England or the humanitarian bigots and fanatics of old England. We deprecate the abolition idea of negro equality and the consequent commingling of the Ethiopian with the pure Saxon and Celtic blood. We believe the President's schemes of emancipation and confiscation as expressed in his proclamations to be gross infractions of the Constitution which he swore to support and defend, and from which no sophism of "war power" can absolve him. For this lawful opposition to the unconstitutional acts of the party in power we are called "disloyal." Well, Mr. Speaker, if this is an evidence of disloyalty, then there are upward of a million and a half of free white citizens in the North who are very disloyal according to the translation of that foreign word "loyal" by the Jacobins of America. The Democracy revere the Constitution and acknowledge it in all its parts as the supreme law. We cheerfully obey the laws of the Federal Government and of the States, but we do not believe in that "higher law" which pronounces the Constitution made by the fathers and founders of the Republic "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell." It is a right and privilege to canvass the acts of our public men and to criticize the conduct of those whom the people have placed in power.

This inherent and fundamental principle of the American citizen is now attempted to be denied by the abolition saints, of whom the sage and patriot Henry Clay more than twenty years ago expressed his opinion as follows:

"With them [the abolitionists] the rights of property are nothing; the deficiency of the powers of the General Government is nothing; the acknowledged and incontestable powers of the States are nothing; the dissolution of the Union and the overthrow of a Government in which are concentrated the hopes of the civilized world are nothing. A single idea has taken possession of their minds, and onward they pursue it, overlooking all barriers, reckless and regardless of all consequences."

Recent events and daily occurrences prove how true, how prophetic, were the words of Kentucky's lamented statesman.

Mr. Speaker, time will not allow me to speak at length of the causes of the war; it suffices to say, what history has already proved, that the fell fanaticism of the North, the ambition for office, the lust for power, and the hereditary hostility of the descendants of the Mayflower cargo to liberal principles and democratic sentiments have brought this great calamity upon us.

The constant clamor against slavery, a subject with which the people of the North had nothing whatever to do; the preachings of the "irrepressible conflict" and the doctrine that "the nation cannot exist half slave and half free," (when in fact we had existed happily and prosperously for eighty years,) superinduced the acts of secession, rebellion, violence, and bloodshed. The originators and instigators of this most unnatural and fratricidal war are now the most "loyal" men in the land. They not only occupy the fat offices and places of emolument, but are even the high priests in the grand abolition sanhedrim, pure, undefiled, and godlike. Yes, the men who for years before there was any rebellious outbreak were offering resolutions and presenting petitions in Congress for the dissolution of the Union; who wanted "no fellowship with slaveholders," although willing to fit out ships to engage in the slave trade for a valuable consideration; who were willing to "let the Union slide," long before Jeff. Davis & Co. thought of sliding, have suddenly transmuted themselves into the most intense Union men and devout patriots, and pharisaically denounce all others, who do not as they do, as disloyal and anti-Union.

While I condemn and denounce secession and hate the very idea of a dissolution of the Union as much as any man in the land, I cannot shut my eyes to the great fact that the constant agitation of the subject of slavery by the abolitionists is the first and prime cause of secession and all its horrible consequences. It is true that for many years the abolition party per se was insignificant in numbers, and no danger was apprehended from its ravings and dangerous doctrines; but slavery was a hobby for the opponents of the Democratic party to ride, and, by a grand combination of all the remains, fragments, and debris of the defunct political clans, to overthrow the Democracy and the Republic. The one is identical with the other. There can be no republican form of government, no representative democracy such as ours, without the principles of democracy as the cornerstone.

We have had an anti-Union, anti-democratic party, an aristocratic party opposed to equal rights and the obligations of the Constitution, from the time of the formation of the Union to the present day. The democratic sentiment established the Republic and maintained it until the present sectional conglomeration came into power. Democracy is ever the same; it has not changed and is not changeable in principle or in name. The Opposition is classified historically in the following order:

In 1775, Loyalists, or loyal to King George, or Tories.

In 1776, Loyal Tories.

What it will be next spring has not yet been announced by the "white spirits and blue; the gray spirits and black."

I charge that abolitionism is the cause of the war. We had lived happy and content for eighty years. The citizen of Maine was welcome in Louisiana. Our political union and good-fellowship produced their natural and beneficial results. We prospered as a nation as no people prospered before on the face of the earth. The valuable southern products furnished the cargoes for our ships, materials for our factories, and wealth to our people of all sections, and through which our country became one of the great commercial and maritime Powers of the world. The southern people were willing to confine themselves to the peaceful pursuits of agriculture, willing and glad to exchange commodities with us, and in no instance did any southern statesman interfere or attempt to interfere in the institutions and affairs of the North. They conceded to us the manufacturing and carrying trade of the whole country, and willing that we should enjoy prosperity and wealth in common with them, but they demanded that the behests of the Constitution, the articles of our partnership, should be strictly observed, and that the obligation of the original contract should not be impaired. They wanted no interference in their local institutions on the part of the North, no intermeddling with slavery, a system of labor which existed before the Revolution, and which was an undenied right and colonial establishment at the time the colonies became States, and the States formed the Union. Have we fulfilled our part of the original pactum? Have we stood by the great contract, the original covenant, when the partnership was entered into by South Carolina and Massachusetts, Virginia and New York? We have not. The North for years has preached from the text, "no Union with slaveholders," and "the Union cannot exist half slave and half free." I have never heard any explanation of this proposition why the Union could not continue so to exist after a prosperous and glorious existence for upwards of eighty years.

After the thorough organization of the remnants and rag-ends of all the political clans and tribes, and the founding of a systematic anti-slavery party, eight or ten years ago, the attacks on the South and southern institutions were commenced. In the pulpit, the forum, the halls of justice, the school, the stump, everywhere, anywhere, were the anathemas hurled against slavery and slaveholders. My allotted time will not allow me to quote the opinions, writings, and teachings of the leading abolitionists and politicians for many years back; but I will confine myself to a few of the saints of the latter days—to the shining lights who were the immediate instruments of dissolution and destruction, and who now, singularly enough, are baptized as "Union men." In 1857 an individual by the name of Helper, who was compelled to leave North Carolina, his native State—not for stealing negroes—and who is now an office-holder as a reward for his services, published the book entitled The Impending Crisis. This book recommended direct warfare on southern society, "be the consequences what they might." This book was adopted as the campaign document of the Republican party, and its infamous teachings indorsed by sixty-eight Republican members of Congress, and by all the prominent leaders of the party.

I will make a few quotations from the Alcoran of the modern Ishmaelites, showing the piety, purity, and patriotism of abolitionism:

"1. We unhesitatingly declare ourselves in favor of the immediate and unconditional abolition of slavery."—Page 26.

"2. We cannot be too hasty in carrying out our designs."—Page 33.

"3. No man can be a true patriot without first becoming an abolitionist."—Page 116.

"4. Slaveholders are more criminal than common murderers."—Page 140.

"5. All slaveholders are under the shield of a perpetual license to murder."—Page 141.

"6. It is our honest conviction that all the pro-slavery slaveholders, who are alone responsible for the continuance of the baneful institution among us, deserve to be at once reduced to a parallel with the basest criminals that lie fettered within the cells of our public prisons."—Page 158.

"7. Were it possible that the whole number [of slaveholders] could be gathered together and transferred into four equal gangs of licensed robbers, ruffians, thieves, and murderers, society, we feel assured, would suffer less from their atrocities than it does now."—Page 158.

"8. Once and forever, at least so far as this country is concerned, the infernal question of slavery must be disposed of. A speedy and absolute abolishment of the whole system is the true policy of the South, and this is the policy which we propose to pursue."—Page 121.

"WE UNFURL OUR BANNER TO THE WORLD."

"Inscribed on the banner which we herewith unfurl to the world, with the full and fixed determination to stand by it or die by it, unless one of more virtuous efficacy shall be presented, are the mottoes which, in substance, embody the principles as we conceive should govern us.

"The Mottoes on Our Banner."

"1. Thorough organization and independent political action on the part of non-slaveholding whites of the South.

"2. Ineligibility of slaveholders; never another vote to the trafficker in human flesh.

"3. No co-operation with slaveholders in politics; no fellowship with them in religion; no affiliation with them in society.

"4. No patronage to slaveholding merchants; no bequest to slave-waiting hotels; no fees to slaveholding lawyers; no employment to slaveholding physicians; no audience to slaveholding parsons.

"5. No recognition of pro-slavery men except as ruffians, outlaws, and criminals.

"6. Immediate death to slavery, or, if not immediate, unqualified proscription of its advocates during the period of its existence."—Pages 155, 156.

"7. Thus, terror-engenderers of the South, have we fully and frankly defined our position; we have no modifications to propose, no compromises to offer, nothing to retract. Flown, sirs, fret, foam, prepare your weapons, threat, strike, shoot, stab, bring on civil war, dissolve the Union, nay, annihilate the solar system, if you will—do all this, more, less, better, worse, anything—do what you will, sirs, you can neither foil nor intimidate us; our purpose is as firmly fixed as the eternal pillars of heaven; we have determined to abolish slavery, and, so help us God, abolish it we will."—Page 187.

This language, so amiable and fraternal in its character, was very much calculated to cement the bonds of union between North and South. No one but an idiot could help foreseeing the inevitable consequences of such declarations and threats. We have the opinions and counsels of the great abolition captains by the hundred; a few extracts will suffice to show the general tenor, intent, and purpose.

Opinion of A. Lincoln, President of the United States:

"I believe this Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free."

Cassius M. Clay, the present minister of the United States in Russia, expressed himself thus:

"Our Legislatures, State and Federal, should raise the platform upon which our free colored people stand; they should give to them full political rights to hold office, to vote, to sit on juries, to give their testimony, and to make no distinction between them and ourselves. The instrument called the Constitution, after pronouncing all men equal and having equal rights, suffers slavery to exist, a free colored person to be denied all political rights, and, after declaring that all persons shall enjoy a free intercourse with the States, suffers the free negro to be driven out of all, and excluded from such rights. Deliver me from such an instrument thus partial, thus unjust, that can be thus perverted, and made to sanction prejudices and party feelings, and note the accidental distinction of color."

Wendell Phillips, a bishop in the abolition church, gave his honest opinion in the following style:

"No man has a right to be surprised at this state of things. It is just what we [abolitionists and disunionists] have attempted to bring about. It is the first sectional party ever organized in this country. It does not know its own face and calls itself national; but it is not national—it is sectional. The Republican party is a party of the North pledged against the South.

"No act of ours do we regard with more conscientious approval or higher satisfaction, none do we submit more confidently to the tribunal of Heaven and the moral verdict of mankind, than when, several years ago, on the 4th of July, in the presence of a great assembly, we committed to the flames the Constitution of the United States."

I could cite similar language from the speeches and writings of hundreds of the leading men of the Republican-abolition party, but it would only be cumulative evidence of facts that cannot be controverted. I ask reasonable men, honest, unprejudiced men who love their country, and who can look on the present and the past condition of the Republic, whether the conduct of the abolitionists was not the cause of the secession of the southern States. We all remember the acts and deeds of John Brown, the murderer and thief, and how he was canonized by the fanatics of the North because he was hanged for crime. Of him the present Governor of Massachusetts, John A. Andrew, spoke as follows:

"John Brown and his companions in the conflict at Harper's Ferry, those who fell there and those who are to suffer upon the scaffold, are victims and martyrs to an idea. There is an irrepressible conflict [great applause] between freedom and slavery as old and as immortal as the irrepressible conflict between right and wrong. They are among the martyrs of that conflict. John Brown was right. I sympathize with the idea, because I sympathize with and believe in the eternal right. They who are dependent upon him and his sons and his associates, in the battle of Harper's Ferry, have a right to call upon us who have professed to believe or who may have, in any manner or measure, taught the doctrine of the rights of man, as applied to the colored slaves of the South, to stand by their brave movement. We are to-night in the presence of a great and awful sorrow, which has fallen like a pall upon many families whose hearts fail, whose affections are lacerated, and whose hopes are crushed, all of hope left on earth destroyed by an event which, under the providence of God, I pray will be overruled for that good which was contemplated and intended by John Brown."

After all this, who, I ask, is responsible for southern secession, bloodshed, ruin, and desolation? This war, civil war, internecine war, bloody, desperate, and unnatural as it is, is the effect of the abolition cause.

The abolitionists were the original anti-Union men, a fact that admits of no denial; and when we hear the howlings now for a restoration of the Union by the men who have destroyed it, they simply mean the abolition of slavery, extermination of the white population South, and propagation of a Yankee colony, with the negroes as vassals to raise cotton, rice, sugar, and tobacco for the benefit of the modern Vandals and Goths who claim title under the confiscation act.

The Union is broken! How can we restore it? How reconstruct? How again reunite the North and South? By a vigorous prosecution of the war? The war has lasted for three years; it has been vigorous. We have an immense Army and a powerful Navy, brave men and good commanders, and we are still drafting and recruiting for the further vigorous prosecution of the war. How long shall this continue? We cannot subjugate nor conquer the South in the sense in which these terms are usually applied and understood. War will make no Union, no fellowship, no fraternity. The feeling of the South is bitter, the hearts of the people alienated and estranged from us, and hence the desperation with which they resist in behalf of their homes, their lands, and their institutions. Unless the illegal steps taken by our rulers are retraced, unless the Constitution is adhered to, and all arbitrary proclamations and orders recalled, and unconstitutional legislation repealed, the southern people assured that they can have equal rights with us in the Union; in short, unless the olive-branch accompanies the sword we will never again have a Union. It is a sad spectacle to contemplate; but so it is. This once great and happy country, established by the blood and sufferings of noble patriots of both hemispheres, whose proud flag waved in the most distant breeze, this glorious fabric of Heaven-inspired men, this magnificent Republic, truly the asylum of the oppressed of all lands, is suddenly and violently rent asunder and destroyed by the degenerate sons of those who were born and reared under its protecting banner of liberty.

The remedy is with the people. Let the great and honest yeomanry of the land, the farmers, the mechanics, the miners, the laborers, all classes who work for their living and earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, rise in their strength and in their majesty as freemen, and come to the rescue of imperiled liberty! Thank God! the ballot-box still exists, and although infringed on in many parts of the country we have yet the power to protect the sacred urn from the janizaries and satraps of modern despotism: Place statesmen at the head of the Government; men free from bias, fanaticism, and treason, who will administer the laws impartially and constitutionally. If this is not done, if the people will continue the present party, with its avowed anti-Union policy, in power, then no man born can foretell the sad fate of this country. The angel of liberty may, from on high, point to the land from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf, and mournfully exclaim, 'This was the Republic of the United States!'

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, I have had neither inclination nor ambition during this session of Congress for participating in general debate. On the contrary, I have preferred to remain silent and to record my vote on the merits of each question as presented to the House for action. And to-day, if I could satisfy my mind that I had faithfully performed my duty to my constituents and to my country by remaining longer silent, I should most cheerfully do so. I feel, however, that something more is required at my hands, and I shall proceed to state briefly my views on some of the questions at issue before the country. I am aware that whoever attempts to warn the people of approaching danger, or opposes the wild and revolutionary policy of those who are controlling the affairs of the nation at this time, subjects himself to the charge of disloyalty and treason. With that class no distinction is recognized between fidelity to the Government and fidelity to the Administration. I acknowledge my obligations to the former, to the latter I do not; and charges coming from that quarter will not be likely to deter me from expressing my opinions freely upon questions of public policy. I acknowledge in the fullest sense all the responsibilities that belong to my position as a member of this body, and I shall observe the strict rules of decorum in what I have to say.

On taking my seat here as a member of this House, I took upon myself a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States. I took that oath without any mental reservation, and I shall to the best of my ability keep it sacred and inviolate.

The Democratic party, of which I am an humble member, and whose principles I indorse, has raised the banner of the Constitution and the Union, and we are determined to defend it against whoever may oppose, come the opposition from what quarter it may. Sir, in this dark hour of tempest and storm there is no hope or safety for us as a nation but in strictly adhering to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Depart from that bond of union, and we may prepare to reap the consequences—anarchy first, and then despotism. It is no part of my purpose to inquire who is most to blame for the inauguration of the bloody and desolating civil war in which the nation is now unhappily involved. We are called upon to deal with the facts as they exist; to find the road that will lead us through our great troubles, and at the same time save the Union and preserve to us the blessings of civil and religious liberty as we have hitherto enjoyed them. Show me that path, and I am ready to move at once upon it. When passion, prejudice, and fanaticism have run their wild course, and reason resumes her throne, then and not until then will we be able to realize to their full extent the blunders that have been committed in this great struggle for national life.

I am of the opinion that this cruel war would have been ended and the Union would have been restored if the abundant means that have been furnished by a patriotic people to the Government had been honestly and wisely applied, and if the Administration had rigidly adhered to the policy avowed in the beginning of the war. But the means furnished by the people have not been wisely or honestly used, and the Administration has entirely changed the policy of the war.

In the beginning of the war the policy was to put down armed rebellion and restore the Union under the Constitution, leaving all the States in the full possession and enjoyment of all their constitutional rights. That this was well understood to be the object of the war when it was commenced, there is, I presume, no one to question.

If there should be, I will call the attention of such to a few facts that have now gone into history, and that will be considered important by whoever may in after times desire to examine the principles for which this great struggle was made on our part.

Mr. Lincoln in his inaugural address, under all the solemnities of an oath and after several States had passed ordinances of secession, and had organized a government and had raised a military force to defend it, said:

"I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so. I have no inclination to do so. That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment, exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend."

In order that other nations might fully understand and comprehend the true nature of the struggle in which we were about to engage, and to secure the good opinion and sympathy of all Europe, Mr. Lincoln, through his Secretary of State, caused to be sent instructions to our foreign ministers, in which the following passages occur.

Under date of April 10, 1861, Mr. Seward wrote to Mr. Adams, the American minister to England, and in his official instructions to him spoke as follows:

"You will indulge in no expressions of harshness or disrespect, or even impatience, concerning the seceded States, their agents or their people; but you will, on the contrary, all the while remember that those States are now, as they always heretofore have been, and notwithstanding their temporary self-delusion they must always continue to be, equal and honored members of this Federal Union; and that their citizens, throughout all political misunderstandings and alienations, still are and always must be our kindred and countrymen."

On the 22d day of April, 1861, Mr. Seward, writing to Mr. Dayton, our minister at the court of the Emperor Napoleon, and treating of the subject of the present rebellion, said:

"I need not further elaborate the proposition that the revolution is without a cause: it has not even a pretext. It is just as clear that it is without an object. Moral and physical causes have determined inflexibly the character of each one of the Territories over which the dispute has arisen, and both parties after the election harmoniously agreed on all the Federal laws required for their organization. The Territories will remain in all respects the same whether the revolution shall succeed or shall fail. The condition of slavery in the several States will remain just the same whether it succeed or fail. There is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail; for the rights of the States and the condition of every human being in them will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration whether the revolution shall succeed or fail. In the one case the States would be federally connected with the new confederacy; in the other they would, as now, be members of the United States; but their constitutions and laws, customs, habits, and institutions in either case will remain the same.

"It is hardly necessary to add to this incontestable statement the further fact that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrages he has come into the administration, has always repudiated all designs whatever and whenever imputed to him and them of disturbing the system of slavery as it is existing under the Constitution and laws. The case, however, would not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such effort on his part would be unconstitutional; and all his actions in that direction would be prevented by the judicial authority even though they were assented to by Congress and the people."

These official declarations had the effect to quiet in some degree the public mind at the North, and prepare it for the contest.

The period for compromise that would have avoided the war had been permitted to pass, by the Republican party then in power refusing to adopt the resolutions known as the Crittenden compromise. Mr. Davis, then a Senator of the United States, and now the president of the southern confederacy, said in his place in the Senate that these resolutions, although they did not embrace all the South had a right to demand, yet as a measure of adjustment would be accepted by that section. Mr. Douglas in the Senate charged that if we failed to adopt measures of adjustment, by which alone war could be avoided, the sole responsibility of the defeat of those measures would rest with the Republican party, and he asserted most emphatically that the Democratic party in the House and in the Senate were ready and willing to do their part in adjusting those questions of national trouble which he plainly saw must end in a rupture between the North and the South without a settlement. The records of the Senate and the House will show that the Republican party refused their consent to those measures, and war was the consequence. War was foolishly and wickedly commenced by the rebels firing on Fort Sumter, in Charleston harbor. The President called for seventy-five thousand men to defend the capital, and for other purposes. The loyal States furnished them promptly. Congress was convened in extra session in July, 1861. During that session, on the 20th of July, the first great battle of the war was fought at Bull Run, in Virginia, a short distance from this city. Our Army was defeated; routed and demoralized it returned to Washington on the 21st, but little better than a mob. To prepare for the great struggle in which we were fairly embarked, and to unite the people, and to leave nothing doubtful or conjectural as to the objects for which the war was to be prosecuted and when it should cease, amidst the gloom of that sad day on which the fragments of our Army wandered about the streets of this city, Mr. Crittenden, a wise and patriotic statesman, submitted to the House this resolution, which was adopted with great unanimity by both branches of Congress:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

This resolution was adopted by a vote of 30 to 5 in the Senate, and by 117 to 2 in the House of Representatives.

This action of Congress, without respect to party, had a happy effect in uniting the people. Nor was the President idle in his efforts to satisfy the public mind on the subject, for to the clergymen who importuned him to issue a proclamation of emancipation to all the slaves he replied that a proclamation of that kind would have about as much effect as the Pope's bull against the comet. He revoked the proclamations of generals and removed them from their respective commands because they had attempted to liberate slaves in contravention of his avowed war policy.

This fair understanding between the Administration and the people left no alternative but to be for or against the Union, and to be for the Union it was essential to break the force of armed rebellion. The appeal was made to every friend of the old Government by all the cherished memories of the past and the bright hopes of the future. All party distinction was to be ignored, and he was branded as wanting in patriotism who was unwilling to lay aside his party prejudices and join in the great cause of restoring the Union. No people ever loved their Government as ours did, and no people ever had the same cause to love a Government. It was therefore easy to unite them in its defense. No sacrifice at that time was considered too great to be made for the cause of the Union. The father gave his first-born, and the widow her only son. So sweeping in my district was the enthusiasm that one old man who had five sons gave them all and then went himself. The records of the War Office tell the sad fate of that family. A poor widow of my town gave two boys, her only children; both fell for the cause of the Union and the Constitution. These instances are but too common, and are only named because they illustrate the patriotism and devotion of the whole people.

Under this policy the Administration asked Congress for an appropriation of $400,000,000 and to authorize the raising of four hundred thousand men. Such was the confidence reposed in the fidelity of the Administration at that time that the people's representatives with unanimity appropriated $500,000,000 and authorized the raising of five hundred thousand men, exceeding by one hundred thousand in each case the request of the Administration. It was then no trouble to raise men without bounty by volunteering. General McClellan was called from a successful campaign in Western Virginia to the command of the whole Army. He soon brought order out of confusion, and organized the finest Army in the world. He submitted his plans of military campaign to the President, and they were considered wise and conservative. He commenced to operate on those plans, and everywhere the Union cause was triumphant. The people rejoiced in the bright prospect of a speedy peace under a restored Union. The cause of the rebellion seemed to be hopeless. There was manifest division in their counsels. Davis was openly denounced throughout the southern confederacy, and the deep-toned mutterings of an outraged people manifested all the outward signs of a counter-revolution against the rebel leaders. There was a wait that came up from the camp of the insurgent soldiery that stamped the rebel banner with all the signs of complete failure. All that seemed to be wanting on our part was to break the military force of the rebellion and lift its pressure from the people, to throw the protecting arms of the Government around the Union men wherever they could be found, no matter how small their number, and place in their hands the evidence to show to their friends who had been deluded that the Government was not aiming to make war on any right secured to them by the Constitution, and at the same time show to them that there was force enough in the Union to save the national life, and magnanimity to defend the constitutional rights of each section. If this had been our policy, and it had been adhered to, I have not the least doubt in my mind but that to-day the Union would have been restored. No one questions the fact that in the beginning of the war there was a large Union sentiment in all the seceded States. Mr. Lincoln, in his first message to the Thirty-Seventh Congress, said:

"It may well be questioned whether there is to-day a majority of the legally qualified voters of any State, except perhaps South Carolina, in favor of disunion. There is much reason to believe that the Union men are the majority in many if not in every one of the seceded States."

I firmly believe that the President did not overestimate the Union sentiment at that time. If it is less to-day, there is a cause for it; and I will endeavor to show that cause before I close my remarks. It is a well-known fact that many of the ablest statesmen of the South were opposed to leaving the Union, and defended it until the last moment and until they were completely overwhelmed by the tide. Among the number I will call your attention to the speech of one that I have held in the highest admiration. I have read the speech of Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, made in reply to Mr. Toombs, of that State, with the most profound interest. His vindication of the Government of the United States, and his exposition of the folly and crime of attempting to leave the Union, have not been equaled by any statesman North or South, and will adorn the brightest and best page in his history. I would commend the whole speech to every American. I can only give a very short extract on this occasion. Mr. A. H. Stephens, of Georgia, the vice president of the confederate States, in a speech delivered before the Legislature of Georgia on the 14th day of November, 1860, after the election of Mr. Lincoln, used the following language:

"The first question that presents itself is, shall the people of the South secede from the Union in consequence of the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency of the United States? My countrymen, I tell you frankly, candidly, and earnestly, that I do not think that they ought. In my judgment, the election of no man constitutionally chosen to that high office is sufficient cause for any State to separate from the Union. It ought to stand by and aid still in maintaining the Constitution of the country. To make a point of resistance to the Government, to withdraw from it because a man has been constitutionally elected, puts us in the wrong. We are pledged to maintain the Constitution. Many of us have sworn to support it. Can we, therefore, for the mere election of a man to the Presidency, and that, too, in accordance with the prescribed forms of the Constitution, make a point of resistance to the Government without becoming the breakers of that sacred instrument ourselves, withdraw ourselves from it? Would we not be in the wrong? Whatever fate is to befall this country, let it never be laid to the charge of the people of the South, and especially to the people of Georgia, that we were untrue to our national engagements. Let the fault and the wrong rest upon others. If all our hopes are to be blasted, if the Republic is to go down, let us be found to the last moment standing on the deck, with the Constitution of the United States waving over our heads. Let the fanatics of the North break the Constitution if such is their fell purpose. Let the responsibility be upon them. I shall speak presently more of their acts; but let not the South, let us not be the ones to commit the aggression. We went into the election with this people. The result was different from what we wished; but the election has been constitutionally held. Were we to make a point of resistance to the Government and go out of the Union on that account, the record would be made up hereafter against us."

Can any one doubt that if our policy had been wise and conciliatory all that conservative class of men at the South of which Mr. Stephens was the representative would have sought the first occasion to return to the Union? I do not doubt it for one moment. But, sir, fanaticism has ruled, and we must drink the bitter cup. By changing our policy we have united the South and divided the North. You had a splendid Army in the field, and the people were fully committed to the war. Immense sacrifices of blood and treasure had already been made. The leaders of the Republican party (a name synonymous with abolition) demanded a change in the entire policy of the war, and I believe they demanded the change because they believed that the rebellion would be put down, and the Union would be restored, before their long-cherished political project of abolishing slavery could be accomplished. Having determined to force the change they no longer sought to ignore party, but everywhere proscribed men for opinion's sake. The offices of the Government, both civil and military, were filled from the ranks of their own most extreme partisans, and that without regard to merit or qualification.

But, sir, with this bright prospect before us, with a splendid Army, such as no nation could ever boast before, with a united people and overflowing Treasury, with a divided and discouraged enemy, you forced the change in the policy of the war to suit your own peculiar views and to accomplish political ends. McClellan was too conservative to suit you, and he was becoming too popular with the Army and the people. You demanded his removal, the President refused to remove him. You threatened the President, and demanded a division of the army, and the army of the Potomac was divided into three or four separate commands. The defeat and disaster attending each command will forever attest the folly and wickedness of that division, made to subserve political purposes.

I believe that our failure to obtain important military success through the instrumentality of the army of the Potomac is not attributable to any want of courage or prowess in that army, but that failure in every instance is traceable to unwarranted interference by those radical politicians who have not dared to risk their own lives in the field, and who have not been content to let the movements of the Army be controlled by those whose position, education, and profession entitled them alone to determine wisely its action. The Army has had a bold, brave, and desperately determined foe to contend with, led by able commanders. It has required the highest skill and ability in its commanders, with the most patient endurance, complete discipline, and exalted courage on our part to meet the adversary. And no mere political juggler has any more right to interfere with the movements of the Army than the Army has to interfere with the legislation of the country.

I desire now to turn my attention to the action of Congress during this momentous struggle. And before I proceed to speak of any specific measure I will state what I believe the action of the majority in this body will prove, and that is that the Republican party is in all essentials an abolition party; that if there ever was any difference there is none now; that you have forced a change in the policy of the war, not from any military necessity but to enable you to accomplish your purpose in liberating the slaves and elevating the negro to political and social equality with the white man; that you do not intend to restore the Union under the Constitution, but that you are determined to violate that sacred instrument whenever and wherever it comes in conflict with your political dogmas; that you will continue to adopt one measure after another, under the plea that it is for the salvation of the Union, until you will have divided the people, robbed them of their natural and constitutional rights, and finally, losing all hope of saving the Union, you will have established a centralized despotism. You are now following to the letter the predictions made by the immortal Webster. No photograph was ever more lifelike than that given by that great statesman, who warned the people of the danger to be apprehended by your elevation to power. He said:

"If the infernal fanatics and abolitionists ever get the power in their hands they will override the Constitution, set the Supreme Court at defiance, change and make laws to suit themselves, lay violent hands on those who differ with them in their opinions or dare question their infallibility, and finally bankrupt the country and deluge it with blood."

If the description given by Mr. Webster is not complete, allow me to give you another from the master hand of Kentucky's gifted son; one whose loyalty was never called in question. Mr. Clay said of them as a class:

"With them the rights of property are nothing; the deficiency of the powers of the General Government is nothing; the acknowledged and incontestable powers of the States are nothing; the dissolution of the Union and the overthrow of a Government in which are concentrated the hopes of the civilized world are nothing. A single idea has taken possession of their minds, and onward they pursue it, overlooking all barriers, reckless and regardless of all consequences."

I ask you who in the midst of this great struggle for national life, with a mind to comprehend the magnitude of the issues before us, does not tremble for the fate of this nation? Is not the question of civil liberty involved? Is not the great problem of man's capacity for self-government under process of solution to be worked out in blood? Is not the question of free and independent government on trial, and will it not require the best and most united efforts of all the people to save the ship of State? Can the party that can carry an election successfully put down this rebellion? Can you who are in power afford to ignore one million and a half of Democrats in this great contest? If you cannot afford to lose their support why do you labor so hard to prove that all who do not subscribe to the infallibility of this Administration are disloyal and traitors? Why do you indulge in low abusive phrases against them in debate? Why do you constantly keep before Congress side issues which have nothing to do with putting down the rebellion? Do you desire to save the Union of our fathers or do you desire a Union formed to suit your higher-law doctrines; one that is not held together by interest and the strong cords of fraternal love and affection, but one that is held together by bayonets?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] talks about a homogeneity of ideas which is to be produced by his force policy in abolishing slavery. Why, sir, you might as well talk about forcing all men to look alike as to talk about forcing all men to think alike. God has not designed that all men should think or look alike; and having organized men's minds so that they will feel and think differently, in order that they may live peaceably in society they must compromise and concede something to each other's views. Governments are founded on much the same principles, and our Government is one peculiarly of compromise; and without that principle it could never have been formed.

But if you really desire the restoration of the Union, why do you keep constantly before Congress and the country the negro? You seem to have given far more importance to the interest of the African race than you have to the interest of the white race. Mr. Clay says that one idea has seized your minds; and onward you pursue it, reckless and regardless of all consequences. Is not this true? When did you shed the tear of sympathy over the afflictions of the sick or wounded soldier in camp or hospital; or over the distressed widow and orphan at home, made so by the war? If you are unable to answer me these questions, answer me another. When, since you have been in power, have you failed to have before Congress some subject relating to the negro? Look at the list of measures that you have passed on that interesting subject—a list disgraceful to you and ruinous to the country. You commenced the agitation by abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, at a cost of millions of dollars. Then came the repeal of the law against the transportation of the mails by negroes. We all witnessed the great agony and discussion in the Senate of the United States over the ejection from the street cars of this city by the conductor of one Major Charles Augusta, an impudent negro; who, because he had shoulder straps on, felt licensed to thrust himself on the car seats by the side of white ladies. Look at the discussion on this subject, and you will find that a distinguished Senator [Mr. GRIMES] declared that it was a greater disgrace for this negro to be put out of the cars than it would have been to have done the same by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.]

And again, the question of the organization of the new Territory of Montana is before the Senate. That august body debates and finally adopts an amendment to the bill providing that negroes may vote. The amendment was adopted on a call of the yeas and nays, 20 for and 17 against. The vote in the House on its return from the Senate, on the question of laying the bill on the table, was a tie vote, and the Speaker gave the casting vote against laying on the table. But to my list once more.

The amendment of the Articles of War, so as to make it a high offense for an officer of the Army to return a runaway slave to his owner;

The refusal to make it an offense of like character for an officer to entice away a slave;

The passage of a law recognizing as our equals the negro Governments of Liberia and Hayti;

The passage of a confiscation bill aimed at slavery;

The act authorizing the President to call negroes into the military service of the United States;

The admission of the new State of West Virginia, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, provided she would abolish slavery;

Prohibiting slavery in all the Territories of the United States.

Add to these measures—

The six hundred free negroes sent to the island of Avache, and finally returned after a pleasant excursion at sea at the public expense;

The bill to establish a Freedmen's Bureau, at an immense cost to the Government;

The bill to reconstruct rebel States, in which the negro is to be forever free;

The bill providing temporary territorial governments for seceded States, in which the lands are to be leased to negroes under overseers, and schools are to be established for the negroes;

The proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, abolishing slavery in all the States where it now exists by law, and forever forbidding it;

The various propositions to increase the pay of the negro soldier, with your manifest indifference about the increase of the pay of the white soldier;

The eulogium of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] on the life and death of some negro friend of his;

And finally, and to cap the climax of negroism, we have the President's amnesty proclamation, reconstructing rebel States and fixing the qualifications of voters, who are, before being entitled to vote, required to take an oath to support all the proclamations that he—the President—has issued or that he may hereafter issue on the negro question.

Sir, can any man of sound mind look over this list of measures, which is by no means full, and then read the immense volumes of speeches made in behalf of the negro, and not be impressed with the idea that you are more concerned about the abolition of slavery than you are about the restoration of the Union, or the liberties of the white race on this continent? Indeed, am I not warranted in saying that you would not accept the Union of our fathers to-day if it was tendered to you by the rebels laying down their arms and asking to return? Look at the declarations of some of your ablest leaders. Many quotations might be made from others on that side of the Chamber; but I will take, as a sample, what I think is the sentiment of a large majority of your side of the House. Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, in discussing the question of the admission of West Virginia into the Union—and he has reiterated the same sentiment at this session—said:

"I will not stultify myself by supposing that we have any warrant in the Constitution for this proceeding. This talk of restoring the Union as it was and under the Constitution as it is, is one of the absurdities which I have heard repeated until I have become sick of it. There are many things which make such an event impossible. This Union never shall, with my consent, be restored under the Constitution as it is."

Hear what my colleague from the burnt district of Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] has said. On the 14th of January, 1862, in a speech on this floor, he is reported to have used the following language:

"Cases may arise in which patriotism itself may demand that we trample on the most vital principles of the Constitution; and this has been done already by the present Administration under the exigencies of the war."

And again, during this session, he made a speech in which he said:

"Now is the time to begin this work; we must not only cut up slavery root and branch, but we must see to it that these teeming regions shall be studded over with small farms, and filled by free men."

And he further adds on the same occasion:

"Should both Congress and the courts stand in the way of the nation's life, then the red lightning of the people's wrath must consume the recreant who refuses to execute the popular will." * * * "Not even the Constitution must be allowed to hold back the uplifted arm of the Government."

These sentiments are expressed by bold and able men; but they are no longer entitled to be called pioneers. They may have been so in days that have passed, but the majority of those with whom they train are up with them now, and many of them a bow-shot ahead.

It is useless to quote any further, for these sentiments and expressions abound and are to be found on almost every page of your Congressional Debates for the past three years.

Now, sir, what I desire to know is this: if a man in the South is a rebel because he sets the Constitution at defiance and refuses to live under it, and will not consent that the Union shall be restored under the Constitution as it is, what then is a man in the North who swears to support the Constitution, and then declares that the Union shall never be restored under it if he has the power to prevent it? I can find you plenty of such cases on this floor. If one man can say that he will not consent that the Union shall be restored under the Constitution for one reason, why cannot another man say the same thing for another and different reason? If the one is a patriot and the other a traitor, what saves the one and damns the other? Is it the saving grace of negro equality?

Sir, I am sick and tired of this constant agitation of the negro subject. The agitation of that question is the Pandora's box from which has come evil, and only evil. I have no hostility to the poor down-trodden African, and if slavery is dead or dying I shall not be a pall-bearer or mourner at the grave. But I have yet to learn that by all your speeches or votes on the subject you have conferred upon the negro one single, solitary, substantial advantage or benefit. You have taken them from happy homes and sent them wandering vagabonds and outcasts to die of starvation, or be huddled like sheep in contraband camps, there to be fed at the public expense, from the sweat and toil of white people. You have determined that the Union shall not be restored until slavery is abolished, and yet you have never been able to tell what you are going to do with the four million blacks when you have liberated them. You will not send them out of the country. Your experiment with the six hundred that I have referred to settles that question.

I am aware that some of you do entertain the idea that you will ultimately exterminate the fighting men of the South, or expatriate them, confiscate their homes and send their families wandering through the country, after which you hope that a new population will take the place of the present occupants and owners of the soil, and then you expect to see the negro population flourish in all the enjoyment of social and political equality. Sir, this idea is as visionary and as baseless as the fabric of a dream. Why, sir, you do not know the people of the South. If you had the power to overrun the entire South with your Army, and exterminate every soldier under arms to-day in the South, and if you could confiscate their lands and give them to the negroes and to Yankee adventurers, do you suppose that you could possess them in peace? Not a bit of it. At every returning ebb and flow of manhood, as the generations grow up, they would fight you, and they would fight you for a thousand years. You may as well dismiss that idea at once. Then what else can you do? Your scheme to colonize them on the Rio Grande will not work. They would at once become the prey of the avarice and cupidity of the white sharks, who will hang about them as office-seekers or missionary agents. The people of the North will not receive them with the view to making them their equals, politically or socially, although the doctrine of miscegenation is beginning to be popular with the abolitionists. Then what next? Mr. Lincoln says, after much fighting and much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you have the same question before you yet to settle. I may not have given his words, but his ideas and substance I have. Suppose you succeed in forcing the States to liberate their slaves, and you permit them to remain on the soil where they have been born and raised, will not the boasted freedom you give the enfranchised slave after all be merely nominal? Will he not be found in a short time a vassal, a serf, or a peon? To my mind it is clear that he will. There is no philanthropy in your visionary and wicked policy, and the sooner the people see it the better.

Sir, I desire to see this Union restored, and I desire to see it restored on such principles as the South will feel satisfied with, if such a thing is possible. I want no thorns left in the side of the body-politic, but that we may live together as kindred and countrymen should live. I am a plain man, and I represent a plain, honest, and patriotic people—a people whose interest is in the Union, and not out of it. We have been faithful to observe all our constitutional obligations to each and every section of the Union. My people are mainly agricultural, living in the great West, on the Ohio river. They are compelled to have the markets of the South for their surplus produce, and for transportation we are bound to have the free navigation of the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers. The free navigation of these waters is as essential to our material prosperity as the rain that falls on our fertile lands is to the growth of vegetation. And come what may, we never will give up that boon of God to any power on earth while we can float brains, blood, or muscle on the bosom of these great natural thoroughfares.

I have stood by this Administration in all the measures that I have believed would aid in restoring the Union. I have voted to raise men and money for the war. I have voted to lay the burdens of taxation on the people, and my constituents have borne all this uncomplainingly. We have had no other object in view than that the South should be compelled to respect the law and the Constitution. I feel that I have a right to complain when you do not live up to the law and the Constitution yourselves. Sir, who is at fault that we have not put down the armed rebellion, and restored the Union? That now becomes an important question. The fault does not lay with the people, for there never was a people on earth who have supported an administration more faithfully than have the people of the loyal States. The fault is not with the Army, for I maintain that it has accomplished all that it could under the circumstances. It is not the fault of the Democratic party that you have not succeeded, for I put it to you as gentlemen and as men of honor to say whether or not the Democratic party has failed to respond to any call made on them for men or money. Why, sir, in my own State where all have done well, the district the most tardy in responding to the calls for men is the district the most abolitionized—the one represented here by Mr. JULIAN. It is not because you have not had abundant means under your control.

Let us look for one moment at what you have had of men and money. The calls for men may be found to be about as follows, to which the people have promptly responded:

April 16, 1861.....	75,000
May 4, 1861.....	64,748
From July to December, 1861.....	500,000
July 1, 1862.....	300,000
August 4, 1862.....	300,000
Draft, summer of 1863.....	300,000
February 1, 1864.....	500,000
March.....	200,000
April, for one hundred days.....	100,000
Total.....	2,339,748

This is the aggregate of the calls for men in the Army alone, while the naval service foots up as follows, as shown by the recent reports of the Secretary of the Navy:

Vessels in service and building.....	588
Total tonnage.....	498,000
Number of guns.....	4,443
Number of seamen, July 1.....	34,000

The known cost of all this it is impossible fully to state, but the following figures show the loans and liabilities authorized by various acts of Congress:

Loan of 1842.....	$242,621
Loan of 1847.....	9,415,250
Loan of 1848.....	8,908,341
Texas indemnity loan of 1850.....	3,481,000
Loan of 1858.....	20,000,000
Loan of 1860.....	7,622,000
Loan of 1861.....	18,415,000
Treasury notes, March, 1861.....	512,900
Oregon war loan, 1861.....	1,016,000
Another loan of 1861.....	50,000,000
Three years Treasury notes.....	139,679,000
Loan of August, 1861.....	400,000,000
Five-twenty loan.....	104,933,103
Temporary loans.....	155,918,437
Certificates of indebtedness.....	114,115
Unclaimed dividends.....	500,000
Demand Treasury notes.....	397,767,114
Legal tenders, 1862.....	104,969,937
Legal tenders, 1863.....	50,000,000
Postal and fractional currency.....	118,000
Old Treasury notes out-standing.....	900,000,000
Ten-forty bonds.....	500,000,000
Interest-bearing Treasury notes.....
Total.....	$2,774,912,818

This sum is startling, but it will fall but little short, at the end of this year, of four thousand million dollars; and then I have not taken into the account the immense amounts appropriated by States, counties, cities, towns, townships, and individuals. When the entire sum is estimated, it will be more than one half of all the real and personal property of the loyal States, and fully two thirds of all the arms-bearing men in those States. All this vast sum of money and these vast numbers of men have been under the control of one man. What has he done with the nation's blood and treasure? The proudest monarch on earth never had so much power. What are the results? The money is still flowing and the soldier is still bleeding, and the Union is not saved. Taxation increases $3,000,000 a day, and the population of the country is being rapidly wasted away by death and disease. Go to the crowded hospitals and look on those emaciated forms who inhabit them in pain, in sorrow, and in despair. Go to the vast fields of graveyards around this city and all over the country, where dead heroes sleep; view the dark horizon of this awful war in all its frightful aspects; and you will begin to comprehend the responsibility which will attach, in the minds of the people and of future ages, to the party, the faithless, profligate, and corrupt party, now in power.

We see the President openly admitting his infidelity to principle. On a recent occasion he says that he has not controlled circumstances, but that circumstances controlled him. We see him apologizing for his flagrant violations of the Constitution on the ground that his usurpations were dictated by necessity. We see him withholding his proclamation, which is forced by military necessity, as he alleges, until he obtains the success for which it was issued. See the letter of the late Owen Lovejoy to William Lloyd Garrison, published in the Boston Liberator, for the truth of what I say. We see the President at the side-shows of this city, where the Constitution and the old Union are discarded by travail-

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1864.

NEW SERIES. No. 129.

ing, strong-minded women, who talk not about love and mercy, peace on earth and good-will to man, but about copperheads; all manner of wriggling things compared with Democrats; blood; no compromise with traitors, and no Union as our fathers made it; and at the close of the performance he receives a nomination for the Presidency. His ears are constantly made familiar with the teachings of willful disregard for the Constitution, to such an extent that I feel that it is eminently dangerous. See his excellency, too, giving his official sanction to the speech of a notorious disturber of the public peace of this country, that vile enemy of our Constitution, George Thompson, who has been sent here from England to teach Americans their duty in this great struggle. He spoke in this Hall on the evening of the 6th of April, 1864, to the President and Vice President, and, as far as I have been able to learn, to their entire satisfaction. His speech was reported in the official organ of the President, the Daily Morning Chronicle, of this city, on the morning of the 7th, from which I will read an extract or two, to show its character and the character of the man:

"Not only is the North awake, but free! Always a giant, she was long bound by constitutional cords; but now she is free to put forth her strength. No constitutional obligations fetter her. No three-fifths clause sends members to this House to defeat justice and give added power to slavery. No rendition clause now prevents her from fulfilling the divine command. The only domestic insurrection the President is now called upon to put down is that which was hatched in the bosom of the Constitution, against which it now directs its poisoned and malignant fangs; and, in this good work, the people of the North are with him, to sustain and aid him until the entire brood of serpents, copperheads and all, are banished from the soil." [Great cheering.]

"Within the last three or four years it may be said, almost literally, (with regard to the United States,) that a nation has been born again in the cause of freedom. [Great applause.] That noble martyr of liberty, John Brown, [cheers,] the hero of Harper's Ferry, [cheers,] by his magnanimous devotion and death, sent a thrill of new life to the nation's heart of hearts. [Cheers.] The moral electricity of that grand human soul not only galvanized the dead bones of social rottenness in the South, [laughter and applause,] but awakened to new life and to new hope the drooping spirits of the North. [Cheers.] Had it not been for John Brown's immolation on the altar of liberty and patriotism, honest Abraham Lincoln could not have been President of the Union, [cheers,] and thus be enabled to become the second deliverer of the nation. [Cheers.] And had not Mr. Lincoln been elected, the cause of negro emancipation would have gone backward, probably, for half a century. [So! and applause.] It was the time and crisis of the nation's utmost social, political, and moral need, and the providence of God, blessing the efforts of good men, raised up a man who had a heart, a conscience, and a soul above the tricks of politicians and the subtleties of diplomacy." [Cheers.]

He tells the President that had it not been for that old murderer, John Brown, he could not have been elected President. A high compliment to be paid by a hired Englishman to the President of the United States! I wonder that his cheeks did not burn under such compliments from such a source. Sir, he is indeed the creature of circumstances; and if he is honest he is to be pitied. Taking that view of his case, I will commend to him a chapter in the History of Rome by Gibbon. That historian describes the character of a wise old prince who had resigned the crown after having faithfully served the people, and who, when in his retirement, in answer to those who desired to see him again on the throne, would repeatedly say:

"It is the interest of four or five ministers to combine together to deceive their sovereign; secluded from mankind by his exalted dignity, the truth is concealed from his knowledge; he can see only with their eyes; he hears nothing but their misrepresentations; he confers the most important office on vice and weakness, and disregards the most virtuous and deserving among his subjects. By such infamous arts the best and wisest princes are sold to the venal corruption of their courtiers."

Is not all that was said by that old Roman true of the President to-day, save the "exalted dignity?" Does he not confer the most important office on vice and weakness? And does he not disregard the most virtuous and deserving? Is merit rewarded by him? Are men not entirely ignored because of their modesty and good breeding, which forbid them thrusting themselves before him daily? Is he not sold to the venal corruptions of his courtiers? All, and much more, is true.

Mr. Speaker, is the attention of the people not yet arrested nor their anxiety aroused? Are they not startled at the monstrous strides that have been made toward centralized and despotic power? Three years of this Administration have passed over us; three years of mournful and bloody war have been suffered and endured by the people; three years we have been here legislating in the midst of a great military camp; our ears are never relieved from the sound of the drum or the tramp of armed men; and what have we accomplished? By sales of southern lands for taxes, by confiscation, and by a policy for the management of abandoned estates, the Administration and its favored supporters are acquiring the control of the lands of the South, and the Government is attempting to cultivate these lands thus secured to the Government under a system of overseership, adopting slavery by the wholesale, all under the control of executive favor. We have on our statute-book a law suspended but for one year, which taxes real estate of all kinds at the North, with a provision for the forfeiture to the Government of all real estate on which the taxes are not promptly paid. As a matter of course farms forfeited will have to be cultivated, and the system adopted at the South may and probably will be adopted at the North. It will, under this central power, be easy to select that class of labor best suited to the notion of radicals who may prefer the introduction of miscegenation.

The President now controls an army more powerful than the world ever saw. He dispenses a patronage more universal than ever corrupted any people. The enormous sums of money he controls are counted by the thousands of millions, and to make his power absolute a system of national banks is established, centering in the hands of his appointees the custody of millions that are to be used to control the trade, the commerce, and the business of the country.

What more is there to wait for to arouse our fears? If the Administration is seizing the lands, the sword, and the purse, and the enormous patronage and the banking machinery, what more can be added to its power to alarm the people? But we are not allowed to stop at this point. By the President's proclamation, which was delivered with his last message, he assumes the power to reconstruct States, to modify their constitutions, and prescribes the qualifications of voters; a power not exercised by Congress, not allowed but forbidden by the Constitution; a monstrous usurpation of the rights of the States. If all these rights of the States and the people are centralized in one man, and the people acquiesce, what more can I add to define a centralized despotism?

Sir, in my whole course here as a Representative I have been guided by a sincere and earnest sense of duty. I have at all times and under all circumstances endeavored to strengthen and uphold the hands of those who were endeavoring to uphold the Constitution. I came here with high hopes that an enlightened, conservative policy would be pursued that would speedily give us union and peace. This was all that was needed, as I have shown. The people were ready and anxious to do their part. But step by step the prosecution of this war has been loaded by measures of a purely partisan character until now the country is staggering and reeling under their weight like a drunken man. Sir, I shall no longer hope for relief at the hands of the madmen who now rule the ship of State. They are in mutiny against their great commander, the Constitution. They have proven false to all their oaths, to every promise. They have made a mockery of their obligations to law, liberty, and union. They talk much about the life of the nation. They themselves are destroying it with fearful rapidity. They are preying on its vitals like hungry vultures. I turn from them and their party insanity in this hour of our deepest peril to their master and sovereign as well as mine—the people. In them I yet have faith. I yet believe in man's capacity for self-government. But if the people would preserve republican institutions in this land, if they would bequeath liberty to their children, if they would save the dear and blessed Union of our fathers, let them awake at once to the dangers which are upon us. There is not an hour to lose. If this summer be past and our Union is not saved we may look for a day of darker gloom than ever settled down on any nation. Financial ruin, anarchy, and civil commotion in the North, popular discouragement and discredit and chaos everywhere. If this miserable fate is to be avoided it can only be done by a change in the administration of our public affairs. My hope and trust and prayer to God is that the people will be warned by the fatal calamities that are just impending over them, and that they will rally to the rescue; that they will in November next elevate to the Chief Magistracy one who loves his country above party, who loves his own race better than the inferior African, who cherishes liberty regulated by law, and who, when he has taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, will not repudiate it with mockery and jest whenever his partisan schemes require it.

There must, in my candid judgment, be a change, or ruin and disaster will as certainly overwhelm us as that darkness follows the light when the sun has disappeared at night. I speak not as a partisan. I have no feeling except to save my country. I can safely appeal to my whole course on this floor and at home before my constituents in confirmation of that fact. But my confidence in the salvation of this country by the party now in power is all gone. Whatever of hope I have left, lies in a free ballot-box and an intelligent and virtuous people. I will trust to a brave army in the field. They may be wielded by wicked, political aspirants for a brief season, but they will not at last, when the truth reaches them, fail to see the true issue. They went to fight for the Union, and the Union alone. They love their country, and their whole country, and nothing else in this contest. They want no side issues. They did not go into the Army to elevate the negro, make him a voter, and place him on an equality with themselves, at the expense of their own blood so freely shed on so many fields of battle. Let the soldier have light on these questions and I do not fear the result. I feel that I have a right to speak thus for the soldier, for no one has ever dared to question my devotion to his interest, here and everywhere. Those who have gone to the field from my district and State without regard to party have been followed in an especial manner by my love and care.

I would call then upon the people, I would call upon the Army, I would call on all honest men everywhere, I would call on the Lord to combine, if it is His will, all the elements of national strength for the good of the country and the preservation of the Union. It is in danger from traitors North and South. There are false men in power in Washington as well as in Richmond. Let them all be crushed in both sections and the day of our deliverance will soon dawn. I am determined to stand on the deck of the old ship while there is a plank above the waves. I have spoken freely and candidly my views on the issues that now face us, and I have spoken on the very eve of that great battle which is to shake the world to its center. The long roll is about to sound in camp on the Rapidan, if it has not this day sounded, which will call the three hundred thousand warriors that are now waiting on their arms to the work of death. May God direct the issue for the good of humanity, and save the country.

Mr. PERHAM obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. BOUTWELL, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at ten o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of men and women of Hartford, Oneida county, New York, praying for the abolition of slavery, and for such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any part of the Union; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. FOSTER presented the petition of Mary C. Hamilton, widow of Captain Fowler Hamilton, United States Army, deceased, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a memorial of medical officers in the United States service, praying for an increase in the rank and pay of medical directors of Army corps and of surgeons serving under bonds as medical purveyors, equal to that of chief quartermasters and commissaries of Army corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the establishment of steam lines between the United States and the most important commercial marts of the world; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 177) to authorize the construction of a street railway in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it adversely.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 264) for the disposal of coal lands, and of town property in the public domain; which was read and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 160) granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin, reported a recommendation that the Senate agree thereto. The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives; and they were agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 383) to incorporate the "home for friendless women and children," reported it adversely.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the petition of George B. Simpson, inventor of the submarine telegraph cable insulated with gutta percha, praying that he may be remunerated for his invention, or that the Commissioner of Patents may be authorized to rehear his claim, and adjudicate it upon its merits, reported adversely thereon.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the action of the House of Representatives on the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1865, have instructed me to move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the text of the original bill proposed by the House of Representatives, which is the substitution of one word for another which entirely changes the sense, the word "Army" having been inserted in a clause of the original bill in place of "arms," which would limit the operation of the appropriation very much, and embarrass the Department. In regard to the amendments of the Senate, in one of which the House of Representatives non-concurs, the committee recommend that the Senate insist on its original amendment. Then there are several amendments concurred in with amendments. The committee recommend that the Senate disagree to these amendments of the House of Representatives, insist on our amendments, and ask for a conference on these subjects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives to the original text of the bill, which is on page 7, line eight, to strike out "Army" and insert "arms," and to insert a comma after "accouterments."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is further moved that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to its own amendments, and insist on its own amendments, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. HENDERSON were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 265) to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUORUM.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very anxious to obtain the decision of the Senate on the question of a quorum in order to expedite business; and that is a privileged question, according to the decision of the late Presiding Officer of the Senate. I trust the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to submit a motion that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the resolution concerning a quorum of the Senate, and that we may settle that question this morning. I do it simply to expedite business. I think if we adopt that resolution it will enable the Senator to get rid of his bill much better, and enable us to dispose much better of all the business of the Senate. I will submit that motion, with his consent.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the question is taken, I simply wish to say that that resolution has been considered in the Committee on the Judiciary, and that an expression of opinion adverse to its passage has been expressed by a majority approaching to unanimity in the committee. At the last meeting of the committee prior to the absence of the chairman in consequence of the ill health of his family it was discussed, and as it was not supposed that the Senate were in special haste in regard to the matter it was laid by until another meeting of the committee, which will occur tomorrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. In making the motion I did not wish for a moment to reflect on the Judiciary Committee. I knew that the chairman of the committee was detained from the Senate by sickness in his family; I believe by the death of one member of his family and the sickness of another; and another member of the committee is also absent. I therefore made the motion in order to expedite the business of the Senate, without any desire to trouble the Senate with any longer discussion on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offered a series of resolutions which were referred to the committee. I ask for the reading of the first resolution, which is the only one upon which I now desire action. I do not wish to delay the Senate by taking up the others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on postponing all prior orders and taking up the resolution for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 7th of March last:

Resolved, That a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen or qualified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read the clause of the Constitution upon which this whole matter turns. It is the first clause of the third section of the first article:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote."

The only question is whether a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of those duly chosen by the Legislatures of the States, or whether it consists of a majority of all who by possibility may be elected members of the Senate. I think the grammatical construction is perfectly plain. The Senate is to consist of "two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof;" but until a person is chosen by the Legislature he is not a Senator and cannot be counted. The grammatical construction is so plain that I cannot add to it. Can a man be a Senator until he is chosen by the State Legislature? That is all I wish to say about the grammatical construction.

As regards the precedents, they have been both ways. The honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOOT], in the very able argument that he made on this subject during the last Congress, introduced most of the precedents. I am not going over those precedents, but of the first two precedents that were introduced by him, one was for and the other against his position. I have them now before me. The second one I will read:

"January 4, 1790. There being twelve States entitled to twenty-four members, of whom twelve appeared on 6th January; and were considered a quorum."

Twelve are not a majority of twenty-four, but they were considered a quorum.

"But it is supposed that the seat of one of the Senators of Virginia [Mr. Grayson] had been vacated by his death, the date of which is not stated, but his successor was appointed 31st March, 1790."

Showing that in this case, the second time the question ever came before the Senate, a majority of those elected were considered a quorum. As twenty-four was the number that could be elected, twelve were considered a quorum. There being one vacancy, the number was reduced to twenty-three, and twelve were a majority of those elected.

But again, the Constitution uses precisely the same language in regard to the House of Representatives. The first clause of the second section of the first article provides:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States," &c.

The language is precisely the same; but the House of Representatives have definitely settled this matter. Upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair, by an almost unanimous vote they have declared that the majority of those chosen or elected members of that House constituted a quorum. Here is the action of the House of Representatives upon precisely the same language, which is a precedent to some extent.

But I think the Senate decided this question substantially for itself by a very important vote, to which, by the way, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee called my attention, and told me it would probably influence his vote on the subject; and that is a vote which was taken on the 2d of March, 1861. It will be remembered that Congress at that time passed a resolution proposing a certain amendment to the Constitution of the United States. When that resolution was under consideration in the Senate, the point was made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] that it required two thirds of the whole Senate to concur in the proposed amendment.

"Mr. TRUMBULL raised a question of order whether, the joint resolution being a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, it did not require an affirmative vote of two thirds of the members composing the Senate."

The language of the Constitution upon which this point was raised is this:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution," &c.

The question was, whether "two thirds of both Houses" did not require two thirds of all that could by possibility be in the Senate or House of Representatives. The point was distinctly raised, and the Senate by an almost unanimous vote—by a vote of 33 yeas to 1 nay—decided that it only required two thirds of those present.

I say then, Mr. President, on the ground of grammatical construction, on the ground of precedent, and I might add on the ground of necessity, the construction I put upon the Constitution is the plain one. The framers of the Government never intended that their schemes should be broken up and this Government disorganized by the absence of the representatives of some of the States caused by death, secession, or anything of that kind. We are now just in that critical condition when we cannot call for a division on a question. We are afraid to call for a division, we are afraid to take the sense of the Senate, for fear we shall be left without a quorum. At five o'clock last night on the passage of an important bill we were left without a quorum. Under these circumstances I deem it my duty to bring the question to the attention of the Senate with the hope that we may now have a vote upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not about to detain the Senate from the vote which the honorable Senator from Ohio wishes to have taken. I expressed my views briefly on this subject at a former session, and am not now disposed to repeat them. They would not be strengthened by repetition. I may be wrong certainly (and when I differ from the honorable Senator from Ohio perhaps the presumption is that I am wrong) in my construction of the Constitution. The general ground, however, on which he puts it, to wit, the necessity of the case, I submit to him with great confidence does not by any means exist, nor will the change of the quorum obviate the evils of which he complains. He says that we adjourned last evening at five o'clock for want of a quorum. It is true; but there were several members either in the Capitol or within call of the Capitol at the time. We have a few times during this session been compelled to adjourn for want of a quorum, and but a very few times only—fewer either this session or the last for that reason than any previous session since I have been a member of the Senate. Since our members have been diminished we have had what I deem a constitutional quorum present during a longer period of each day than at any period prior to our diminution of numbers by the failure of States to elect Senators.

If we make the change asked for by the Senator from Ohio, what will be the consequence? A smaller number will make a quorum; what then? Every member will then feel, what he does not now feel, that he may be away from his seat in the Senate, not perhaps absolutely with impunity, but still he can go without the risk which attaches to him if he goes now. A heavy responsibility is now felt by every Senator for himself, if he be qualified as our States have said we are qualified for seats in this body, but he will feel that responsibility diminished when this change is made, and he will not be by any means as likely to be in his seat as he now is, and we shall have fewer members present than we have now. In my judgment it will be more difficult to obtain a quorum when the quorum is reduced to the number which the Senator from Ohio says is the proper constitutional quorum than it is now. It will be more troublesome to find that number here on a vote than it is to find the constitutional number under the present rule on a vote now. The more the responsibility is divided the less it is felt. On that ground, therefore, if there were no other, I should insist upon following the rule which I believe has been uniformly adhered to from the foundation of the Government, unless possibly there may be one or two exceptions, fixing the quorum on the principle I contend for, at the number which it is now held to be. I will not, however, as I suggested, occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I will respectfully suggest to the honorable Senator from Ohio that he make this subject the special order for some early day, when it can receive more consideration than it can receive this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. In reply, I will only say that this whole question depends simply upon the construction of two clauses of the Constitution, and it has been now before the Senate for three years. I have not pressed it. It has been discussed and conversed about a great deal, and I believe the Senate are ready to vote upon it. I think the adoption of this resolution will expedite our business, and at the same time we shall come to the correct constitutional rule. It is due to the Senate that we should settle the question one way or the other at once. If the Senate decide against it now I shall never bring the question up again. All I want is to have the vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not make the suggestion from any desire to protract or put off unnecessarily or wantonly the consideration and decision of this question; but it strikes me that it is one of the most important that has ever come, or can ever come, before Congress. I am aware that it has been discussed heretofore. I listened with great pleasure and instruction to the elaborate and able speeches of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FOOT] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] on this subject during the last Congress. I think it important to every member of the Senate, whether he heard those debates or not, and especially to the new members of the Senate who have taken their seats in the body since those debates took place, that they should be reproduced; that the able and satisfactory reasons against this proposition presented in those debates by the gentlemen whom I have named, as well as others, should be again presented to the Senate. I do not desire to have the discussion protracted. I should be perfectly willing to hear a few gentlemen who have investigated and who understand the subject present their views, and then, so far as I am concerned, that the Senate shall take a vote upon it. But to press to a vote this morning, on a few minutes' consideration, so important a question as this, involving the number of Senators that under the present condition of circumstances may constitute a quorum to do business, it seems to me would be precipitating one of the most important inquiries in which this body can be engaged. I suppose no gentleman expected this subject to come up for debate this morning, unless it was the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave notice of it yesterday.

Mr. DAVIS. I am aware that the gentleman called it up yesterday; but I had not myself thought that it would be brought up for debate this morning. If the gentleman will consent to let it go over until to-morrow morning, I shall have no objection to its consideration then and to a prompt decision of the question by the Senate. My object is not delay; but I merely want the arguments for and against this important proposition again reproduced and presented in a concise form to the Senate and the country. I suggest that it be postponed to and made the special order for to-morrow at a quarter after twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky submit that motion?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to and made the special order for to-morrow at a quarter after twelve o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am never disposed to press any gentleman to a vote on a question when he is not prepared for it; and at the suggestion of some Senators around me, with the understanding that the resolution be made the special order for to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, I will consent to a postponement.

Mr. HOWE. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is to postpone it until a quarter after twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to agree to that; but I hope we shall then dispose of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOWE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin, the pending question being on the adoption of the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I do not suppose it is possible to call the attention of Senators to this question, although it involves a great deal of money. I noticed yesterday when the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] was speaking, that, with the exception of the Senators from Wisconsin, I believe I was the only Senator who attended to what he said, so that the argument on that side of the question was not heard, and I presume this will fare no better. Still, I feel inclined to do what I can to call the attention of the Senate to it a little further.

It is true that the Territory of Wisconsin organized a company to open a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river; and that company was authorized to apply to Congress to get a grant of land for the purpose of aiding in opening that canal. The Congress of the United States, it seems from the act granting this land, were of opinion that it was advisable to do it for the benefit of the United States, as well as for the benefit of the canal company itself. They expected to derive a benefit from it in two ways: first, in having the canal for use; and in the next place, probably, in increasing the value of their land. They granted, therefore, the alternate sections of land, and made these provisions:

"Provided, That the said canal, when completed, and the branches thereof, shall be and forever remain a public highway, for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or other charge whatever for any property of the United States, or persons in their service, passing through the same: Provided, That said main canal shall be commenced within three years, and completed in ten years, or the United States shall be entitled to receive the amount for which any of said land may have been previously sold, and that the title to purchasers under the Territory shall be valid."

Thus the United States parted with the land and made a provision to secure to themselves the results of the sale of the land if the canal was not completed within ten years. It seems from these two provisos that the United States were induced to grant these lands for the benefit that they expected to derive in using the canal free for their own purposes, and made it a condition that they should receive back the money for which the lands might be sold if the canal was not commenced within three years and finished within ten. Then, in the sixth section, they further provide:

"That the said State of Wisconsin"—

Not yet a State at that time—

"shall be held responsible to the United States, and for the payment into the Treasury thereof, of the amount of all moneys received upon the sale of the whole or any part of said lands, at the price at which the same shall be sold, not less than $2.50 per acre, if the said main canal shall not be commenced within three years and completed within ten years, pursuant to the provisions of the act creating said canal corporation."

And then came the seventh section:

"That, in order to render efficient the provisions of this act, the Legislature of the State to be erected or admitted out of the territory now comprised in Wisconsin Territory, east of the Mississippi, shall give their assent to the same by act to be duly passed."

It is contended here that as the State of Wisconsin never did give its "assent to the same by act" of the Legislature, it is therefore not at all responsible, and the report is predicated upon that idea. The simple facts as I understand them were these: the Territory of Wisconsin became under that act substantially the trustee of these lands; it went on and made sales; individuals connected with the corporation put into the work a certain amount of their own funds; they were to receive the benefit. It seems, however, from the statements made, about which there is no dispute, that after a while the Territory became rather tired of the business and was disposed to appropriate these lands to its own use to stop the operation, and a petition was sent to Congress substantially to that effect, but Congress under a report—a very able one, as has been properly said—made by the present Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] then a member of the House of Representatives, which demonstrated the injustice of that proceeding so far as the canal was concerned and those who were interested in its construction, decided against that application, and the project fell through. The territorial authorities, however, according to the statement, about which I suppose there is no dispute, went on and sequestered the proceeds of these lands, so far as the sales were concerned, to the use of the Territory, but they did it under certain resolutions passed by them which are stated at length in the report. I will read them:

"Resolved by the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Wisconsin, That the receiver of the canal lands shall pay over to the treasurer of the Territory all moneys which may arise from any sale of the canal lands, except the sum which shall be required to defray the expenses of the sale, and the said treasurer is hereby authorized to receive the same; and the said treasurer of the Territory of Wisconsin is hereby required to execute to the Governor of the Territory and his successors in office, for the use of the Territory or future State of Wisconsin, a bond in the penal sum of $50,000, to be approved by the Governor, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties as treasurer.

"Resolved, That the money thus received into the treasury of the Territory shall be liable for all debts due from said Territory, and the said treasurer is hereby authorized to pay and discharge the same in the same manner and for the same purposes as any other money in said treasury.

"Resolved, That the money so received shall be liable to be, and so much thereof as shall be necessary is hereby, appropriated to the payment of the expenses of holding the convention to form a constitution for the State of Wisconsin the current year, and may be paid out in such manner as the convention shall provide.

"Resolved, That the faith of the Territory and future State of Wisconsin is hereby pledged to repay to the said canal fund the sum which shall be diverted in pursuance of the above resolutions to the purposes aforesaid, whenever the same shall be required to be repaid, for the purpose of executing the trust created by Congress in making the 'canal grant,' and all laws contravening these are hereby repealed."

The report and the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Indiana draw a distinction between the Territory and the State of Wisconsin. They assume that the State is not liable under the act of 1838, because it never passed the act assuming this obligation on which alone it was to be liable. That may dispose of the obligation technically under the sixth section of that act; but then the question arises what the equitable claim is first between the State which has received these funds and the Congress of the United States; and then, what the obligation is between the corporation and Congress, representing the Government, which has parted with its party for a specific purpose. I am unable, so far as this equitable obligation is concerned, to see the distinction that is attempted to be drawn in the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana, between the Territory and the State. With a change of name, it is the same person. The money was received by the Territory and went to the benefit of the Territory; consequently it went to the benefit of the State when the State became such, and the distinction that is attempted to be drawn, although it may apply to the technical law, is very misplaced, so far as it applies to the equity of the case, I think.

I cannot on any principle understand how the State which was made out of the Territory, and which has through the Territory received all the benefits of the fund, is to be distinguished from the Territory itself. It is introducing what to me would seem to be a new principle. It may be illustrated in this way: if I incur a pecuniary obligation by the receipt of money belonging to another person, and go to the Legislature and get my name changed, the equitable obligation remains on me no longer to pay the money, according to the argument! I cannot understand the force of it. But here in these resolutions under which this fund was appropriated and perverted to other purposes, taken out and used, is a specific obligation to pay back to the canal fund the money that they thus perverted—for what purpose? because that is left out of the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana—for the purpose of executing the trust; that is, completing the canal, and not to appropriate it for any other purpose, or to repay it for any other purpose.

I am merely stating the facts, and all the arguments, in my judgment, arise on the facts stated. Then the question arises: this money having been thus appropriated, Wisconsin applied to be admitted as a State, and in her application to be admitted as a State she asked permission to sell the portion of these lands which were unsold, and to use the proceeds for certain specific purposes, and to have them counted as a part of her five hundred thousand acres of land granted by the act of 1841, and to appropriate the five per cent. fund for the use of schools. Congress was asked to assent to that arrangement and Congress gave its assent. It was a petition of the State itself that it might be so, as one of the articles of admission. What did Congress say? They say they do assent to it, but they say in assenting:

"Provided, That the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin under the act entitled 'An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river,' hereinbefore referred to, shall be paid and discharged by the State of Wisconsin."

Now, the argument is that when we passed that, all the obligation that was upon the Territory was simply to repay the amount of money that might be due to the canal company, to repay what they had advanced; that whatever the individual stockholders had put in should be repaid to them, and that they should be freed entirely from the obligation to complete the canal; that no one was to account to the Government for the money received from the sale of the lands, when the express language of the resolution of the Territory was that the fund diverted should be repaid for the purpose of completing the contract that was entered into; and now the State of Wisconsin having received the money, having sold the land, having put the money into her treasury, comes forward here and says substantially: "The obligation of the Territory was just to make good to these stockholders what they may have expended, and to make nothing good to the Government of the United States, arising from the fact that the canal has never been completed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. What is the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the joint resolution appropriating $25,000,000 to pay for one hundred days' volunteers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it is hardly worth while to defer that; I suppose we can take a vote on it at once.

Mr. HOWE. Let this be settled. I move to postpone the unfinished business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not the slightest objection to going on, and so far as I am personally concerned I should prefer to finish what I have to say now; but in regard to the question which was up yesterday on which we were taking the yeas and nays and the Senate were dividing on the main question, I think it is best to settle that.

Mr. HARLAN. I would prefer that the Senator from Maine be permitted to make his argument, but I do not wish the vote to be taken on the main question to-day. I desire to examine the joint resolution as I have not yet had an opportunity to do, and I therefore move that the previous order be passed over informally until the Senator from Maine concludes his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The Senator from Maine will proceed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to add nothing in reference to this matter, but to state the facts as I understand them, because I think they present a case that it is really impossible to have any misunderstanding about. Bear in mind the argument of the Senator from Indiana is founded upon the idea that the faith of the Territory and the future State of Wisconsin, when they took this money, was only pledged to make good what might be lost by the stockholders of the company, but the pledge is that it shall be repaid "for the purpose of executing the trust created by Congress." What other interest had Congress in making this large grant of land than to have the trust executed, than to have the canal made for the general benefit? That is all the interest Congress had in it. It gave this land under specific conditions, and for that single and sole purpose, so far as Congress was concerned, that the United States might have the benefit of the canal; and when the Territory, which was the trustee, appropriated the money it was under that specific pledge to repay it all, (because it could give a good title to the lands,) for the purpose of executing the trust; and when the State of Wisconsin came in the provision was that "the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin, under the act entitled 'An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory,' &c., shall be paid and discharged by the State of Wisconsin." Although the State of Wisconsin never passed an act to accept the liability imposed by the sixth section of the act of 1838, she took the money and put it into her treasury; and I contend that under any state of circumstances that is an equitable waiver, and when she comes to us, the party that granted the money, and asks us to give it to her simply because she did not accept that act, I think we may first say to her, "If you ask us to refund, we insist that you perform the obligation which you ought to have assumed by the act of your Legislature before we do it."

That, then, is the simple state of the case as it stands on the action of the several bodies in relation to the matter as I understand it. When the State of Wisconsin was admitted, the usual grants were made of five hundred thousand acres of land for general purposes, and also five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands. The canal never was completed; the State of Wisconsin appropriated the money; the affair broke down; the ten years expired. It is nearly twenty years since the State was admitted, and more than twenty years since the grant was made. Nothing has been done; the canal has been abandoned; the Government has derived no benefit from it. May not the Government well assume, when acting with the Territory of Wisconsin, which sold this land, and with the State of Wisconsin which has received the benefit of it, and which has assumed the obligations of the Territory, that they would see that the trust was executed? I apprehend that was the natural conclusion to which the Government of the United States must come. But the argument is, that inasmuch as the United States allowed the State of Wisconsin to put itself in the place of the Territory without passing an act of the Legislature on the subject, therefore, notwithstanding the Government have derived no benefit, they are substantially to lose the benefit of the lands which they had thus given. It is said, and a large portion of the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana has been predicated upon this idea, that it would be very unfair, and he has argued it at length, to take this money away from those individuals who are entitled to receive a certain portion for what they had expended, as it has been misappropriated. There is no dispute about that. The only question is, who shall pay them? We say that the State of Wisconsin having misappropriated the money, having taken it to herself, put it into her treasury, stopped the work, not completed it, shall do what was said to be her bounden duty, make good the loss to the stockholders, and pay the price of the lands which she has received to the United States. But the State of Wisconsin says, "No, they shall be paid out of the proceeds of the lands estimated at one half the value fixed in the original act," which is $1 25 instead of $2 50 an acre.

The Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company put in a certain amount of their own funds unquestionably into this work. The Territory of Wisconsin misappropriated this money and prevented their going on with the work and deriving a benefit from it; but when they did so they said, by the very resolution which they passed in order to accomplish it, that it was their duty to pay these men back this money for the purpose of completing the work, certainly within the time limited—ten years—and hand it over to them, so that it might be done and they might get the benefit of the grant. Then they came to Congress, as I said before, and petitioned Congress to allow them to appropriate it to other purposes. Congress said, "You may appropriate it to other purposes provided you assume all the obligations of the Territory;" that is to say, to hand over this money so as to have the canal completed within the ten years. And now, because Congress agreed to that proposition of the State of Wisconsin the State of Wisconsin comes forward and says, "You waived all your rights against us, and are no longer entitled to call upon us to do anything, but we will appropriate this money to a certain extent." This resolution is very curiously drawn. It is not drawn upon the principles of the report at all; because, if the State of Wisconsin is correct in the position that we waived our rights the whole of this fund should be given up. Of that I do not propose to speak.

But the main question is here: the Territory of Wisconsin took this money and agreed when they took it to pay it over for the purpose of completing the canal; the State of Wisconsin agreed by a proviso to the bill admitting the State into the Union to assume all these obligations; they did not perform the obligation; the canal was not built; and now the State comes forward and says, "It is your duty to pay all these advances and losses of this company out of this very fund which, by our obligation, we ought to pay back to you, never having completed the canal at all." That is the simple proposition, as I understand it; and if anything more or less can be made out of it, I should like to hear it done.

Let us look a little at the logic of this report:

"The next question that arises is, what are the obligations in equity on the part of the United States and of the State of Wisconsin toward the canal company growing out of the grant of lands for the benefit of that company? The company was organized under the hope of obtaining the land grant. That hope was excited by the provisions of the act of incorporation, and was realized in the grant. The grant was unimpaired, and, in connection with the stock subscriptions, was at the time believed to be sufficient to secure the completion of the canal. In the event of the construction of the work, the stock of individual subscribers would have been of value. Induced, no doubt, by the expectation of receiving dividends, or that the State, pursuant to the provisions of the charter and of the act of Congress making the grant, would purchase the stock, paying its par value with interest, individuals subscribed stock and paid their money, which was used in a partial construction of the work. Then the territorial government disregarded the trust and diverted the fund, and subsequently the United States and the State of Wisconsin acquiesced therein, and by their action the State received and enjoyed, for another purpose, the granted lands, so far as they remained unsold. Thus, by the action of the territorial government, in diverting the canal fund, and by the action of Congress and the State of Wisconsin in diverting the unsold canal lands, the means were withdrawn whereby the canal might have been built and the stock rendered of value, or the stock with interest have been paid for, and thus the company and the stockholders were prevented the enjoyment of a benefit which they had a right to expect under the acts of the Territorial Legislature and of Congress. The corporation did not assent to this, but, on the contrary, earnestly protested against it."

I agree to all that; but who shall pay it? The United States agreed, at the request of Wisconsin, to let Wisconsin take the money, but said to the State, "You shall perform these obligations." It is not the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company that comes forward and asks relief of us, but the State of Wisconsin, that refuses to pay over this money and relieve these men from any obligation she had assumed, is the applicant. This argument would be a very good one, as addressed to our equitable considerations, if it was an argument in favor of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company; but it happens to be that it is in favor of the State of Wisconsin, which was bound to pay this money, and now comes forward and asks us to pay it out of the money which should properly come back to us. The argument, therefore, is addressed to us in favor of a trustee that has not performed its duty, or rather a promisor who has not performed its promise, but calls on the Government to perform it. That is the simple statement of the matter.

It is very singular, that this claim should have rested for such a long series of years with no application made in relation to it, and should come upon us just at this time when we want all the money we have got.

How does this matter come up in this way? It seems that Wisconsin, like all the other new States, was allowed the five per cent. on the sales of the public lands; but the Land Office has a rule that it pursues in all these cases. If a State has received more than it is entitled to receive, as the Government has no remedy against a State and cannot sue a State, if the Land Office has funds in its hands belonging to that State, it makes a practice of holding on to those funds in order to secure the liquidation of the obligation due to the Government; that is, to make itself good. Now, here is an obligation on the part of the State of Wisconsin, an equitable obligation, to say the least of it, to pay over all these proceeds within a reasonable time for the purpose of having this canal completed. The State of Wisconsin declines or neglects to do so, and the canal is not completed. All the benefit which the United States was to receive from it is lost. Then the State of Wisconsin comes forward and claims to receive this money without performing its obligations. The Government of the United States says, "No, we will hold on to this five per cent. until you have paid us what, under the equity of the act, to say nothing of the technical legal ground, you were to pay us in case the canal was not completed." That is the difficulty which this joint resolution seeks to avoid.

With reference to the perfect legality of that proceeding of the Land Office, I have here, but I will not trouble the Senate by reading it, an opinion given by Attorney General Cushing. An opinion had previously been given by Mr. Crittenden, I think, to the same effect; that it was perfectly legal and right on the part of the Government to take that money.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Crittenden's opinion was the other way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought it was the same way. It is so stated in the letter I have here. I have not read the opinion.

Why, sir, if we yield here to Wisconsin we shall be obliged to yield in other cases. The State of Iowa I understand has received more lands than she was entitled to receive, and her fund, or a portion of it, is held on to in precisely the same way. I believe there are some other States that are in the same condition. Now, if the Government is to be unpaid, if States that receive by accident more than they are entitled to are not to account for it because they cannot be sued and we cannot hold on to any funds we may happen to have arising out of land sales belonging to them, that is one thing; but it strikes me it is perfectly legal and proper that this course should be pursued. Certainly it is the only one that will secure the interest of the United States under circumstances of this description.

With regard to the particular provisions of this resolution, it provides substantially—and, as I said before, I cannot see upon what ground it should provide anything on the principles of the report that has been made to the Senate—that these lands are to be accounted for to the United States at the rate of $1 25 per acre, and so much more as they were actually sold for. The original provision was that if the canal was not built they should be accounted for at the rate of $2 50 an acre; and that is the way, as I understand it, that the account is actually made up as against the State of Wisconsin. If there is any equity or any reason arising out of the circumstances of the case from the sales, &c., why the amount should be diminished for which they are to account, that is another question which I do not feel disposed to interfere with. Other gentlemen can judge much better than I can in regard to that. I think the Commissioner of Public Lands, in a communication which I have before me in relation to this subject, states the whole case very fairly. He gives the proceedings of the Government and the principle on which the matter is settled, and he says it might be just not to charge them so much as $2 50 an acre under the circumstances. That may be so. However, I do not feel disposed to argue that.

What I contend against is, that the State of Wisconsin should on the principles of this report, which seem to be most singular to me, undertake to say that it is under no obligations whatever to the Government of the United States, and that the Government of the United States are under obligation, out of this money which the State of Wisconsin has received and appropriated to other purposes, to pay these stockholders of the canal company the amount they had invested in it, when the Government of the United States has utterly failed by the action of the Territory and the State to get one dollar of value for all this "munificent donation," as it is called in the report, that was made to the Territory of Wisconsin.

I intended, as I said before, to merely state the case as I understood it, without consuming time by arguing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now call up the order of the day.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Chair indulge me in making this simple remark? This resolution will go over now, I understand, at the request of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN.] I wish to say to him and to all other Senators who have taken any interest in this matter, that I wish they would examine the resolution by to-morrow, so that there need be no occasion for a further postponement. I want the Senate to understand the subject thoroughly, and I want them to be prepared to act upon it the next time we get it up.

ONE HUNDRED DAYS' WESTERN VOLUNTEERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the order of the day, which is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) for the payment of volunteers called out for not less than one hundred days. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say a single word on this subject, as I stand somewhat peculiarly related to it, having spoken against it and shall now probably vote for it. My opinions are strong and decided as to the impolicy of this measure. In my judgment it is an unwise one. But I find that very many gentlemen with whom I ordinarily act, and whose judgment I generally regard with great deference, to wit, my two friends from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and others, entertaining substantially, as some of them have expressed, the same views on the subject that I do, notwithstanding that is their private opinion, think that the emergencies of the country are such and the situation of this matter is such that they will vote for this resolution, and I shall probably take that course myself. It is of very little consequence to the country, I suppose, how any individual Senator votes, but it may be of some importance to himself; and I wish, therefore, to state that while my judgment condemns the proposition as unwise and inexpedient I am unwilling to put myself in a position that might by any possibility be construed as opposing any measure which the Administration think necessary and wise to put down this rebellion. I do not believe this will do it, but it seems they think it will. The President of the United States, acting on his responsibility, has seen fit to accept these men and call them out. I should have been glad if the majority of the Senate had thought proper to arrest the measure where it is, and pay exactly and liberally and honorably every dollar that has been expended—not to repudiate, but to preserve the public faith in full. But as such does not seem to be the course that is indicated by those with whom I ordinarily act, rather than separate from friends with whom I have usually and ordinarily voted, I shall on this occasion yield my judgment to the better judgment of wiser men and vote for the measure, constrained by the very peculiar circumstances in which this resolution is placed, and in which the country now finds itself.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Harding, Henderson, Johnson, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—14.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. CONNESS. I voted "yea" on the passage of the resolution for the purpose of giving notice of a motion to reconsider. I now give that notice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the question will be on the reconsideration. Let us take it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California make a motion to reconsider?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; not now; but I give notice that I shall make that motion.

Mr. WILSON. Is that matter disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the motion to reconsider is entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CONNESS. The notice, not the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice of a motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does it not go over, as a matter of course?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice is to retain the bill until the motion is made.

Mr. JOHNSON. But does not this motion lie over until the next day at the instance of any Senator?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I take it the joint resolution has passed, and must go to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is passed, but the usual practice of the Senate has been to detain a bill or resolution for a time under a notice of a motion to reconsider. The Chair will suggest that it is competent for any Senator to move to reconsider, and the Senate can decide the question now.

Mr. FOOT. Has that motion been made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been made; there has only been a notice of such a motion.

Mr. FOOT. I take it, the resolution is not to be detained with a view to wait somebody's pleasure to move a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has usually been done.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HALE. I hope that that course will not be taken. I have never known it done, within my recollection, in the Senate where any gentleman—under the practice we have two or three days in which a reconsideration can be moved—has given notice of that reconsideration, that some other member introduced the motion and pressed the consideration of it immediately for the purpose of depriving the Senator giving the notice of the constitutional right which he had and has of moving a reconsideration. It is competent for the Senate to do it no doubt, but it is a course that I have never known pursued in the Senate since I have been a member of it.

Mr. FOOT. The motion is now made for reconsideration.

Mr. HALE. I know it is; but that is a thing I have never known done.

Mr. CONNESS. If this course had been taken just prior to an adjournment there would have been an evident propriety then in forcing a vote at this time; but under the circumstances I did not expect that the motion would now be made. However, if Senators desire to proceed in that course they are welcome to it so far as I am concerned. Sir, I feel—I will not continue my remarks more than a moment—that before this resolution shall pass, if it passes at all, there should be some limit imposed upon it other than is now imposed. I feel it very seriously and solemnly. It is not an act of contumacy on my part, but an act that I believe comprehends the highest degree of public good. Facts have come to my knowledge, even this morning, which I could not intrude upon the Senate, as the Senate adjourned yesterday pending a call upon this question, that convinced me that this measure should not pass, at least in its present condition. I intended to present them when the time should come for the motion to reconsider. I cannot see that the public interest will so suffer from the delay as to need a reconsideration now; but if the Senate see fit to vary their own rule for the purpose of bringing on a vote, of course I have nothing to say.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, the people of five States are now engaged in raising troops that are to be paid by this joint resolution. I believe that the best interests of the country are involved in the immediate raising of these one hundred thousand troops, and that a few hours' delay is prejudicial to my country. I was not aware of the rule or the custom suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire—

Mr. HALE. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say it was a rule. I said it was the invariable practice so far as I knew.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Well, in this body that is a rule. I do not want to do anything to violate the courtesies of the Senate. Before I withdraw my motion, however, I appeal to the Senator from California in behalf of the country that while I withdraw my motion he will withdraw his motion. There is but one feeling so far as the executive branch of this Government is concerned. They are earnest in their desire to have this resolution passed without a moment's delay.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I have no bargains to make here. When, only a few days ago, the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] gave such a notice of recommendation as this, I did not feel as though it was my right to object. If the Senate shall see fit to depart from its usage in this case at the instance of the Senator from Kansas, if he shall press his motion, I shall at least stand justified in the premises.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have too much respect for myself, and too much respect for the Senator from California, to suggest a bargain. It is a strange enunciation, when I appeal to him on behalf of his country to withdraw his motion that he should call that a proposition for a bargain! I have too much respect for him, too much respect for this body, to propose a bargain. But as it seems to be a violation of the courtesies of the Senate I will withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not satisfied that this matter shall go over by default, as if it were any violation of any courtesy or any practice or any usage of this body for a Senator who votes with the majority on any proposition to move to reconsider, whether another Senator has given notice that he shall move to reconsider or not. There never has been any such practice or any such usage, to my knowledge, in the Senate. The rule fixes the time within which any person voting with the majority can move a reconsideration. If this question is suffered to pass off in this way it may be considered hereafter as if there was some violation of the courtesy due to one Senator giving notice of such a motion for another to move a reconsideration. I appeal to the older members on this floor if there has been any such practice or any such usage.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire whether, on the final passage of a bill or resolution, a notice that a motion will be made within two days to reconsider would keep the bill or resolution from being sent to the Executive?

Mr. JOHNSON. Always.

Mr. GRIMES. Never.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to be understood. I do not mean a motion to reconsider, but the notice that such a motion would be made, which may or may not be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it has been the custom of the Senate, in such a case, to withhold the bill for a time from the House of Representatives. The Chair is not aware that it has ever occurred, on the final passage of a bill, to withhold it from the Executive.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish the matter understood. Has that been the custom when a notice has been given of a motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been the custom, when a request has been made or a notice has been given that the motion would be made, for the bill to be retained in the custody of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say that I think the usage has been uniform. I am not in favor of reconsidering the passage of this resolution, because the majority of the Senate have decided to pass it. But the rule of the Senate gives two days in which to enter the motion to reconsider, and if a Senator gives notice of the proposition to reconsider the bill is always retained. The Senate of course have a right to say that it shall not be retained; but I only speak of what has been the usage.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This resolution as I understand has passed by a vote of 23 in the affirmative to 14 in the negative. I understand it to be clearly the purpose of the majority of the Senate to pass it. It is of that class of measures that is necessary to be passed at once if passed at all, and that ought to take effect at once. I therefore renew the motion to reconsider, and will ask a vote of the Senate upon it at once.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call up the report of the committee of conference on the bill to establish a Bureau of Military Justice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the special order will be taken up, and then I shall have no objection. Will that report take any time?

Mr. WILSON. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call up the bill which is the order of the day, the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, and that bill is now before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Now, with the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I make the motion that I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 208) to establish a Bureau of Military Justice.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference appointed to take into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House No. 308, to establish a Bureau of Military Justice, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses to agree as follows:

That the Senate recede from their several amendments to the bill of the House of Representatives, and agree to the same without amendment.

Mr. HALE. I wish to know of the chairman of the committee if that report leaves the officers of this bureau to be paid as the officers of the Army are to be paid?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Then I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know what were the points of dispute.

Mr. WILSON. I will state the whole matter in a very few words. The House of Representatives passed a bill establishing a Bureau of Military Justice, making the head of that bureau a brigadier general, and giving him two assistants with the rank of colonel. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate had the impression that the rank of major would be sufficient for those assistants, and they so reported. When the bill was before the Senate that amendment of the Committee was lost and an amendment was adopted that the two assistants should have a salary of $3,000 a year, and the Judge Advocate General should have a salary of $4,000 a year, with the rank of a brigadier general. The House of Representatives did not concur in those amendments, and a committee of conference was appointed. The question came up in that conference whether the committee would agree to the amendments of the Senate. The facts were presented, the statistics and points argued in the committee; and the committee on the part of the Senate receded from the amendments of the Senate. In the first place, they considered that it was making an invidious distinction against those officers and against General Holt. The Adjutant General, General Taylor, General Meigs, and all the other heads of these other bureaus, have the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general. The head of this Military Bureau has as much work to do as any officer in the Government. During the first three months of this year over eight thousand and sixty cases came before it. They have only been able to dispose of nineteen hundred with all the force they had there, much less than one third of the cases. The country is suffering at a rate, perhaps, of millions of dollars a year because this business is not kept up as it ought to be. It was stated that we ought to have these two additional officers with the rank of colonel at any rate; that we wanted two able and strong men in these positions who would have the proper inferior officers under them detailed, so that the immense business which comes from the armies of the country could be promptly disposed of. The pecuniary interests of the country and the administration of justice and the government of the Army require this business to be kept up promptly. We are to-day some eight or nine thousand cases behindhand.

Mr. GRIMES. How many officers have you got in that bureau?

Mr. WILSON. There are a few detailed officers. I do not know the number.

Mr. GRIMES. This bill diminishes them.

Mr. WILSON. I think not. At any rate, the committee of conference thought on the presentation of the facts of the case that the Senate ought to recede from these amendments, and they have so reported.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to ask the Senator one question. What will be the difference between passing the House bill and passing our amendments?

Mr. WILSON. I think the difference in the aggregate will be from two to three thousand dollars a year. It will be the difference between the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general and $4,000 and the pay and emoluments of two colonels and a compensation of $3,000. That is the difference.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would inform the Senate how much quicker the same men will get through with the business, which he says clogs up this office, by giving them the rank of colonel?

Mr. WILSON. The Senate by its vote determined to give these assistants that rank. That was not the question in the committee of conference. The only question there was the question of compensation. The Senate gave these assistants the rank of colonel.

Mr. HALE. How much quicker would they get through the business by having the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels than if they had a fixed salary? How much does he think the business would suffer by giving them a fixed salary? The argument for agreeing to this report he tells us is the great amount of cases that are now on hand, and the great necessity of their being disposed of at once. I wish to know how much more quickly they will be disposed of by paying these men the uncertain sum, the amount of which nobody knows, of the pay and emoluments of colonels, than if they had a simple salary of three or four thousand dollars a year. Sir, it is a vicious way of paying salaries. It is a way that I have fought ever since I have had the honor of a seat on the floor of the Senate. I have labored again and again to have this system abandoned in the Army. It is now abandoned in the Navy. We pay there a fixed salary, and there is no difficulty about it. We ought to pay a fixed salary in the Army. But here it is proposed to extend this uncertain payment to the civil service; for this is nothing but a part of the civil service. It is a court, a judicial tribunal that you are establishing to try military offenses; and, in my humble judgment, it is not only not necessary but absurd to give it any such rule as this. I think the thing is so vicious that the Senate ought not to recede from its amendments. This is a very simple thing. The House insist upon paying judicial officers by a standard, graduating their pay according to the rank and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and I venture to say that there is not a man in this Senate who can tell what they are. Besides, in some years it will be more than in others, and under some circumstances it will be more than others. I think they ought to be paid a fixed salary. If $3,000 is not enough, I would give them $4,000; I would give them anything; but I would know what I gave them. I hope the Senate will not concur in this report.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that if his views prevail we shall be departing from what has always been the policy of the Government. His objection applies to our Adjutant General, to our Quartermaster General, to our Commissary General, and to General Ramsey of the ordnance department. They all receive the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general, whatever they may be, and this is to be a military bureau. Colonel Holt is now filling the place. By this bill we make him a brigadier general. I venture to say there are very few men in the Government or the country who labor more hours or render greater service to the country than Colonel Holt is doing in that place. I think he would feel, his friends would feel, and we should all feel that it would be a degradation to him to make a general of him and at the same time not give him what we give other brigadier generals. We have made the Provost Marshal General a brigadier general. I do not wish to underrate the importance of that office, but we have made him a brigadier general with all the rights, privileges, and pay of a brigadier general, and now it is proposed to select General Holt out and degrade him, and degrade the officers under him, in a department of this Government overwhelmed with business, and in which they have got to bring great legal learning and great industry.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to occupy time, but if this thing is to go on, why not make the Solicitor of the War Department a brigadier general?

Mr. WILSON. That is a different thing.

Mr. HALE. It is a different thing, because one is a judge and the other a solicitor. They are both civil officers. These are civil officers to all intents and purposes. I hope the Senate will adhere to the position they have taken. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of concurring in this report.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Two Senators have left the Chamber who will be back in a few moments. I was told to inform the Senate that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HARDING] would be absent but for a little while. I therefore move that the absentees be called again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote has been announced.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. I do not see any use in sitting here when there is no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER and Mr. POMEROY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Hale, Riddle, and Sumner—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—23.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate refuses to adjourn, but the vote shows that the Senate is without a quorum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have an objection to that. I have heretofore objected to it, and I object to it now. Unless you direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep those who are now here present it will do no good to send the Sergeant-at-Arms after those who are not here to get them in.

Mr. WILSON. Lock the doors.

Mr. COLLAMER. No such arrangement has ever been made in this Senate. There is no rule for it, and we cannot do any such thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe some business has interposed since the last motion to adjourn was made. I will therefore renew the motion to adjourn. I do not think there is any use in us sitting here without a quorum. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FOOT (when his name was called) said:

I shall vote in the affirmative, assuming that there is no probability of getting a quorum to-day.

Mr. RIDDLE (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called) said: I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained at home by sickness in his family.

The result was then announced—yeas 17, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Henderson, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 3, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. WILSON. I ask leave, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, to take from the Speaker's table bill of the Senate No. 256, to change and define the boundaries of the eastern and western judicial districts of Virginia, and to alter the names of said districts, and for other purposes, for the purpose of having it referred.

No objection was made; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have Senate bill No. 187, to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and her Britannic Majesty for the final settlement of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Companies, for the purpose of reference.

No objection being made, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LAND GRANT TO KANSAS.

On motion of Mr. WILDER, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate No. 233, making an additional grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of railroad and telegraph lines, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LAND GRANT TO IOWA.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that a message be sent to the Senate asking the return of House bill No. 159, for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State, and for other purposes, in order to correct an error in the engrossment.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

INCREASE OF SOLDIERS' PAY.

Mr. JULIAN. I would ask what is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not yet aware for what purpose the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have authority from the House to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill of the Senate (No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

The SPEAKER. If that bill is not reported now, the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands last Tuesday evening will be the first business in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to report it back now. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report the bill back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That on and after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1864, the pay of all soldiers in the military service of the United States shall be sixteen dollars per month. And from that date, also, the pay of non-commissioned officers shall be increased as follows: corporals shall receive eighteen dollars per month; sergeants, including commissaries' and quartermasters' sergeants, twenty dollars per month; orderly sergeants, twenty-four dollars per month; and sergeant majors, twenty-six dollars per month.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Army ration shall hereafter be the same as provided by law and regulations on the 1st day of July, 1861: Provided, That the ration of pepper prescribed in the eighth section of the act to promote the efficiency of the corps of engineers and of the ordnance department, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, shall continue to be furnished as heretofore. But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to alter the commutation value of rations as regulated by existing laws.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting the public property," approved July 22, 1861, as provides that each company officer, non-commissioned officer, private, musician, and artificer of cavalry shall furnish his own horse and horse equipments, and shall receive forty cents per day for their use and risk, is hereby repealed, except only so far as the same may hereafter be made to apply and relate to mounted troops called into the service of the United States for a term not exceeding six months.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the pay of clerks of paymasters in the Army of the United States shall be $1,200 per annum.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as that an officer may have, when allowed by order of his proper commander, leave of absence for other cause than sickness or wounds, without deduction from his pay or allowances: Provided, That the aggregate of such absence shall not exceed thirty days in any one year.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the first section of this act shall terminate and expire at the end of the present rebellion.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this bill are hereby repealed.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment, not for the purpose of making a speech, but for the purpose of offering in good faith and in all sincerity an amendment from this side of the House to increase the pay of the private soldier two dollars a month and the pay of the non-commissioned officers two dollars a month.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot. I propose to call the previous question on the bill after a brief statement in relation to its contents.

Mr. COX. The other day the gentleman made a speech upon this subject, and this side of the House had no opportunity of saying a word in reply. Now, sir, we upon this side of the House desire to propose to the other side, and allow a test vote to be taken upon it, to raise the pay of the private soldier to a point that will enable him to purchase the necessities of life for his family at the present price of living.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he will not at least allow us to submit a proposition to make a discrimination between white and colored soldiers. I wish to propose eighteen and twenty dollars a month respectively for the colored and white soldiers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot yield.

Mr. DAWSON. I want to know of the gentleman from Ohio if he will not give me an opportunity, as chairman of the caucus of the Democratic party of this House, to propose what they have instructed me to propose for raising the pay of the soldiers before he demands the previous question? I hope the pay of the private soldier will be increased to not less than twenty dollars a month in the present depreciated currency.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir. I shall demand the previous question, and if the Democratic caucus are more numerous than the Union caucus they can vote down the demand.

Mr. DAWSON. Very well, let that go as the gentleman's answer.

Mr. KERNAN. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio in his statement of the provisions of this bill to explain wherein they differ from the features of the present bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will do so. I had supposed that every gentleman would understand it. House bill No. 145 equalizes the pay of soldiers, raising the pay of the colored troops to the standard of pay fixed for white troops. That provision having been substantially incorporated by the Senate into an appropriation bill, the Committee on Military Affairs did not deem it necessary to report back that provision. They have, therefore, reported back only so much of that bill in relation to the pay of colored troops as relates to the raising of the pay of all the private soldiers.

The first section, therefore, which was the fifth in the bill as recommended, simply contains, as we have reported it, a general provision increasing the pay of private soldiers from thirteen dollars a month to sixteen dollars a month, with an additional provision for increased pay to non-commissioned officers, who gentlemen will understand are an exceedingly valuable class of officers, standing between the commissioned officers and the privates, if made as efficient as they ought to be. We propose to give to corporals two dollars a month more than to privates; they now receive no additional pay. We propose to give to sergeants two dollars a month more than corporals; we propose to give orderlies or first sergeants four dollars more, and sergeant majors two dollars a month more than that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, supposing that every gentleman here has made up his mind whether he will vote for an increase of pay to the soldiers or not, I do not propose to enter into any discussion upon that subject. There may be a difference of opinion between members as to what amount of increase ought to be granted. Some are in favor of raising their pay to fourteen dollars, some to fifteen dollars, some to sixteen dollars, the rate we have agreed upon, and some at a higher rate.

The Committee on Military Affairs have determined, considering all the circumstances, considering the necessities of the service, justice to the soldiers, what has been done in regard to bounty, what has taken place upon the subject of the currency, and the ability of the Treasury to meet the demands upon it, to leave it to the House to adopt or reject our proposition.

The next section provides for the reestablishment of the Army ration at what it was in 1861, at the commencement of this war. We ascertained from the Commissary General—in the report that I have upon my table—that that ration is ample. Every one who has been in the service knows it to be so. The ration was increased from eighteen to twenty-two ounces of bread, eighteen being more than is allowed to any other soldiers in the world, and twice as much as Jeff. Davis's soldiers get. What was added to the ration only increased the waste and difficulty of transportation without the soldier getting actually anything more than he did before. There has been a provision by which the surplus of rations might go to a post or regimental fund, but in no case has it gone to the individual soldier. Without taking anything away from the soldier—I speak of the practical effect—we add three dollars in cash to his pay. Going back to the ration of 1861 and what it was in January, 1864—I have no later estimate—it makes a difference in the entire ration of one cent and ninety-nine one hundredths. As I have said, the entire ration in the field is scarcely possible to be used. It makes then in one month a difference of fifty cents if the soldier realizes it, which he does not. So really, taking nothing from him, and making a saving to the Government, we give him in lieu of it what he would prefer, some five or six times that sum in cash to be added to his pay. There is a part of the ration increased since 1861, which the Senate and House Military Committee on consultation with the War Department thought it proper to retain. I refer to the allowance of pepper.

Section three refers to the provision allowing forty cents a day to a man who furnishes his own horse, and limits that to the cases where the men are called out for a short time, not exceeding three months. That is proposed to the law, on the application of the cavalry bureau, communicated to us by the Secretary of War, who approves it, and because it is found in practice a great deal of abuse and little or no advantage has arisen from that provision of law.

There is a section providing that the pay of paymasters' clerks shall be $1,200 a year. The committee have in this departed from the general rule which they have adopted for themselves, not to recommend an increase of the pay of any officers or clerks. They have made this exception for this reason: a paymaster's clerk is required not only to be a man of strictest integrity, as every clerk ought to be, but must have a peculiar knowledge of accounts. Immense responsibilities are necessarily intrusted to him. We propose to raise his pay up to that of the lowest grade of clerks in the Department, and no higher. It is the only increase that the committee have recommended in case of officers or clerks.

In another section we provide for repealing the provision of law as it now stands in reference to leaves of absence. Officers, as it were, have been fined by a deduction from their pay and allowances even when absent by leave. That has been found in practice to operate harshly on some of the best of our officers. Men who have been absent two or three years could not visit their families even with a leave of absence except with a deduction from their pay which they could ill afford. It is provided that officers may have leave of absence without deduction of pay provided that the leaves of absence shall not exceed thirty days in any one year. It is proposed in the bill from the Senate that the officers should have leave of absence ten days at a time. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House have thought that that was not a fair provision, for the reason that while it would be a benefit to soldiers serving in armies near home, as in the army of the Potomac, it would be of little benefit to the soldiers in Tennessee and Georgia, who would require more than ten days to get home and back again. We agree that the officer may take it in parcel or in the aggregate, as his commander may allow him, but it is not to exceed thirty days in any one year. Thirty days would allow an officer at a distant point to visit his family and return.

The next section provides that the increase of pay provided in the first section shall expire with the termination of the present rebellion. Congress will be left to take care of the Army in the future as to the amount of pay.

The next is but a repealing clause; and this is therefore an exposition of all the contents of the bill. I hope my friend from New York is satisfied with the explanation I have given. Without entering into any discussion, supposing that every gentleman has made up his mind, and is able to vote upon the bill now, either to reject it or to pass it, I move the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I ask permission of the gentleman from Ohio to offer an amendment to strike out sixteen dollars a month for soldiers, and insert twenty dollars a month. I appeal to the honorable chairman of the Military Committee to take the sense of the House on that point.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am acting under the instructions of my committee, which directed me to make this report. If voted down, of course gentlemen can offer any other proposition which they may consider better.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will my colleague on the committee allow me to make a suggestion in regard to the pay of quartermasters' clerks, which is reduced by this bill?

Mr. SCHENCK declined to withdraw the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Dawson and Schenck were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on agreeing to the substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Military Committee for information. The seventh section is one which presents some difficulty to my mind. It repeals the fifth section of the act of 1861, which allows a mounted volunteer forty cents a day for his horse. I wish to know from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether it is intended thereby to make no allowance to a mounted man in the service for his horse. I know of no law except the act of 1861 which allows pay for the soldier's horse. If that is repealed, does the soldier who owns his own horse get nothing for him?

Mr. SCHENCK. The idea which the committee has is this: that it is better to go back and adhere to the principle of the Government furnishing its own horses, unless where cavalry is called out for a very short time. It of course does not interfere with the past in any way; but it may make it necessary for the Government to become the owner of horses in the service not now owned by it, or to dismount the men who own their own horses and change the character of the force. It simply falls back upon the principle of the Government furnishing its own horses.

Mr. KING. And it will not interfere with men already in the service with their own horses?

Mr. SCHENCK. Not with the past. Not with any pay for the past time.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 0; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brantledge, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chapler, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harding, Charles M. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—135.

NAYS—0.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. GOOCH stated that he was paired off with Mr. SWEAT, but that being informed that Mr. SWEAT would have voted in the affirmative on this bill, he would vote "ay."

Mr. HOLMAN stated that his colleagues, Messrs. EDGERTON and HARRINGTON, were necessarily absent from the House. Both of them would have voted "ay" on this bill.

Mr. STILES stated that his colleague, Mr. MILLER, was paired off with Mr. TRACY.

Mr. COX stated that his colleague, Mr. PENDLETON, was paired off with Mr. KASSON. He presumed that both would have voted "ay" on this bill.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, stated that his colleague, Mr. BLAINE, was detained from the House by sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the title by striking out the words "equalize and."

The amendment was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act for the prevention and punishment of frauds in relation to the names of vessels; and

An act to vacate and sell the present Indian reservations in Utah Territory, and to settle the Indians of said Territory in the Uinta valley.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I now report from the Committee of Ways and Means the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Do the amendments involve appropriations?

Mr. STEVENS. They do.

The SPEAKER. They can then be considered in the House only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to considering them in the House under the rules that prevail in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be considered in the House with that understanding, if there is no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

First amendment of the Senate:

Page 1, strike out "For the construction and repair of vessels of the Navy, $36,300,000," and insert:

For repair and maintenance of vessels of the Navy, labor, materials, and stores, $11,500,000.

For the completion of sixteen fast steam screw sloops-of-war, $7,300,000.

For the purchase, construction, and repair of vessels, materials, and labor for the western waters, $4,000,000.

For the purchase and charter of vessels for naval and blockading purposes, $3,000,000.

For extra labor, expenses of repairs, &c., on foreign stations, $600,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment, with an amendment, as follows:

Add to the end of the Senate amendment the following: For the payment of the three months' bounty to seamen and ordinary seamen, under the joint resolution of February 24, 1864, $500,000.

Mr. STEVENS. This Senate amendment is only itemising the same amount which we had in the bill in gross. We think it is an improvement. The amendment recommended by the committee is to provide for what we have already by law agreed to—a bounty to the sailors. We have a communication from the Department requesting that an appropriation be made, as none was made at the time the law was passed.

Mr. BROOKS. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if that appropriation for sixteen fast screw steamers is likely to be enough?

Mr. STEVENS. All those steamers are under way under former contracts, and this appropriation is expected to complete them.

Mr. BROOKS. Does this appropriation apply to no new ones?

Mr. STEVENS. To none except those already provided for.

The amendment to the Senate amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment as amended was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Page 1, line thirteen, after the word "for" insert "the completion of;" so that the clause will read, "for the completion of armor-plated vessels," &c.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Third amendment:

Page 3, line twenty-seven, after the word "houses" insert "in the navy-yard."

The amendment was agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

Page 4, lines twenty-one and twenty-two, strike out "five hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty;" so that the clause will read, "of vessels in the Navy, $1,250,000."

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Fifth amendment:

Page 7, line eighteen, after the word "quarters" insert "in the barracks."

The amendment was agreed to.

Sixth amendment:

Page 9, line four, strike out "mooring" and insert "mooring."

The amendment was agreed to.

Seventh amendment:

Page 9, line six, after "warehouses," insert "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Eighth amendment:

Page 9, line thirteen, after the word "kinds" strike out "and for the extension of the water-front by purchase of two lots adjoining the navy-yard at a price not exceeding $135,000, three hundred and nineteen," and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and eighty-four."

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the Senate amendment by striking out "one hundred and eighty-four" and inserting "sixty." I ask that certain information I have in my hands may be submitted to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate is to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate struck out the appropriation for the purchase of land for the Charlestown navy-yard and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in striking it out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I misapprehended the Senate amendment. I understand now that the effect will be this: if the Senate amendment be rejected the appropriation will stand at $135,000. I now move that the House concur in the Senate amendment, and I ask that an affidavit which I send up may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

I, Gustavus V. Hall, of Charlestown, in the county of Middlesex, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on my oath say, that late in February, A. D. 1864, I was present at an interview between Mr. Oakman, of Charlestown, and Mr. Hittinger, who sold him a wharf in said Charlestown, called Brinall's wharf, wherein said Oakman told Mr. Hittinger that he paid a large price for the wharf, and that he would sell it back at any time within a year, if the Government did not take it, as he expected, for $10,000 less than he gave for it.

GUSTAVUS V. HALL.

Boston, April 27, 1864.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

Personally appeared Gustavus V. Hall, above named, and made oath that the foregoing affidavit, by him signed, is true. Before me, JOHN Q. A. GRIFFIN, Justice of the Peace for all counties.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask that an affidavit from the party making the sale of this property to the present owners may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

I, Jacob Hittinger, of Belmont, in the county of Middlesex, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on my oath, say: that I sold the wharf known as Brinall's wharf, at said Charlestown, the third wharf situated westerly of the original line of the navy-yard; that I sold said wharf in the month of December, A. D. 1863, to Oakman & Eldredge; that I executed the deed thereof to them in the month of February, A. D. 1864; that I received therefor the sum of $55,000. Oakman & Eldredge had been lessees of said wharf under a lease which had expired about six months before said sale in December, and perhaps earlier; and they were occupying at the time of the sale in December under an agreement for an occupancy of one year after the expiration of said first lease. Their occupancy, I think, was to terminate, by the terms of our agreement, about May 1, A. D. 1864. Oakman & Eldredge offered to sell me all the improvements they had put upon the premises and deliver them to me, including scales and railroad and all else, for $6,000; but I did not buy them for the reason that I thought the property not worth so much. On the day the deeds were passed, Mr. Oakman told me he would give me $10,000 to take the property back if his proposed sale to the United States failed, or was not consummated for any reason. Before this sale, I had owned this wharf twelve or fifteen years; had done business upon it; and for some eighteen years had done business on wharf property in that immediate neighborhood. I sold this because I thought I got a good price for it, and I had no other reason for selling it. Before the sale I had frequent conversations with Oakman & Eldredge about selling it to them, and their objection to buying it was that the price asked and finally paid was too great, and that the wharf was not worth it. They also said it was of less value than Caswell's wharf adjoining, which they had bought of Messrs. Lawrence & Sawyer.

JACOB HITTINGER.

Boston, April 27, 1864.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

Personally appeared, Jacob Hittinger, above named, and made oath that the foregoing affidavit by him signed is true. Before me, JOHN Q. A. GRIFFIN, Justice of the Peace for all counties.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask the Clerk to read an article from the Charlestown Advertiser, of April 30, 1864, a leading Republican paper in that city, presenting all the facts as to the value of this property.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The affidavits of a large number of the most experienced and competent men were furnished that the portion of the wharves proposed to be sold for $135,000 would be dear at $60,000; that the portion retained from the two wharves by Oakman & Eldredge was worth as much or more than that they proposed to sell; so that they would keep at least one half of the value they bought for $104,000, and sell the other half for $125,000! This evidence came from owners of wharf property in the same neighborhood, from merchants, from wharfingers, from wharfbuilders, from gentlemen who own and sell real estate, in fact from the best citizens of the town, having knowledge of practical affairs. But this was not all. The proofs summoned by the mayor established that many thousand feet of unsurpassed wharf property could be constructed on the premises already owned and inclosed by the Government, as cheaply at least, if not more cheaply, than that involved in the proposed sale could be repaired for and made fit for Government use and occupancy. This testimony came from many sources, and among other deponents concerning it were certain officers in the navy-yard, of high character for integrity and good judgment and skill in their departments of the public service. The affidavits embracing these facts, and also setting forth the manner in which the sale to the United States of wharf property would affect the city of Charlestown, in withdrawing from commerce and from taxation property so greatly needed for both purposes, were by the mayor laid before the Senate, that had yet to pass upon the appropriation of $135,000, which had gone through the House, wherein it had been advocated by Massachusetts members, and opposed only by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois."

Mr. HOLMAN. The House appropriated

$135,000 for the purchase of this property. The Senate struck out the appropriation. My motion is to concur in the Senate amendment. Now, it appears from the affidavits I have read, and from the editorial of a leading paper in Charlestown, Massachusetts, that this property, last December, was sold by the then owner, to Oakman & Eldredge for $55,000, there being improvements on it worth $6,000, making the value of the property $61,000; and that Oakman & Eldredge, to whom the property was sold, proposed to sell it back to the same party at a loss of $10,000, provided they failed to sell this property to the Government. And yet, for this property, it is now proposed by the House to pay $135,000. I think there can be no two opinions about this matter. I thought the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was right when he assailed this measure in the beginning. These affidavits, and this editorial article, from the very locality where this property exists, establish the fact beyond controversy that here is an attempt to purchase for the United States property which was bought last fall for $55,000 at the price of $135,000. I trust that there will not be one moment's hesitation on the part of the House in concurring in the Senate amendment, and defeat a scheme of speculation gotten up by ingenious gentlemen somewhat skilled in selling real estate to the Government.

Mr. STEVENS. This is a matter which is very fiercely contested between the officers of the Government of the United States and the citizens of Charlestown, the mayor and others, who think themselves affected by this purchase. All I shall do will be to state briefly the facts as they have come before the Committee of Ways and Means. Before the original appropriation of $135,000 for the purchase of this property was reported, the Committee of Ways and Means had the naval authority before them, Admiral Smith and some others, and they came to the conclusion that the property is very necessary to the Government, and that upon the best evidence they could get, although the seller will make something from the sale, the property is now fairly worth $135,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will allow me to make a statement here. I have not seen these amendments, for they have not been printed, and I have only heard them read, and I at first supposed that the Senate had increased the appropriation from $135,000 to $184,000, but I find that there were two items embraced in this section with an appropriation of $319,000, and that the Senate struck out this appropriation of $135,000, leaving the appropriation of $184,000. My motion, therefore, is that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate, which strikes out this appropriation entirely.

Mr. STEVENS. I was going to state that the gentleman misunderstood the matter. The Senate have rejected the appropriation for the purchase of this property, and have sent it back to us for concurrence. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence.

As I said before, we had investigated this matter very thoroughly before; and although there is a great contest between the property holders of Charlestown and the various naval officers who have had charge of the navy-yard there, we came to the conclusion that the property is absolutely necessary for Government purposes, and that the price is not high at the present rates of property there. It is said that the owners of this property will make a large speculation. They purchased the property in two parcels; and for one they paid $55,000 and for the other $49,000, making $104,000 for the two. It appears from the evidence that they have improved the property to the amount of about twenty-five thousand dollars. That would bring up the actual cost to the owners to nearly one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. The Government now asks them to sell the whole of the water-front, with the improvements upon it, together with as far back as is necessary to square the navy-yard, and offers them $135,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman who sold the property to the present owners who now propose to sell it to the Government says that the improvements put on the property do not exceed in value $6,000. He himself was not willing to pay $6,000 for the improvements. He sold the property for $55,000, and $6,000 spent on improvements would make $61,000.

Mr. STEVENS. It is only a part of the property that the gentleman refers to. The evidence is that the whole improvements have cost $25,000. But the Government does not want the whole property. It needs only the water-front of two hundred and eighty feet of the best water in Boston harbor, as is agreed by all parties, and which is absolutely necessary, and they offer for it $135,000, which will leave a profit of about twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars to those who purchased this property on speculation. They offer the whole property for $160,000, and this part of it for $135,000. That may be, perhaps, too large a profit for men who bought this property some years ago; but it is not larger than other gentlemen in the same neighborhood make in the rise of property. The evidence is very conflicting on the part of those interested in Charlestown. They all concur in saying that it is too much for the property. Officers of the Government, Admiral Stringham, Admiral Gregory, Rear Admiral Smith, and all others who have examined it, think that the price is but a fair one, and that the Government should not lose the opportunity to purchase. Other evidence has been sent in by disinterested gentlemen which convinces the Committee of Ways and Means that the price is not exorbitant. It may be a fair, full price, but no more than can be got from others, and no more than the Government ought to pay. At this point I ask to have a communication read.

The Clerk read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, stating that he deemed it of the utmost importance to the Government to possess the water-front proposed to be purchased of Oakman & Eldredge, adjacent to the Boston navy-yard, and recommending that the committee non-concur with the Senate amendment striking that item out of the Navy appropriation bill. The Department considers the price not unreasonable, and the present necessities of the service require the purchase to be made.

Mr. STEVENS. Under these circumstances, the Committee of Ways and Means thought it best to recommend non-concurrence, and to let the matter go to a committee of conference, as the property seems indispensable to the naval service. I may add that all the officers who have been superintendents of the yard for years past have concurred in urging upon us the purchase of this property as being absolutely necessary for the Government, and not at an unfair price. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and other gentlemen have evidence on this subject which, if there be time to lay it before the House, will, I hope, at least induce us to send back the proposition to a committee of conference.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by reducing the appropriation one dollar. I will not detain the House longer than is necessary to make a plain and simple statement of the facts involved in this case, so far as I understand them. I believe that a great deal of unnecessary discussion has arisen on this subject, and that this discussion has been of a nature to lead the House to suppose that this is some scheme, or that there is something wrong attaching in some form or other to this purchase. For my own part, I have no idea that there is anything wrong in it. It will be recollected that this proposition came before the House from the Committee of Ways and Means in the ordinary manner in which other appropriations in the bill were reported. It came on a recommendation from the Navy Department, by which the wants and necessities of that Department are communicated to Congress. It has, therefore, the same authority and the same origin as all other appropriations embodied in this bill.

While this subject was before the House on a former occasion I stated that the necessities for this purchase arose out of the vast increase of the Navy since the breaking out of the rebellion. We have not now as much navy-yard accommodation as we had before the rebellion commenced, while we have lost the naval stations at Norfolk and Pensacola. On the other hand, the number of naval vessels in the service has increased from seventy-six to near six hundred. A large portion of these additional vessels have been such as were built not for naval purposes but for the mercantile marine; consequently they are less able to bear the wear and tear of naval service. They decay more rapidly. They come sooner for repair, and their places are required to be filled sooner than if they had been built for the legitimate naval service. The recommendation, therefore, was based on the necessity for increased accommodation at these yards, in order to enable the Department to discharge the duty incumbent on it in consequence of the rebellion. The necessity is certified to not only by the Secretary of the Navy and the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, but also by the civil engineer of the Charlestown navy-yard; by the commandant of that yard, Admiral Stringham; by Admiral Gregory, who was formerly commandant of that yard; and by Commodore Montgomery, who was recently in command of it and who is now in command of the navy-yard in this city. All these gentlemen unite in testimony of the fact that the enlargement of this navy-yard at Charlestown is a matter of absolute necessity, and that the Department will be crippled in carrying on the work there unless the enlargement be made.

Now, sir, I understand that the objection is not to the extension of the limits of this yard, so much as that the price at which it is proposed to purchase this property is exorbitantly large. I am well aware that affidavits in large numbers have been sent here to be presented in this discussion, for the purpose of showing that the price at which it is proposed to purchase this property is too large. On the other hand, I present the opinions of officers of the Navy, whose duty it was to investigate this subject, upon whose shoulders the responsibility rests of complicity in a scheme for swindling the Government, as this purchase has been designated in this House. And, sir, the officers of the Navy, and the officers of the Navy Department, so far as I know or have heard, are satisfied that the price which it is proposed to pay for this property is not an unreasonable or an unfair one. I will not detain the House by any further remarks in this connection, for I propose, in answer to the affidavits that have been submitted to show that the property is not worth what it is proposed to pay for it, to ask the attention of the House to a few opposing affidavits upon that subject.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I do not often trouble this House, and I hope I shall be permitted to have two or three affidavits read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon a matter of so much importance I hope there will be no objection to our having a full debate upon it.

There being no objection, Mr. RICE was permitted to proceed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I only desire to speak upon this subject so far as to put the House in possession of the facts of the case. I have no interest in the matter any further than every other gentleman has who desires that the interest of the Government shall be subserved and that simple justice shall be done to the parties. I hold in my hand a letter from Commodore Montgomery, the commandant of the Washington navy-yard, lately the commandant of the Charlestown navy-yard, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

NAVY-YARD, WASHINGTON, April 20, 1864.

SIR: Perceiving that estimates for the purchase of a wharf embracing two hundred and eighty feet of water-front adjoining the navy-yard at Boston have been stricken from the naval appropriation bill in the Senate of the United States, I trust you will not consider me intrusive in presenting to you the expression of my views of the importance of the proposed acquisition to the navy-yard so recently under my command.

The want of additional water-front, with depth of water sufficient to accommodate and float vessels of the largest class, has ever been a source of great inconvenience, and, since the commencement of the present war, of serious disadvantage to the public interests.

During my late service at the Boston yard, vessels arriving there for repairs were not infrequently retained at their mooring in the stream during the progress of repairing, causing considerable delay, and additional expense in preparing them for service.

I verily believe, sir, that the proposed purchase, if effected, will prove highly advantageous to the public interests, and, in view of this desirable object, sincerely hope the requisite appropriation may yet be passed by both Houses of Congress.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. B. MONTGOMERY,

Commodore.

Rear Admiral JOSEPH SMITH, Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department, Washington.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have here the letter also of Commodore Stringham, the commandant of the yard there, to the same purpose, and I will state in the same connection that in a conversation with him, on meeting him casually on the street, he told me that he was authorized to use the name of Commodore Gregory to the same purpose. Now, sir, not to detain the House too long with this matter, I will simply ask to have read one other affidavit, that of Mr. Addison Gage, a large ice dealer in the immediate vicinity, who is widely known as a man of the strictest integrity and honor. I ask the attention of the House to it.

The Clerk read the affidavit, as follows:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

In the matter of the sale of Caswell and Brintnall's wharf to the United States:

I, Addison Gage, on oath depose and say that I am now, and for more than thirty years have been, in the ice business; my office is at 70 State street, Boston; my chief place of business in shipping ice is at Swett's wharf, Charlestown, the next wharf, westerly, adjoining Brintnall's. I am familiar with the two wharves first above mentioned, having occupied the wharf between them and the navy-yard some years before that was sold to the United States, or owned by Oakman & Eldredge, and since then the one I now occupy—in the whole, on both wharves, above thirty years—and I know well what advantages they possess over wharves anywhere else in this harbor. I have not now, nor ever had, any interest in these wharves, or either of them, nor any interest or concern, direct or indirect, in the proposed sale. The late firm of which I was a member owned the wharf I now occupy. When that firm was dissolved I conveyed my interest in this wharf to my late partners. Since then I have leased it at a rent of $6,000 per year. The chief and altogether the most considerable value of these wharves consists in the water-front. It is by that their value in the market is determined. My wharf has a front of only about one hundred and sixty feet, and its value is $100,000. Considering the water-front of these two wharves, Caswell's and Brintnall's, that part of them which Mr. Oakman proposes to sell to the United States is worth at least $135,000. I am certain that at that price the United States do not pay one dollar above the fair market price. There are, besides these, but five wharves between the Charles river bridge and the navy-yard. Every one familiar with the business knows that the respective values of each of these depends on the water-front; and $135,000 for that part of these two wharves Mr. Oakman proposes to sell to the Government is certainly not above the fair value of this property as compared with the other property on the same line of water-front. I will add I have had considerable experience in dredging. It is very expensive, and wherever there is an eddy in the tide the berth dredged will soon fill again. The tide, on the contrary, sweeps by these wharves and keeps the berths open. My opinion is, it would be cheaper and far better for the Government to buy the parts of these wharves above mentioned at the price mentioned than to undertake to dredge berths in front of the navy-yard wall, as I am told has been talked of. So far as I am personally concerned, the selling of the property to the Government would be to my disadvantage, as my business must be carried on between the navy-yard and Charlestown bridge. And as I do not own any wharf, at the end of my present lease there would be less number of wharves that I could rent; but I think it is for the interest of the Government to purchase it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I now submit other affidavits, and without detaining the House with their reading, I will ask that they may be published with these proceedings.

The affidavits are as follows:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

I, Erastus E. Cole, on oath, depose and say that I am a wharf and bridge builder. I know quite well all the wharves at Charlestown, and have known about the two wharves which the Government talk of buying of Oakman & Eldredge, for the last twenty-five years. What gives these wharves value is the deep water-front; and for that they are very valuable; and the value of all those wharves is determined by the water-front they have. A wharf with a narrow water-front is worth very little compared with one having a broad water-front though both have the same quantity of land—I should think not a quarter as much. I think the actual cost of building a pier wharf on deep water like these wharves will be at least two dollars per square foot at the present time. I have no interest in the sale of these wharves, or in the wharves themselves, in any way, shape, or manner, but I think they would be of great value to the Government.

I, Benjamin F. Field, of Boston, on oath depose and say: I am a merchant; was for many years associated with the late Mr. Frederic Tudor, and had the chief management of his ice business and the wharf owned and used by him at Charlestown, and which is situated between the Charles river bridge and the navy-yard, and on the same general line with the wharves owned by Oakman & Eldredge. These wharves I deem to be among the best and most valuable in that side of the harbor. They are on the deepest water, with a natural flow; will accommodate vessels of the largest class at low tide; they are below all bridges, and they have railroad facilities such as no other wharves have; yet their chief value is their water-front. I should say the value of these wharves would be measured chiefly by the water-front they have.

I, James Lee, Jr., on oath declare and say: I reside in Charlestown; am a merchant; my office is in Boston; I have built and owned vessels, and am well acquainted with wharf property in Boston and Charlestown; know Oakman & Eldredge wharves near the navy-yard; the value of such depends on the water-front and the depth of water at low tide; and as there is little water-front at Charlestown and but little in Boston as well situated as these wharves are, I cannot estimate the value of them at less than four times the value per foot of street or upland property.

As I understand the Government have been in treaty for this property as an addition to the yard, I suppose they must appreciate it as thus situated on deep water; and although the purchase of it by the Government would be in some small degree adverse to my interest as a tax-payer in Charlestown, yet, if the Government need it, as in my judgment they do, as essential to the operations of the yard, I should be ashamed to urge that as a reason why they should not have it. So believing, I hope the Government will conclude the purchase, and not be deterred from it by persons styling themselves land speculators. I know that Messrs. Oakman & Eldredge have built up a large and I should think a profitable business on these wharves. My wish is that Government may have all the land it needs for its business.

I, Benoni Bixby, of Boston, on oath depose and say: I am and have for more than twenty years been a wharf and bridge builder. I know both the Brintnall and Caswell wharves in Charlestown, and have worked on both of them. Their great value is in the water-front. We consider these wharves on as good front as any we have in Boston harbor. In my judgment that part of them which Oakman & Eldredge propose to sell to the United States is worth $135,000. To build a pile wharf like those, where they are built on piles, now would cost $1 75 per square foot. I put some piles under these wharves last autumn, each one of which is worth now from twenty-three to twenty-four dollars. I should think the buildings on the part proposed to be sold were worth about nine thousand dollars at present. I have no interest in these wharves or either, nor in the sale of them in any way.

NAVY-YARD, BOSTON, April 18, 1864.

SIR: In compliance with your request to furnish you with an estimate of the cost of building a pile wharf at this yard, I have to say that one hundred superficial feet will require—

Three oak piles, 50 feet long, at thirty-five dollars, (two vertical and one shore).....	$105 00
Fifteen lineal feet white pine stringers, sixteen inches square, (three hundred and twenty feet, board measure), at thirty dollars per thousand.....	9 60
One hundred superficial feet white pine covering, ten inches thick, one thousand feet, at thirty dollars per thousand.....	30 00
Three hundred cubic feet flats mud, (eleven yards), at $1 50 per cubic yard.....	16 50
Labor driving piles, cutting tenons, mortising and scarfing stringers, laying stringers and planking, fitting shoring and fenders.....	5 50
Iron work.....	1 75
Steam engineer, coal, and incidental expenses.....	5 00
Fifteen treenails, (making, boring, and driving,) at ten cents.....	1 50
Total.....	$174 85

This estimate is at the present prices of materials and labor, and, as you will see by the items, rather within, and there are many contingencies and incidental expenses which are not noticed.

Nothing is included for paving or planking the wharf. I am satisfied that $1 80 per one hundred superficial feet is as low as a job of this kind could be contracted for with any responsible builder.

Yours, respectfully, JOS. E. BILLINGS,

Civil Engineer Boston Navy Yard.

SAMUEL OAKMAN, Esq., Present.

No estimate for dredging in above figures.

CLERK'S OFFICE, NAVY-YARD,
BOSTON, April 18, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: My attention being called to the debate, as published in the Globe, in relation to the sale of the wharf for the use of the navy-yard, I must say I was struck with astonishment at the range the debate took in the Senate, for I do think there was a misunderstanding on the part of the Senators, or they could not have said the purchase was unreasonable. In my opinion the Navy Department do need, and I, as I said in debate in the city council, of which board I am a member, and have been for four years, when the question was under consideration for the appointment of a lobby to fight against the Department's buying the wharf, I now repeat, that as to the matter of taking away taxable property from the city, that unless there was a proposition to remove the yard from the city, I should vote against sending any one to Washington to fight against the bill, but would vote to give to the Department the whole line of wharf property from the yard to the Charles river bridge, and as we had the yard in our city it would make one of the greatest naval depots in the country. Hoping the Senate will reconsider the matter, and give to the yard this wharf, which I think they very much need for the sake of its water-front.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES FIELD.

TO SAMUEL OAKMAN.

I, Lowell W. Chamberlin, treasurer and collector of taxes for the city of Charlestown, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, hereby certify that I am such treasurer and collector; that as such I have the care of the records of valuation, &c., and that it appears from the books of valuation of the assessors of said Charlestown, that the stores and wharf on Water street and Charles river, in said Charlestown, owned by Oakman & Eldredge, in the year 1862 were, by the assessors of said city, for that year, valued at the sum of $120,000, and that said Oakman & Eldredge were assessed therefor, by said assessor, a tax of $1,152. Witness my hand, March 11, 1864.

I, David N. Skillings, of Boston, on oath depose and say: I am a wholesale lumber dealer; my firm is David N. Skillings & Co.; office in Kilby street. I was formerly a wharfinger in Boston, and am well acquainted with the value of wharf property. I know very well the Brintnall and Caswell wharves; they are accessible to vessels drawing a great depth of water, and in other respects convenient. I consider them among the few most valuable wharves in the harbor. For the part which Messrs. Oakman & Eldredge propose to sell to the United States $135,000 is not above the fair market price. Indeed, if I owned them, as they do, I should prefer to keep them for business than to sell them at that price. Their great value is in their situation on the deepest water in the harbor, and their breadth of water-front. I have never known a time when it cost as much to build a wharf as now. I will add, that all dredging is but a temporary improvement at best, at all times, but particularly at this time very expensive.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, April 18, 1864.

SIR: Having been called upon for an opinion as to the necessity for the purchase of additional water-front at the Boston navy-yard, I have no hesitation in saying that I consider the proposed purchase of the utmost importance to the Government.

The very limited amount of deep-water-front at this yard has long been a cause of much complaint and serious inconvenience, and is particularly so at this time, owing to the large number of vessels visiting the yard.

The proposed purchase would add about eighty thousand feet to the area of the yard and about two hundred and eighty feet to its water-front. The water in front of this property is very deep and does not require dredging, and the addition will much improve the shape of the yard by giving a better boundary line, the proposed line being at right angles with Water street.

It has been said that a pile wharf could be built to answer the purposes of the Government and at much less cost than is proposed to pay for the property in question.

I have had no opportunity for collecting the necessary information to enter into a detailed estimate of the cost of such a wharf, but am of the opinion that the cost of a pile wharf of eighty thousand feet area, built in the substantial manner in which it would be constructed if done by the Government, together with the necessary dredging, flooring, and graveling, would far exceed the sum proposed to be paid for this purchase, $135,000.

The wharf room is much needed, and if this property is purchased the water-front becomes available at once, and the pressing wants of the Government in this respect will be supplied; whereas if a wharf of the extent named is to be constructed, probably more than a year will expire before it can be so far advanced as to render it available for Government use.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

W. P. S. SANGER,

Engineer Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Hon. ALEXANDER H. RICE, Chairman of Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

In the matter of the sale of Caswell and Brintnall's wharf. to the United States:

I, Obadiah D. Witherell, on oath, depose and say: I am a wholesale dealer in coals; my office is at 95 State street, Boston; I receive and land in the course of a year large quantities of coal. I am well acquainted with Caswell's and Brintnall's wharves at Charlestown; I deem them among the very best wharves here; the great value of them is in the water-front. I don't know the precise difference in the value per foot of land fronting Water street, in Charlestown, and that fronting the harbor, as these wharves do, where the water is deep and below bridges; but the value of the latter must be many times greater. I should say the fair market value of that part of these wharves which Oakman & Eldredge propose to sell was one hundred and thirty-five or one hundred and forty thousand dollars.

I have no interest whatever in these wharves, or either, or in the proposed sale; but if I owned the wharves, as Oakman & Eldredge do, I would not sell what they propose to sell for less than $135,000.

I, the undersigned, Charles P. Chamberlin, of Boston, being duly sworn, depose: I have been in the coal business these twenty years; have long kept a wharf, and know about the value of wharves. I know the value of wharves owned by Oakman & Eldredge; they are, all things considered, perhaps the most accessible and convenient wharves anywhere in this harbor. Their value is well understood by all coal dealers and coal shippers in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. Freighters are always taken to them at the lowest rates. Oakman & Eldredge had established themselves in a large and lucrative business on the wharf they sold to the United States in 1862, and when they left that wharf they transferred their business to these. They bought them cheap, and have expended considerable on them in repairs and buildings. The price they propose to sell for is, in my opinion, nothing more than a fair one.

I consider not merely the water-front of these the best in the city, but also the facilities afforded by the railroad running from the head of them, to be very great. I know, too, about the cost of building pier wharves, and should say, to build on deep water, as good as these, would cost now two dollars per square foot; and as for dredging out berths in front of the navy-yard wall, as I hear has been spoken of, I think it would be money thrown away. It would need dredging as often as once a year.

WM. C. WILLIAMSON,
Justice of the Peace.

I, Artemus Hammond, of Boston, on oath depose and say: I am a coal shipper and wholesale coal dealer in Boston, and have been in that business for fourteen years, during which period I have carried on from one to three wharves at the same time. I am well acquainted with the value of wharf property generally, and of those occupied by Oakman & Eldredge at Charlestown, as well as others. They are among the most eligible wharves in the harbor; on deep water at all times of tide; where there is no eddy; below all bridges, and with good broad water front. I consider the price of $135,000 for the water line, or $160,000 for the whole of these wharves, to be no more than a fair price as between merchant and merchant or any real estate holders. To the Government I think them invaluable. I know also that Oakman & Eldredge have expended a good deal of money upon these wharves, and have a large business; and I doubt very much whether it is for their interest to sell at the price above named. But believing the Government needs it, I hope they will take it. I may add I have no faith in the opposition to it at Charlestown. I don't believe it is patriotism.

Boston, April 19, 1864.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

Sworn to before me.

HARVEY JEWELL,
Justice of the Peace.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Spenser, there is another point in connection with this amendment, which has been made by those who oppose this appropriation; it is, that wharves may be constructed within the limits of the navy-yard as it now exists. Now, I desire to say that I have in my possession affidavits clearly demonstrating that it will cost to make that improvement, without any addition to the premises whatever, more than it will to purchase this property, and besides it would require from six to twelve months to make these improvements, while the Government needs these wharves for immediate use.

I will only say in addition, that this appropriation has met the approval of the Committee of Ways and Means, as well as of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the head of the Navy Department, and of every naval officer who has given an opinion upon the subject, all concurring in the opinion that the Government needs the property, and that the price is not too large. I hope the House will non-concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. KING. I understand this to be a proposition upon the part of the Senate to strike out an appropriation of $135,000, which was placed in this appropriation bill by the House; and the question upon which I feel disposed to submit a remark or two is whether, under the circumstances surrounding this proposed purchase which have been developed in the course of this discussion, we are justified in voting $135,000 for this purpose. The Senate must have had some motive for striking out this matter. They seem to have done it, at all events. After that naval officers and other parties interested in this matter seem to be aroused on the subject, and we have affidavits presented here as to the great importance to the Government of this position, and as to the supposed value of this property. I can say here that the statements made as to the importance of it by these officers have little weight with me. I know nothing of the influences which operate on them. Their motives may be patriotic and proper. Here is a man who sold this property last December for $55,000, and thought he had a good bargain.

Mr. STEVENS. That was only one purchase. There was another for $49,000.

Mr. KING. I understand that the property for which $135,000 is proposed to be appropriated is the property sold by this man for $55,000.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; but both the properties, which cost $104,000.

Mr. KING. Then, sir, I have been mistaken.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Missouri is mistaken in his facts, as was the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. My statement of facts was made on the authority of the affidavits of citizens and the editor of a Republican paper of Charlestown.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I do not care about the politics of the paper. The lands proposed to be sold to the Government cost these proprietors $104,000.

A MEMBER. Before the improvements?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. And there have been twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars of improvements put upon them since the purchase was made. These are the facts.

Mr. KING. There were two parcels.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; there were two parcels, and the gentleman mistook one parcel for the whole.

Mr. KING. Where are the facts to show that the two parcels of land both together came to $104,000?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. They were submitted by the proper authorities to the Committee of Ways and Means. I think that the chairman of the committee has stated them to the House.

Mr. KING. I ask to have the affidavits read.

The affidavits presented by Mr. HOLMAN were again read.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Now, hear me a moment. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that refers to what is known as Brintnall's wharf, for which they paid $55,000. It makes no reference to Caswell's wharf, a part of the purchase, for which they paid $49,000, making for all $104,000. They have expended on this property since that purchase somewhere between twenty-five and thirty thousand dollars. They have offered to sell the portion for which the Government has use for $135,000, and the whole of the property, including what the Department does and what the Department does not need, for $160,000. These are the facts of the case as I understand them; and I have nothing in the way of evidence which controverts them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to another fact. It was said to the House when the bill was first before it, I do not know whether by the gentleman from Massachusetts as the representative of the Naval Committee, that the Government must at once secure this property if they wanted to get it, because it would be in the market but a short time. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that these men who are selling this property to the Government, Oakman & Eldredge, redge, are not new acquaintances here. These same gentlemen received the appropriation made two years ago of $123,000. I read from the Republican paper I have before referred to:

"In 1861 Messrs. White & Darrow were owners of the wharf next adjoining the navy-yard wall. They, or one of them at least, had done business thereon for many years. But they finally wanted to sell, and sought a purchaser in the United States. But though application was made to the proper officers, and though the property was offered for $75,000 or less, the owners were unable to sell it. They were made to understand the United States did not want it. They thereupon sold it to Messrs. Oakman & Eldredge in 1861 for $65,135. These gentlemen added certain improvements, and shortly after sold the whole to the United States for $123,000. The sale was consummated by a cession of jurisdiction on the part of the Commonwealth by an act passed on April 30, 1862."

That was the item to which I called the attention of the House when this item was under consideration before. More than two years ago you appropriated for the enlargement of this very wharf $123,000. It now turns out that these same stock-jobbers purchased it at $65,000, made some improvements, and immediately afterwards transferred it to the Government for $123,000, when the men who sold it to them had offered it to the Government for $75,000.

Another fact: it was said that the Government ought to secure this land at once, because the owners were not anxious to sell and would only extend the offer of the land to the Government for a short time; we should be prompt, therefore, in securing it upon such favorable terms. Such was the argument. This paper referring to the apparent absence of anxiety to sell says:

"It was confidently stated in the debate in the Senate, and by individual Senators who favored the measure in conversation, that Oakman & Eldredge were not at all desirous of carrying through the trade, and had quite as lief retain the property as sell it at the proposed price. This seemed, even then, strange, in view of the fact that the cession of jurisdiction had been asked for by them, and not by any officers of the Government; that their private counsel appeared before the committee to urge it; that Mr. Oakman was present at Washington then urging it, and it was apparent a lobby member or more was engaged upon the House. The Senate, upon consideration of the proofs, however, by the very decisive vote of 25 to 11, rejected the appropriation. Immediately upon the receipt of this intelligence in Massachusetts, Mr. Oakman again left for Washington. We think he yet remains there. And the telegraph reports that the measure is revived, with fresh proofs, before the Committee of Ways and Means. This again seems strange, if, as has been so often and so earnestly represented, the owners do not desire to sell at the proposed price. Accordingly, the mayor, in pursuance of the duty cast upon him by the city council, has forwarded to Washington some fresh affidavits, and among the facts related therein is one to this effect: that when Messrs. Oakman & Eldredge bought Brinall's wharf, Mr. Oakman said he was paying too great a price for it, that it was not worth so much, and that if he did not succeed in selling it to the United States at any time within one year he would give Mr. Hittiger $10,000 to take it back!"

So that Oakman & Eldredge pocketed from the Government for the sale of this very ground the difference between $65,000 and $123,000 less than three years ago, buying the property for that very purpose. And now they propose the same game, and the Senate, indignantly frowning upon corruption and fraud, reject the amendment; and now gentlemen are urging, with all these proofs before them and the country, that this fraud shall be consummated by the pertinacious obstinacy of this House.

Mr. KING. I certainly will not gainsay the declarations of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means or of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the different versions which have been given of this matter. Doubtless they have given their versions upon what they consider to be good grounds, but every step taken in the progress of this matter confirms me in the opinion that this House would be doing a very great wrong in making this appropriation under the circumstances.

Now, there is a difference of opinion in reference to this thing, right upon the ground there at Charlestown. We are not able to determine whether those who made the affidavits introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] or those who made the affidavits introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] are correct; but that difference certainly makes an issue, and leaves the matter so doubtful that I am unwilling to vote $135,000 out of the public Treasury until that doubt is removed. I will not undertake to say which of them are right; but my opinion is that there is some scheme on foot by which these parties, who are seeking to sell this property to the Government, are to make a very large speculation. It seems that they doubled their money upon a sale connected with this property only two years ago; and now it seems they will make no trade unless they can about double their money again, according to the version of those parties whose testimony has been read here. The editor of that newspaper published at the place where the property is situated says they are trying now to have an act passed by which they are to double their money. I do not object to that if the property is worth it; but right upon the top of that it appears that these parties proposed to sell back the property to the party from whom they purchased it for $10,000 less than they paid, provided they did not sell it to the Government.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to a statement made in one of these articles. It is stated that the affidavits of a large number of the most experienced and competent men were furnished that the portion of the wharves proposed to be sold for $135,000 would be dear at $60,000, and that the portion retained from the two wharves by Oakman & Eldredge was worth as much or more than that they propose to sell; so that they would retain one half of the value of that for which they paid $104,000, and sell the other half for $135,000. This evidence came from the owners of wharf property in the neighborhood, from merchants, from wharf builders, and from gentlemen who sell real estate, and who have the best knowledge of these affairs.

It seems from that statement that they propose to retain more than one half of this property in value, and to receive for the remaining one half $135,000, being $31,000 more than they paid for the whole property. I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts explain that.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for the opportunity of replying to that statement. I stated when I was on the floor before that the whole cost of this property to Oakman & Eldredge, according to the evidence submitted to the House, was $104,000. Upon it they have made improvements costing from twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars. That makes the net cost of the property something more than one hundred and thirty thousand dollars as it stands to-day. A certain portion of this property is of no practical use whatever to the Navy Department, and therefore Oakman & Eldredge propose to sell to the Navy Department all that is of value of that which cost $130,000 for $135,000.

In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the part which the owners reserve is worth as much or more than that which they propose to sell to the Government, I will say to him distinctly that Oakman & Eldredge offer to sell the entire property to the Government for $160,000, which only amounts to $25,000 for the part that they retain. Then, sir, how preposterous it is to come in here and say that the portion which they propose to retain for themselves is worth as much or more than what they propose to sell to the Government, when they ask $135,000 for the part which they will sell to the Government, but will sell the whole for $160,000! The simple truth is that there is confusion in respect to this subject, as I apprehend, growing out of the fact that two purchases were made, and gentlemen have got into their minds the sum paid for one wharf and the sum paid for another without combining the two together.

In reply to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. KING,] who raises a doubt in regard to the value of this land upon the suggestion that we have affidavits upon the one side that the land is worth sixty or seventy thousand dollars, and on the other side that it is worth all that the Government proposes to pay for it, I desire to ask him how he will decide a question of this kind? Will he set aside the opinion of Admiral Gregory, and of Admiral Stringham, and Commodore Montgomery, and of the Secretary of the Navy, and the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and the civil engineer of the yard, and, I believe, of every officer of the Navy who has given any opinion upon this subject? Will he set the opinions of all these officers aside, and consider them of only equal value to the article in a newspaper, which was submitted here by the gentleman from Indiana? I do not know who wrote that article in the newspaper. I have seen it only since I came into the House. But I simply say, without impugning the motives of the writer of that article, and without impugning the motives of any man who opposes this purchase, that all the evidence we have on the subject, which we are bound to receive, is in favor of these two things: in the first place, that this purchase is absolutely necessary for the use of the Government; and in the second place, that the price is a fair one.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will, with great pleasure.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me say to the gentleman that if it is true that there is some conflict as to the value of this property, if the citizens of Charlestown, being on the spot, have misconceived its value, and these naval officers living abroad can understand the matter no better than the citizens there do, is it not a much safer policy if the Government really needs this land to let it be regularly condemned under the law which we are to pass for the condemnation of property required by the Government?

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman that that bill has already passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. So much the better. Then there is a law upon the statute-book to avoid these chances of fraud and speculation upon the Government, a law for the proper and legitimate condemnation of property if it is needed for the public use, just such a law as we should have had in force from the beginning of the Government, and which would not only have saved millions of money, but would have prevented an ocean of frauds committed on the Government.

Now, sir, here is the judgment of the city of Charlestown in relation to the value of this property. I read from the Republican paper to which I before referred:

"It was and is no part of the purpose of the city of Charlestown to check the growth or expansion or prosperity of this naval station. If all its territory were really needed by the Government it would be cheerfully surrendered, and so of any portion. But it opposes what it deems an improvident purchase, for the reason that, if consummated, it will be a loss to the United States not less than to the city, and, indeed, the public at large. Besides, at a time when the public Treasury is attacked by a vigor greater than that which is exerted against the enemy in arms, it was thought to be a plain duty to furnish the facts important to be known by those who are its custodians, in order to an intelligent discharge of their duties."

And now, if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that if, with this light before us, without a clear knowledge that this land is necessary, without a clear knowledge of its value, and with a law on the statute book authorizing the condemnation of this property—if under these circumstances we permit this fraud to be consummated, it will reflect severely on the integrity of the Government.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. With all due respect to the gentleman from Indiana, I submit that it is hardly fair for him to characterize this enterprise as a fraud. I do not believe there is any evidence before him or before the House to justify him in characterizing it as a fraud. In doing so he charges fraud on one of the highest Departments of the Government; and on a large number of gentlemen whose integrity, so far as I know, stands unimpeached here and elsewhere.

I want to say a single word more in reply to the gentleman from Indiana. I understood him to advocate the forcible seizure of this property, that it might be converted to Government purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. If required for Government use.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am quite surprised to hear from the honorable gentleman an advocacy of a measure of so harsh a character. I thought he was one of those who did not believe in the assumption of arbitrary powers on the part of the Government. I believe there is not an instance on record where the Government has ever from its foundation to this day seized a piece of property for the establishment of a navy-yard or for any similar purpose whatever. And I am greatly surprised that in this time, here, when there is an opportunity to make a fair purchase and for a use declared to be necessary by all the officers of the Government who have any knowledge of it—a purchase which two committees of this House have sanctioned, which this House itself has sanctioned—the gentleman from Indiana should come here and declare that the Government is incompetent either to ascertain the value of this property or to conduct a negotiation for it on ordinary business principles, and should recommend that the Government should with an iron hand seize the property of these private citizens and convert it to public use, paying for it whatever the Government might see fit. For my own part, I protest against such a proceeding under such circumstances, or until it shall become a matter of necessity.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to say a word?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRINNELL. I rise to a point of order. My friend from Indiana has already spoken three times on this subject, and I want to limit him to half an hour. I desire to speak myself.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in assailing the provision for condemnation of lands for the use of the Government, assails the policy of probably every State in the Union. He comes in at a very late moment to assail that policy; after him, and myself, and all others, permitting that bill to pass through without one dissenting voice. But now, when the principle touches the State of Massachusetts, the gentleman is very indignant.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, how can I limit this debate? There must certainly be some way to limit it.

Mr. HOLMAN. We gave the gentleman from Pennsylvania all the time he wanted.

Mr. STEVENS. Not one twentieth part of the time the gentleman has occupied.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, in the chair.) The Chair is informed that debate is going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRINNELL. I deny that as a matter of fact.

Mr. KING. I will resume the floor. I have yielded first to one gentleman and then to another, with a desire to elicit the true facts of the case. I do not know enough about the case to undertake to form an opinion or to pronounce that a fraud is manifestly intended to be perpetrated on the Government. But there is just such a case presented here as to justify me in asking the House whether it is prepared to vote $135,000 for the purchase of this property. If the Government absolutely needs it, and if the owners will not accept a fair value for it, it can be seized and a fair value paid for it. The Government would not pretend to take it upon their own valuation. If they do seize private property for public purposes they will have to adopt some rule by which a fair valuation of that property can be arrived at.

For one, I am not content to vote for this appropriation with all the facts that have been developed in the course of this discussion. I do not desire to detain the House; I simply rose to call the attention of the House to these facts; and I will add that after the testimony which has been presented to-day in support of the propriety of this appropriation I confess that I do not feel enlightened by it; but on the contrary it has only served to confirm me in the opinion that the appropriation ought not to be made.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question upon this amendment of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in—ayes 56, noes 38.

Add:
And be it further enacted, That the United States Naval Academy shall return to and shall use the Naval Academy grounds in Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, before the commencement of the academic year, 1865.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a concurrence.

Mr. DIXON. The Naval Academy has actually been at Annapolis until the breaking out of this rebellion. It was then thought necessary by the Secretary of the Navy that it should be removed. When it is deemed proper, the same authority can return it to Annapolis. I understand that the Secretary of War declines to surrender the buildings, which are now used as a military station. It may be as important in 1865 as it is to-day, and however important it may be to the War Department, if we pass this law and do not repeal it the next session, the Naval Academy must occupy the property which is there. It seems to me that if it is necessary or proper at any time that this act should pass, its passage should be postponed until a future time, and until the necessity and propriety is apparent that this property can be used by the Naval Academy to the advantage of the Academy and of the country.

As I said before, there is no necessity of passing this law, for the reason that the power and authority already exist in the Department to remove the Academy if they see fit.

Mr. STEVENS. This Academy was removed to Newport from necessity, and that necessity has ceased to exist. There is no reason, therefore, that we know of, why the Academy should not be returned to Annapolis. A year is given before it is to be done, and if before that time circumstances should be altered, this law can be repealed.

But there are various reasons connected with the discipline of the School why it should not be at Newport. Newport is a large and fashionable place, subject, of course, to all the vices which always attend upon large cities. It is no place to send young men for education of any kind. I do not speak this of Newport more than of any other large place. I believe it is always better to have seminaries of learning in small villages, where there are but few temptations to vice. At Annapolis there are but very few people. It is a small village, and just about the right size for any institution. It is in a healthy climate, it is always open to the sea, and the frosts never interfere with the navigation. Last year I voted against this same proposition because I thought Maryland was not yet redeemed, and I was unwilling to vote to return the Academy there until she was redeemed. But I am glad to believe that that time has now arrived, and I am ready now to vote for the removal.

I learn that the expenses to be saved will be between seventy-five and one hundred thousand dollars; and I also learn that it is the desire of the faculty and professors of that institution that it should be returned to Annapolis.

Mr. DIXON. In what way is that money to be saved?

Mr. STEVENS. It is so stated by those who have examined the matter; but I have not inquired into it.

Mr. DIXON. The Naval Academy has been very largely increased in numbers since its removal to Newport. The accommodations at Newport were supposed to be temporary, and the accommodations at Annapolis were not entirely equal to the numbers there previous to its removal.

Mr. CRESWELL. I will say to the gentleman that the accommodations there were ample.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know how much rent the Government is now paying at Newport?

Mr. DIXON. I do not know.

Mr. STEVENS. There is a large item of saving in that.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Last amendment:

Amend the title by adding thereto the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the several votes by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, reported back from the select committee on the Pacific railroad a bill (H. R. No. 191) to authorize and aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Pacific railroad in California with the Columbia river in Oregon; which was recommended, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments proposed by the House to the original text of the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the Army for the year ending June 30, 1865; that the Senate insist upon its ninth amendment, disagreed to by the House; and that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate to said bill; and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on said bill; and have appointed Messrs. FESSENDEN, WILSON, and HENDERSON such committee upon the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 160) granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin.

Also, that the Senate have passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) for the payment of volunteers called out for not less than one hundred days.

THE REBELLIOUS STATES.

The SPEAKER. The next business is the consideration of the bill in relation to the rebellious States, upon which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Speaker, when I took my seat as a member of this Congress I was impressed with a sense of the responsibilities which attach to the position, and the magnitude of the questions which were to claim our attention. We are in the midst of a gigantic war, such as the world has never before seen. Our democratic form of Government has suddenly and violently been put to the severest test. The opponents of our system of Government have been compelled, in view of our unparalleled prosperity, to admit its superiority in time of peace; but they have told us, tauntingly, that whenever internal commotion should arise we should find our form of government inadequate to withstand the shock, and should go down beneath the bloody surges of battle, as other republics have gone before. The time foretold is now upon us. The shock has come with terrible force. The world holds its breath and awaits the issue. Crowned heads and the devotees of despotism are exulting in the hope of our downfall; while the down-trodden, the oppressed, and the liberty-loving masses of all lands are continually offering prayers for our success. It is a struggle between freedom and despotism, not only for us, but for the world. Never, perhaps, were such weighty issues committed to the arbitrament of the sword. In this view of the struggle in which we are engaged our action becomes important. All our efforts should be directed to the success of our mutual cause—the suppression of the rebellion and the salvation of our common country. With these views, and in this spirit, I have thus far contented myself in being a quiet worker with my associates. And now, did I not feel that the course pursued by the members on the other side of this Hall is calculated to undermine the people's confidence in the Government, create discord among those who should be agreed, dishearten our friends, encourage our enemies, and prolong the war, my voice would not be heard to-day.

Gentlemen on the other side have indulged in the most extravagant declarations as to what they would do if the people could be induced to give back to them the administration of the Government. In the face of the fact that they continued in power till seven States had defied the authority of the Government and the war fully inaugurated, they have the hardihood to tell us if their counsels had prevailed the rebellion would not have occurred. They persist in characterizing this as "Lincoln's war," "Black Republican war," "abolition war," "war for the niggers," a "hellish crusade," carried on in "violation of the Constitution," &c., &c. They evidently hope by continually ringing the changes on these terms into the ears of the people to conceal the real facts in the case and divert the attention of the country from the record which the history of the last four years has made for them.

I have been compelled to listen to these charges for five months on this floor, and from other Democratic sources ever since the commencement of the war. I therefore deem it my duty to deny the allegations and repel the slander, and, so far as I may be able in the time allotted me, appeal to the facts in the case to sustain my position and place the responsibility of the war and its continuation where it belongs.

To show the success which attended the last effort of the Democratic party to conciliate their southern brethren and their adaptation to that kind of work, I propose to refer to a piece of history that is familiar to all, especially to gentlemen over the way. On the 3d day of May, 1860, the party known as the National Democratic party met at Charleston, South Carolina, for the purpose of adopting a platform of principles and nominating candidates for President and Vice President to be supported by the party in the election then approaching. To this convention no "northern fanatic" was invited. There was no Wendell Phillips, no Cheever, no Beecher, no Garrison, no Greeley, and not a single black Republican to interrupt the free flow of brotherly love and the exercise of "concession," "compromise," and "peace." In short, there were no abolitionists to "molest or make them afraid." Being free from all these fanatical elements, which they say have produced the war, it would be reasonable to suppose that the men who are now such devoted disciples of peace might have kept peace in their own brotherhood. But not so. The southern members determined to obtain more explicit acknowledgment as to the rights of their peculiar institution in the Territories. The northern delegates objected. They had made a good run with Buchanan on the Cincinnati platform four years before, by giving it one construction in the South and another in the North; and they were assured that with the same platform the same thing could be successfully played again. They (the northern delegates) proposed to leave the whole question of slavery in the Territories to the decision of the Supreme Court. By this they hoped to keep that exciting question out of the canvass and prolong Democratic rule another four years. To this proposition the southern members objected. Mr. Glenn, a member of the convention from Mississippi, said:

"Sir, at Cincinnati we adopted a platform on which we all agreed. Now, answer, ye men of the North, of the East, of the South, and of the West, what was the construction placed upon that platform in the different sections of the Union? You at the West said it meant one thing, we at the South said it meant another. Either we were right or you were right; we were wrong or you were wrong. We come here to ask you which was right and which was wrong."

Mr. Milton, of Florida, accused the northern Democrats of having "hardened their hearts and stiffened their necks against the South." Mr. Yancey, of Alabama, made a very sensible remark, when he said in the convention, "You gave up the real ground of battle, the key-note to success, when you acknowledged that slavery was wrong." "You are now," he says, "in no condition to defend it." After quarreling in the convention for ten long days, with no result but the secession of a large portion of the southern members, they adjourned. And after six weeks spent in consultation and in earnest effort to restore harmony, they came together at Baltimore agreeably to adjournment, only to renew the old family quarrel. And at the end of six days, spent in alternately "compromising," "conceding," and quarreling, they divided, and two Democratic presidential tickets were put in nomination. If the northern delegates had been willing to yield a tithe of what they have since demanded of Congress and the Administration the southern delegates would have been satisfied. But they would not. It is said the South has been driven out of the Union by the friends of the Administration. By the same process of reasoning I might say to the opponents of the Administration, You drove them out of your convention. They seceded from the convention because you would not yield to their demands. They seceded from the Union because a majority of the people had voted against their demands. You drove them, nearly all, out of the Charleston convention, and when new delegates were elected, and every southern State except South Carolina knocked at the doors of the Baltimore convention for admission, and assured you that if you refused them they would dissolve the Union, you drove them away also. It is not for me to say that your action was wrong. I am only applying to you the same rule you apply to us. This was before the manhood of your party was entirely ground out, as evinced in a brief speech made in the Baltimore convention by Mr. Church, of New York. Mr. Church said:

"One question after another has been presented to us, and we have been asked to yield this point and that point, and we have never failed to respond whenever we have been asked, until we are required to yield up everything which distinguishes our manhood—nay, more, everything which distinguishes the manhood of two hundred thousand Democrats behind us."

These words were well spoken, and contained what you all know to be truth, but they were the last expiring sounds of Democratic "manhood." I recognize on the rolls of the convention the names of some of the members of this House.

They could not save their own party from disintegration; they proved themselves entirely incompetent to save the country from the same fate when they had the power, and now they come here and ask the American people to trust them to restore the Government they have so sadly mutilated! But the people are not again to be cheated. From the granite hills of New Hampshire, the valleys of Connecticut, the fertile fields of Maryland, from almost every ballot-box in the land, there goes up one rebel-extinguishing, copperhead-crushing, Union-inspiring, No!

Gentlemen on the other side persist in applying to us such terms as "negro-worshippers," friends of the "everlasting negro," &c. Now, I have never met a class of men from the ends of whose tongues and pens the expression of thoughts pertaining to the negro run off so easily, so rapidly, and so naturally, and whose resolutions and speeches are so burdened with such thoughts, as these Democratic gentlemen. Take the convention to which I have referred as an example. None but Democrats were allowed to take part; and yet, as usual, the first question introduced was the negro question. The negro was in every speech, every resolution, every vote, and, apparently, in every thought of the convention. And, after sixteen long days spent in this way, the negro was the rock on which they split. And when that party has become so obnoxious as to be a stench in the nostrils of all good men, as it is fast becoming, an indignant people will bury it out of sight, and, borrowing an expression as familiar in every well-regulated Democratic family as "household words," they will write upon its tombstone "Died of nigger on the brain."

All the South demanded in the convention that was not willingly granted by the northern delegates was a recognition of their right to take their slave property into the Territories and have it protected there. This proposition was rejected by the very men who, a few months later, became enamored with the Crittenden proposition, so called, and who have not ceased from that time to the present to point to that as the "golden opportunity" when the rebels might have been made our friends. This measure would have had, if passed, no other effect than to demonstrate anew the capability of the northern people for self-abasement, as subsequent events have fully shown. By this proposition, the Constitution "as it is," about which our Democratic friends are now so very tenacious, was to be so amended that slavery would be fastened more strongly on the people. The right of Congress to abolish slavery in territory under its immediate jurisdiction was forbidden. The right to transport slaves from one State to another was to be guaranteed; thus practically making every State in the Union a slave State, by allowing the master to carry the slave code of his own State into any other State, with power to enforce it there. The Government was to pay to the owner of fugitive slaves, in case he should be prevented from capturing them by force, the full value of the slaves. All the territory of the United States south of 36° 30'—nearly as large as the thirteen original States—was to be dedicated to slavery during its territorial condition; thus making it morally certain that these Territories would eventually become slave States. All these guarantees were to be secured to slavery by constitutional amendment; with the further provision that no future amendment of the Constitution should affect these or the existing provisions pertaining to that subject, or "which shall authorize or give to Congress any power to abolish or interfere with slavery in any of the States by whose laws it is or may be allowed or permitted." As a consideration for all these new constitutional protections for slavery, and as an equivalent for them, it was magnanimously conceded that the provision in the fugitive slave law, which gave a bribe, in the shape of a double fee, to the commissioner for remanding the accused to slavery, should be so amended that the fee should be the same whether the decision should be in favor or against the claimant. This is what is called "compromising" with slavery!

The American people had just declared in the election of Mr. Lincoln, on the Chicago platform, that slavery should not be carried into territory then free. The President and the members of Congress elected by the people on that issue were required to repudiate every obligation that rests on public officers to respect and maintain inviolate the principles on which they were elected. The Administration was requested to do just what the American people had instructed it not to do, and what both the old parties had repeatedly refused to do. Strange as it may appear to the world, we were required by men professing to act from democratic principles to surrender the right of a constitutional majority to rule, and transfer it to a defeated minority. All these demands were made upon the loyal people of the country to win back to their allegiance a few thousand rebels who wickedly wrested the Government of a portion of the States from the loyal people, whose right it was to rule; threatened and bullied them into submission; stole the property of the Government; murdered its citizens; incited the merciless savage to the most terrible deeds of outrage and murder known in modern history; laughed at the efforts of the Government to strike down their rebellious hands, and declared they would not come back into the hated Union even if they were given a sheet of white paper on which to dictate their own terms.

To the declaration so often made on this floor that the Administration and its friends are responsible for the war I answer:

1. If the South had any cause for complaint, the Democratic party, and not the Union or Republican party, is responsible for it. They had controlled the Government, with but brief interruptions, for sixty years; and when the rebel States seceded, though a Republican President had been elected, the Democrats had a majority both in the Senate and House of Representatives, and would have been able to hold an effectual check upon the executive branch of the Government. If they had not given the southern people their rights it was their own fault.

2. There was no ground for complaint. The southern States had continued in the enjoyment of all their constitutional rights, and, so far as the election of Mr. Lincoln was concerned, they never stood on a firmer basis than at the time of secession. This declaration is corroborated by the testimony of leading Democrats, both North and South. Mr. Douglas, in his speech delivered in Chicago, May 1, 1861, said:

"They [the rebels] assume, on the election of a particular candidate, that their rights are not safe in the Union. What evidence do they present of this? I defy any man to show any act on which it is based. What act has been omitted to be done? I appeal to these assembled thousands, that so far as the constitutional rights of slaveholders are concerned, nothing has been done and nothing omitted of which they can complain."

"There has never been a time from the day Washington was inaugurated first President of these United States when the rights of the southern States stood firmer under the laws of the land than they do now; there never was a time when they had not as good cause for disunion as they have to-day. What good cause have they now that has not existed under every Administration?"

"If they say the territorial question: now, for the first time, there is no act of Congress prohibiting slavery anywhere. If it be the non-enforcement of the laws, the only complaints that I have heard have been of the too rigorous and faithful fulfillment of the fugitive slave law. Then, what reason have they?"

"The slavery question is a mere excuse. The election of Lincoln is a mere pretext."

"The present secession movement is the result of an enormous conspiracy formed more than a year since, formed by leaders in the southern confederacy more than twelve months ago."

I desire to call the special attention of those men who persist in attributing all our difficulties to "northern aggression" to the following extracts from a speech of the present vice president of the southern confederacy, Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, delivered in the secession convention of Georgia, in January, 1861:

"What right has the North assailed? What interest of the South has been invaded? What justice has been denied, and what claim founded in justice and right has been withheld? Can either of you to day name one governmental act of wrong deliberately and purposely done by the Government at Washington of which the South has a right to complain? I challenge the answer."

"We have always had the control of the General Government, and can yet if we remain in it, and are as united as we have been. We have had a majority of the Presidents chosen from the South, as well as the control and management of most of those chosen from the North. We have had sixty years of southern Presidents to their twenty-four, thus controlling the executive department. So of the judges of the Supreme Court, we have had eighteen from the South, and but eleven from the North; although nearly four fifths of the judicial business has arisen in the free States, yet a majority of the court has always been from the South. This we have required, so as to guard against any interpretation of the Constitution unfavorable to us. In like manner we have been equally watchful to guard our interests in the legislative branch of Government. In choosing the presiding presidents (pro tempore) of the Senate, we have had twenty-four to their eleven. Speakers of the House we have had twenty-three and they twelve. While the majority of the Representatives, from their greater population, have always been from the North, yet we have so generally secured the Speaker, because he, to a greater extent, shapes and controls the legislation of the country."

"Attorney Generals we have had fourteen, while the North have had but five. Foreign ministers we have had eighty-six, and they but fifty-four."

"We have had the principal embassies, so as to secure the world's markets for our cotton, tobacco, and sugar, on the best possible terms. We have had a vast majority of the higher offices of both Army and Navy, while a large proportion of the soldiers and sailors were drawn from the North. Equally so of clerks, auditors, and comptrollers, filling the Executive Departments. The records show for the last fifty years that of three thousand thus employed, we have had more than two thirds of the same, while we have but one third of the white population of the Republic."

"A fraction over three fourths of the revenue collected for the support of the Government has uniformly been raised from the North. Pause now while you can, gentlemen, and contemplate carefully and candidly these important items."

I might continue these quotations to any length, but those I have given are sufficient for my present purpose.

3. The rebel government had been organized, and through the aid and coöperation of the traitors in Mr. Buchanan's Government they had thoroughly prepared for war, and the issue—abject subjection to the malcontents, and the dismemberment of our once glorious Union, or war for the maintenance of the national unity—was fully made up, and transmitted from Mr. Buchanan's to Mr. Lincoln's Administration. In December, 1860, three months before Mr. Lincoln's term commenced, seventy thousand stand of arms in Charleston, which Mr. Floyd had placed in the care of the South Carolina rebels, were taken possession of for the rebel government. On the 25th of the same month, Major Anderson was obliged to abandon Fort Moultrie and seek refuge in Fort Sumter. On the 7th day of January, 1861, about two months before Mr. Lincoln's inauguration, the Richmond Dispatch announced that Virginia was prepared efficiently to arm twenty-five thousand troops. On the 14th day of February, 1861, forty-two self-constituted Democratic representatives of seven rebellious States met at Montgomery for the purpose of organizing a rebel government within the old Union. And on the 18th of February, fifteen days before the expiration of Mr. Buchanan's term of office, Jefferson Davis, having abandoned his seat in the United States Senate, was inaugurated the head of this self-constituted government. Immediately after Mr. Davis's inauguration, a member of their military committee said:

"We have arms in abundance. Every State has amply prepared itself to meet any emergency that may arise, and is daily purchasing and receiving cannon, mortars, shells, and other engines of destruction, with which to overwhelm the dastard adversary. Organized armies now exist in all the States, commanded by officers brave, accomplished, and experienced; and even should war occur in twenty days I feel confident that they have both the valor and the arms successfully to resist any force whatever. Let the issue come, I fear not the result."

On the 19th of December, 1860, Mr. Miles, a former member of Congress, in a speech made in the South Carolina convention, stated that the following, among other things, was said to Mr. Buchanan:

"It is our solemn conviction that if you attempt to send a solitary soldier to these forts, [in Charleston harbor,] that the instant the intelligence reaches our people, and we shall take care that it does reach them, for we have sources of information in Washington so that no orders for troops can be issued without our getting information, these forts will be forcibly and immediately stormed."

About the middle of November, 1860, Hon. L. M. Keitt, in a public speech, declared that "Mr. Buchanan was pledged to secession, and he intended to hold him to it."

The following from Mr. Buchanan's message to Congress, December 3, 1860, while it attests the truth of Keitt's statement, stamps Mr. Buchanan and the entire Democratic party that adhered to him with everlasting infamy. He says:

"After much serious reflection I have come to the conclusion that no such power [the power to coerce a State into submission] has been delegated to Congress or to any other department of the Federal Government."

The Constitution, Buchanan's organ, published in this city, in its issue of December 21, 1860, condemned all attempts to arrest the disunion movement at the South, and argued that it was the duty of Congress to "waste no further time in ineffectual scheming, but address itself promptly to the various considerations involved in the ac-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1864.

NEW SERIES...No. 130.

tion of the seceding States. Congress should so employ its opportunities that the act of secession may be consummated with the least possible amount of ill feeling and inconvenience on either side." January 31, 1861, this Democratic organ suspended its publication, announcing that its issue would be resumed in about one month at the capital of the southern confederacy. Comment is unnecessary. A more disgraceful record has not been made by any party on the face of the earth than that made by the leaders of the Democratic party during the last four years.

4. I answer, this is emphatically a Democratic rebellion, inaugurated by Democrats, under a Democratic Administration, by its knowledge and consent; stimulated and encouraged by the promise of powerful aid from the Democrats of the North, and now kept alive by the hope that the "peace Democracy" of the North will come to their aid and allow them to "go in peace." In proof of this declaration, I propose to notice the part which leading Democratic officials took in the inauguration of the rebellion. On the 9th of January, 1861, nearly two months before the close of Mr. Buchanan's Administration, the Star of the West, sailing under the American flag, with supplies for our famishing soldiers in Fort Sumter, was fired into by rebel batteries commanded by Democratic officers and manned by Democratic gunners, thus commencing the war.

Jacob Thompson, Mr. Buchanan's Secretary of the Interior, revealed his treason to the country in a speech which he subsequently made in Mississippi, as follows:

"I sent a dispatch to Judge Longstreet that the Star of the West was coming with reinforcements. The troops were then put on their guard, and when the Star of the West arrived, she received a warm welcome from booming cannon, and soon beat a hasty retreat."

John B. Floyd, then Secretary of War, took good care to so scatter the United States forces to remote parts of the country that they were, as he intended, entirely unavailable. He had also taken care to deplete all the northern forts and arsenals of the most approved arms and munitions of war, and to transfer them to the depositories in the South, taking care that men were placed in command who would surrender their commands with all the Government property whenever the new government, which was to be, should make the demand. Seven hundred and seven thousand stand of arms and two hundred thousand revolvers were thus transferred from the North and taken possession of by the rebel government. Having betrayed his country and polluted her sanctuaries, this Democratic official was, like Mr. Buchanan's organ, very properly transferred to the southern confederacy.

Our Navy, then under the direction of Isaac Toucey, a New England Democrat, consisting of ninety vessels, carrying some twenty-five hundred guns, had, during the time the rebellion was being planned, been so distributed in the different waters of the world that a select committee, appointed by the House of Representatives February 21, 1861, reported that at the time of their appointment the entire naval force available for the defense of the whole Atlantic coast consisted of the steamer Brooklyn, twenty-five guns, and the storeship Relief, two guns; while the former was of too great draught to permit her to enter Charleston harbor with safety except at spring-tide, and the latter was under orders to the coast of Africa with stores for the African squadron. Though a large number of ships were lying in our ports awaiting repairs, and though $646,639 79 of the appropriation for naval repairs for that year remained unexpended, no effort was made to put them in repair.

The Treasury, under the direction of Howell Cobb, of Georgia, was managed no better than the other Departments of the Government, and was brought to the very verge of bankruptcy.

The perfidy of these Democratic officials is only equaled by the effort to reinstate the same party in power that the same acts of treason to the Government may be repeated.

The scenes of violence and murder committed on those suspected of loyalty to the old flag beggars description. One of their vigilance committees in Texas boasted that they had in three months whipped and banished or hung over two hundred abolitionists, including three Methodist ministers. Other similar associations, made up in most cases of leaders of the Democratic party and their adherents in their several localities, were at the same time pursuing the same bloody business. This was the state of the country under Buchanan's Administration. Could we have had at that time an Administration of the Jacksonian stamp long enough to speak and execute just one "BY THE ETERNAL," the rebellion, like that of thirty years before, would have been nipped in the bud, and these millions of treasure and rivers of blood and tears saved.

But, considering the weakness of human nature, and the fact that the South had for many years held the President subservient to their will, it is perhaps no wonder that the old man, then in his dotage, who was acting as an apology for President of the United States, surrounded by advisers such as I have referred to, acting under a promise and solemn pledge, as the rebels claimed, that he would not attempt to "coerce" them, and considering the other fact that his party friends North were committed to the anti-coercion doctrine, and that a large majority of them at that time were in full sympathy with the rebels, declared that the rebellion had attained such "vast and alarming proportions as to place it entirely above and beyond Executive control."

5. All the facts that have come to light during the progress of the war show that the South commenced the rebellion with the expectation based on the assurance of northern Democrats, that a civil strife was to be created in the northern States which would neutralize the power of the Government there, while they would make an easy conquest of this capital, take possession of the public archives, and establish the confederate government as the Government of the United States. Many of their declarations show this expectation.

In a speech made by Mr. Walker, Jeff. Davis's secretary of war, on receiving the news of the fall of Sumter, he gave utterance to this idea in the following language:

"No man can tell where the war commenced this day will end. But I will prophesy that the flag which now flutters the breeze here will float over the dome of the old Capitol at Washington before the 1st of May. Let them try southern chivalry and test the extent of southern resources, and it may float eventually over Faneuil Hall itself."

Mr. Douglas, who had the best of opportunities for judging of the motives and expectations which gave life to the rebellion, in his Chicago speech already referred to used the following language:

"I know they expected to present a united South against a divided North. They hoped in the northern States party questions would bring civil war between Democrats and Republicans, when the South would step in with her cohorts, aid one party to conquer the other, and then make easy prey of the victors. Their scheme was carnage and civil war in the North."

I now proceed to show that this expectation of aid from the northern Democracy was not unfounded. Ex-President Pierce, in a letter to his friend Jeff. Davis, says:

"Without discussing the question of right, of abstract power to secede, I have never believed that absolute disruption of the Union can occur without blood; and if, through the madness of northern abolitionism, that dire calamity must come, the fighting will not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely. It will be within our own border, within our own streets, between the two classes to whom I have referred. Those who defy the law and scout constitutional obligations will, if we ever reach the arbitrament of arms, find occupation enough at home."

During Mr. Buchanan's administration Jeff. Davis made a visit to the North, stopping some weeks in the State of Maine, ostensibly to recruit his health, but, as subsequent events prove, to consult with his political friends there in regard to the course to be pursued by them in the event of the defeat of the Democratic party in the next presidential election.

On his return to Mississippi he made a speech at the capital of the State, in which occurs the following language:

"I am happy to state that during the past summer I heard in many places, what previously I had only heard from the late President Pierce, the declaration that whenever a northern army should be assembled to march for the subjugation of the South they would have a battle to fight at home before leaving the limits of their own State, and one in which our friends claim that the victory will be at least doubtful!"

Why should "the late President Pierce" make this declaration unless he and Mr. Davis had been in consultation about just such a rebellion as was afterwards inaugurated? And why did Mr. Davis so unfold his plans to Mr. Pierce as to call out this declaration unless he understood Pierce to be in sympathy with the movement? How did it happen that Mr. Davis heard "in many places" the same declaration unless he was there for the purpose of sounding the Democratic sentiment on his prospective rebellion, and unless he found willing ears to listen to his propositions?

Jefferson Davis, in one of his speeches in the United States Senate, attributes to Caleb Cushing the declaration that whenever a state of things should occur like that described by Mr. Pierce we of the North should be throttled where we stand.

C. L. Vallandigham, the pet of the Democracy, that "pure patriot," according to the gentlemen on the other side—the man for whom they have shed so many tears—said in the city of New York, November 2, 1860, and repeated in the Cincinnati Enquirer eight days later:

"If any one or more of the States of this Union should at any time secede, for reasons of the sufficiency and justice of which before God and the great tribunal of history they alone may judge, much as I should deplore it, I never would as a Representative in the Congress of the United States vote one dollar of money whereby one drop of American blood should be shed in civil war."

What could be better calculated to encourage the rebellion which was then being organized? What could be the purpose of such declaration in advance unless it was intended to encourage the conspirators? Here was the acknowledged leader of the Democratic party in the popular branch of Congress, just reelected to another term, pledging himself and the power of his great influence with his party to oppose all appropriations necessary to maintain the Union of the States. This man subsequently boasted that he had kept his pledge. No soldier, battling for his country's cause, has ever been clothed or fed by any vote of his. As might be expected, he became endeared to the Democratic party. He was, with great unanimity, made their candidate for Governor of the great State of Ohio, and I have yet to learn of a single Democratic stump orator who was not loud in his praise, or a Democratic paper in the whole country that did not advocate his election.

To go further, and show the sympathy which these men felt for the rebels and the rebellion at the commencement of Mr. Lincoln's term of office, I quote from a speech made in the Senate of the United States by Mr. Lane, of Oregon, the candidate of a portion of his party for Vice President, March 2, 1861, two weeks after Jeff. Davis was inaugurated president of the confederacy. Mr. Lane said:

"Mr. President, I have not words to express my contempt for any man that can apply such terms to such a man as Jefferson Davis. Jefferson Davis a traitor! Treason applied to him! He, the purest and bravest of patriots! He fought for his flag and country when the cowards and poltroons that now dare vilify him were supine at home. He will live glorious in history when they are earth and forgotten."

What could be more encouraging to the rebels than to tell them their chief is to "live glorious in history?" In the same speech he says of the confederate government:

"I look upon that Government as one of the finest experiments on the face of the earth or in the history of mankind; embodying the purest patriotism, the highest order of statesmanship, and the greatest amount of talent and administrative capacity that can be found among the same number of people in any Government on the face of the globe."

The sympathy that existed between the rebels South and their abettors North is most strikingly illustrated in the similarity of their arguments. "Let us alone," said the usurpers who were stealing our property, insulting our flag, murdering our citizens, and plotting, while still in official positions, the overthrow of the Government which had fostered and protected them. "No coercion," responded their northern allies, on the penalty of "blood flowing in our own streets," being "throttled where you stand," marching over "dead bodies of Democrats," &c. If they desired to "adhere to the enemies of the country, giving them aid and comfort," could they have done it more effectually?

This state of things continued till the attack upon Fort Sumter, when the indignation of the people became so aroused that these men found it impossible to breast the irresistible tide. Such was the uprising of the patriotic citizens of the whole country that a large portion of the Democratic leaders were forcibly borne along by the overwhelming force of the loyal masses, and for a while either fell back into studied silence or became loud in their professions of sympathy with the Government. But this silence and these professions of friendship were only for a time. Their true sentiments were held in abeyance, waiting for an opportunity to raise an issue with the Government, upon which they might regain their lost influence before the people. True to this they have pursued a policy which will place their names by the side of the worst enemies of the country, and call down upon their heads the execration of coming generations.

When it was proposed to allow the contrabands to come within our lines and work on our fortifications and be protected from the claims of their rebel masters, they opposed it. When it was proposed to arm the negroes, and thus save a portion of our own sons and brothers for the workshops and the farms, they opposed it. When it was proposed to strike the shackles from the limbs of the black man, who had been the truest friend to our suffering soldiers, braving death itself to impart valuable information to our officers, they opposed it. When we were raising volunteers, they opposed it and said the Army should be filled, if at all, by drafting. When it was proposed to draft, they opposed it and said if we must have troops we should rely on volunteers and not drag unwilling men from their homes. And when the President told them they might take their choice and get the men either by draft or by volunteering, they discovered that it was not best to do either. When it was proposed to confiscate the property of rebels in arms and thus obtain a slight compensation for the mischief they have done us, they opposed it. Indeed, aside from a few of those propositions, where they knew opposition would be the grave of the party while it could not change the result, I am not aware that there has been a single important measure for the suppression of the rebellion which they have not opposed. And when a member of this House, while our brave Army is standing face to face with the rebel army, expresses the hope that we "will never subjugate the South," accompanied by a prayer to Almighty God "that it may never be," eighteen Democratic members vote that he is not even deserving of censure, the larger part of the others declining to vote.

The sympathy and encouragement to the rebels expressed by the Democratic press and Democratic speeches and votes on the floor of Congress have done more to prolong the war than our defeats on the battle-field. The rebels watch our political movements with as much interest as they do our armies, and hail with joy every Democratic triumph.

The Raleigh (N. C.) Progress says:

"We remember to have heard an eminent divine remark, a few months ago, that his only hope of salvation for the South was through the Democratic or peace party of the North."

General Johnston of the rebel army has said they did not expect to conquer by the force of arms, "but through dissensions in the North." The Jackson Mississippian, now published at Atlanta, referring to the subject, says:

"Have our neighbors read the Chicago Times, New York Express, Metropolitan Record, Cincinnati Enquirer, and various other papers of the North which are exponents of the opposition to Lincoln? Have they read the speeches of Bright, Voorhees, Merrick, and various others? Have they ever found in any of these papers or speeches a syllable that did not breathe the most orthodox States rights doctrine and uncompromising opposition to coercion? These are the men we wish to encourage, and these are the men whose success will bring peace."

To show what they mean by "peace," I quote from the Richmond Whig of a recent date:

"For ourselves we are free to say that we are for peace. We want peace. We will have it. We must have it. On any terms? Yes, on any terms which General Lee, standing in Faneuil Hall, may choose to dictate to the base-born wretches who have sought to enslave us."

The Richmond (Virginia) Enquirer, the immediate organ of the rebel government, about the middle of July, 1863, said:

"Let not the people be downcast by the result at Gettysburg, nor by the loss of Vicksburg and Port Hudson. Those losses will be more than made good to us by the disorganization of northern society by the expected triumph of the peace Democracy in the free States."

The Mobile Tribune, speaking of the New York riots, says:

"Those riots are the result of the doctrine taught by the Democratic party, which in New York city has strength enough to defy the Government."

A correspondent of the Chattanooga Daily Gazette says:

"A few days ago I fell in company with a prominent rebel citizen of Chattooga county, Georgia.

"The conversation turned upon the probabilities of Lincoln's reelection to the Presidency of the United States, whereupon he remarked with considerable warmth:

"If Lincoln is reelected we may just as well give up the game, for we can in that case have no hope of gaining our independence. We have been trying to keep up appearances with the hope that the peace men of the United States would be able to carry the election. Our all is staked upon the issue, for it is an absolute impossibility for us to hold out another four years."

I commend these extracts, which might be extended indefinitely, to the careful attention of honest Democrats throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said on the other side of this Hall about a "violated Constitution." But it is a fact worthy of notice that while they hold Mr. Lincoln to the most limited construction of that instrument that can possibly be given, especially in regard to his measures to crush the rebellion, but few, if any, words of complaint are uttered against the rebels who are setting at defiance every constitutional obligation. The whole purpose appears to be to limit the war powers of the President, so as to render him entirely powerless to grapple effectually with the rebellion.

Not being a lawyer, it would not become me to attempt an exposition of the Constitution from a legal standpoint; but I have certain common-sense views about the powers of the Government and the rights of the citizen under the Constitution which I desire to present. I cannot conceive that this Government is under very strong constitutional obligations to Jeff. Davis and his rebel government. Indeed, I am unable to discover what rights he and his rebel crew have under the Constitution they are trampling under their feet which the Government is "bound to respect." When I read what George Washington said in his letter, transmitting the doings of the Constitutional Convention to Congress, that "individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest," I recognize in it a wise and necessary limitation to individual rights, and the duty of the citizen to submit, in times of great emergency like the present, to some personal inconvenience for the general good. When I read, in the judicial construction of the Constitution, "that the Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, either expressly or by necessary implication," I conclude there are some powers which, though not "expressly" stated, are given by "necessary implication," and that among these latter powers may be enumerated the right to arrest and confine disloyal citizens when their liberty endangers the public good; the overthrow of the whole system of southern slavery when that system stands before the Government as a protecting wall to its enemies; the right, though not expressly given, to capture New Orleans, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, and, when we can do it, Richmond, Charleston, and Mobile; in short, to do anything not inconsistent with the rules of civilized warfare that may be necessary to crush the rebellion and effectually remove every element that threatens to bring a similar war upon our children.

When I read in the Constitution that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," I conclude that those who do "adhere to our enemies" and "give them aid and comfort," are, by the common-sense construction, traitors. And when I hear, on this floor or anywhere else, the leaders of a great party declare—as did Vallandigham—they never would "vote one dollar of money" to feed or clothe our soldiers in the field; when they declare, as did the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] that "this Government is dying; dying, sir, dying;" when they characterize the war for the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws, as did the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] as "a hellish crusade;" when they pray Almighty God, as did the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] that we may never subjugate our enemies; when they declare that Jeff. Davis is the "purest and bravest of patriots;" that he will "live glorious in history," and that his government is "one of the finest experiments on the face of the earth or in the history of mankind;" when they aver that nothing has been gained by our armies; when they magnify our defeats and belittle our victories, I confess my inability to see why they are not "adhering to the enemy" and "giving them aid and comfort" in the most effectual manner possible, unless they should adopt the more manly course and join the enemy in the field. Even then it is doubtful whether they could be of as much service to the rebel cause as they are here. I submit, therefore, to the members of this House and the country, whether the acts of these men are not clearly within the constitutional definition of treason.

I will not attempt to judge of the heart of this class of men, but my convictions are strengthened in view of the fact that many of these men, all over the country, have from the beginning appeared to be delighted with every rebel victory and depressed by every Union success. Is there a town or village in the loyal States where many Democrats are not found who, with joyous countenances, nimble feet, and willing tongues, spread the news of rebel successes in the field, but who, when the telegraph announces the success of our arms, retire in sullen silence to their own homes or place of business, with nothing to say, except it be to detract from the importance of the victory or declare the report an "Administration lie?" Who has not noticed when important events have been transpiring in the Army that the news could be as plainly read in the countenances of these men as in the telegraphic columns of the newspapers? Has there ever been a time when this class of men wore such forlorn countenances, when they appeared to be so thoroughly filled with hate and malice, as when the news of the Union victories at Vicksburg, Port Hudson, and Gettysburg followed each other in rapid succession? These remarks are intended especially for those to whom they justly apply, to whose backs the garment I have cut is a fit. They will know how and when to make the application.

In one of the speeches made during the last war with Great Britain by Felix Grundy, of Tennessee, occurs the following description of a thorough-going copperhead which seems to have been spoken for the present day:

"An individual goes over, joins the ranks of the enemy, and raises his arms against the country; he is clearly guilty of treason under the Constitution, the overt act being consummated. Suppose the same individual not to go over to the enemy, but to remain in his own neighborhood, and by means of his influence to dissuade ten men from enlisting; I ask in which case has he benefited the enemy and injured the country most?"

"Whom, then, do I accuse? I accuse him, sir, who professes himself to be the friend of his country and enjoys its protection, yet proves himself by his actions to be the friend of its enemy. I accuse him who sets himself at work systematically to weaken the arm of this Government by destroying its credit and dampening the ardor of its citizens; I accuse him who has used his exertions to defeat the loan and prevent the young men of the country from going forth to fight their country's battles; I accuse him who announces with joy the disasters of our arms, and sinks into melancholy when he hears of our success. Such men I cannot consider friends of this nation."

But there is another class of men calling themselves Democrats to whom the country gives its highest meed of praise, and whose names are embalmed in the affections of the American people. I refer to those men in the Army, in civil life, and in this and the other branch of Congress, who have for the time being forgotten all party prejudices in their devotion to our common country; who, scorning the scoffs and anathemas of their old party associates, have known nothing but duty. All honor to these noble men! They will be gratefully remembered when those who now malign them will wish to blot their present record from the book of remembrance.

Mr. Speaker, the times in which we live are full of interest and big with mighty issues. No man alive to what is transpiring around us can fail to perceive that what these wicked traitors meant for evil God is overruling for ultimate good. The principles enunciated by Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence have slowly permeated the public mind, till now they are pulsating in every nerve and fiber of the body-politic, and demanding in the halls of legislation complete recognition.

The institution of human bondage is a foul blot upon our otherwise glorious system of government. It is subversive of the plainest principles of national economy as well as opposed to the moral sense and great Christian heart of the civilized world. The decree has gone forth from the throne of the Almighty, as evinced in the providences of this war, that slavery must cease with the last struggle of the rebellion. We may shut our eyes to the logic of events, and fight against the teachings of the last three years, but all to no purpose. The very measures resorted to by its friends to prolong its life hasten its dissolution. We may try to crush the rising spirit of freedom, but it is a rock against which men and parties may dash themselves to pieces in the future as they have done in the past.

"Light is flashing through the darkness,
Day is pouring on the nations,
Bondsmen break their heavy burdens,
And the hopeful cry of FREEDOM—
Freedom for the sad and lowly,
Freedom for the pure and holy,
Freedom for the sighing bondman,
Freedom for the serf and subject,
Freedom from the bonds of error,
Freedom from the night of terror—
Hopeful songs of coming Freedom,
Rise from million tongues around us."

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be confined to the bill under consideration, which, in my judgment, involves questions of great importance, and therefore I ask the attention of the House to its provisions. It is entitled "A bill to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government." The first section declares that the President with the consent of the Senate shall appoint for each of these States a provisional Governor, "who shall be charged with the civil administration of such State until a State government therein shall be recognized as hereinafter provided."

The second section provides "that so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States," the provisional Governor shall cause the marshal of the United States to enroll all white male citizens of the United States resident in the State, and to request each to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and in the enrollment to designate those who take and those who refuse to take that oath. This enrollment is to be returned to the provisional Governor; and if the persons taking the oath shall amount to one tenth of those enrolled, he shall by proclamation invite the loyal people of the State to elect delegates to "a convention charged to declare the will of the people of the State relative to the establishment of a State government, subject to and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States."

By the third section the convention is to consist of the number of members which constituted the last constitutional State Legislature, who are to be apportioned by the provisional Governor among the counties of the State. The provisional Governor is to designate the time and the places for holding the election, to appoint commissioners to hold it at each place for voting, and to provide an adequate force to keep the peace.

The fourth section declares that the delegates shall be elected by the loyal white male citizens of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, resident at the time in the district in which they shall offer to vote, and enrolled as aforesaid, or absent in the military service of the United States, and who shall take the oath prescribed by the act of Congress of July 2, 1862. Those in the military service are to vote at the headquarters of their respective commands, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the provisional Governor. This section further provides that no person who has held any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or who has borne arms against the United States, shall vote or be elected as a delegate.

Section five provides that persons known by or proved to the commissioners holding the election to have held any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or to have borne arms against the United States, shall be excluded by the commissioners from voting, although they offer to take the oath prescribed.

The sixth section directs the provisional Governor to convene the delegates elected, to administer to each of them the oath above mentioned, and he is to preside over the deliberations of the convention.

The seventh section is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the convention shall declare, on behalf of the people of the State, their submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and shall adopt the following provisions, hereby prescribed by the United States in the execution of the constitutional duty to guaranty a republican form of government to every State in this Union, and incorporate them in the constitution of the State, that is to say: 1. No person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the usurping power, shall vote for or be a member of the Legislature, or Governor. 2. Involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and the freedom of all persons is guaranteed in said State. 3. No debt, State or confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power, shall be recognized or paid by the State.

The eighth declares that when the convention shall have adopted the above provisions "it shall proceed to reestablish a republican form of government and ordain a constitution containing those provisions," which shall be submitted to the people of the State, entitled to vote under this act, at an election to be held in the manner prescribed for the election of delegates. The provisional Governor is to canvass the votes, and if a majority thereof shall be in favor of the new constitution he shall certify that fact to the President of the United States, who, after obtaining the assent of Congress, shall by proclamation recognize the government so established, and none other, as the constitutional government of the State; "and from the time of such recognition, and not before," the State may be represented in the Congress of the United States.

By the ninth section it is provided "that if the convention shall refuse to reestablish the State government on the conditions aforesaid the provisional Governor shall declare it dissolved." But the President, "whenever he shall have reason to believe that a sufficient number of the people of the State entitled to vote under this act, in number not less than one tenth of those who voted at the presidential election of 1860, are willing to reestablish a State government on the conditions aforesaid," shall direct the provisional Governor to order another election for delegates and hold another convention to proceed in the same manner as the first and upon the same conditions.

The tenth section declares that until a State government shall be formed as above prescribed and recognized by the United States, the provisional Governor in each of these States shall "see that this act and the laws of the United States and the laws of the State in force when the State government was overthrown by the rebellion are faithfully executed;" but no law or usage whereby any person was held to involuntary service shall be recognized or enforced by any court or officer in such State; and it directs the President of the United States to "appoint such officers provided for by the laws of the State when its government was overthrown as he may find necessary to the civil administration of the State, all which officers shall be entitled to receive the fees and emoluments provided by the State laws for such officers."

The eleventh section provides that until the recognition of the State government as aforesaid "the provisional Governor shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, cause to be assessed, levied, and collected for the year 1864 and every year thereafter, the taxes provided by the laws of such State to be levied during the fiscal year preceding the overthrow of the State government, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the States as nearly as may be; and the officers appointed as aforesaid are vested with all the powers of levying and collecting such taxes by distress or sale as were vested in any officers or tribunals of the State governments as aforesaid for those purposes." These taxes are to be applied by the provisional Governor, under the direction of the President, to paying the expenses of administering the laws of the State; and the surplus to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be paid to the State when it shall establish a State government on the conditions prescribed by the act.

The twelfth and thirteenth sections emancipate all persons held to involuntary service in these States; declare them and their posterity forever free; provide that the writ of habeas corpus shall be issued to liberate them if restrained of their liberty, and subjects persons restraining them of their liberty to punishment by fine and imprisonment.

The fourteenth section is that every person who shall hereafter hold or exercise any office civil or military in the rebel service, State or confederate, is hereby declared not to be a citizen of the United States.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a bill which is to be applicable to these States only while rebellion and military resistance against the authority of the United States exists within them, nor is it applicable only to the people in those States who are disloyal to the Federal Government. On the contrary, its leading provisions are to become applicable to these States, in the language of its second section, "when military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States." According to the bill, when that time, so much to be desired by every lover of his country, shall arrive, the loyal people in these States, those who are recognized by this bill as loyal citizens of the United States, qualified to vote and administer their State governments, are not to be permitted to resume and exercise the right of local State government in accordance with the State constitution and laws existing when the rebellion broke out, they are not to be allowed to make a new State constitution subject only to the Constitution of the United States; but, on the contrary, they are to be ruled over and their local State government administered by a provisional Governor and officers appointed by the President, until they consent to and do make a new constitution for their State in accordance with the dictation of the President and Congress as to certain matters.

Although the rebellious power is overthrown—as it must be in the State before the bill can go into operation; although all resistance to the Federal Government is suppressed; although the people have returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States; nevertheless, unless they make a constitution containing the three provisions prescribed in this bill, they are to be governed by officers appointed by the President, who is to fill all the civil offices provided for by the State laws which were in force when the rebellion began. These officers are to execute the State laws; and there is to be no power within the State to change or alter these laws.

I call attention to this because, as was said last evening by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] this bill recognizes that these States are in existence, and that their respective State constitutions and laws are in force the moment the usurped power of those in rebellion is overthrown, and the offices created by the constitution and laws of the State are to be filled by the President, the fees authorized by the State laws are to be paid to these appointees, taxes are to be levied and collected by virtue of State laws, the State laws are to be enforced, but the loyal citizens of the State, those who by the bill are recognized as loyal, can take no part in their State government unless they will make a new State constitution such as we choose to prescribe.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from New York will agree with me that there is a provision in this bill by which a number less than a majority can take the government of the State into their own hands.

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What I desire to ask the gentleman is whether, in his judgment, if that number cannot be found, Congress should yield up the government of these rebellious districts to the people who refuse to acknowledge the Constitution and laws of the United States?

Mr. KERNAN. No, sir. This bill provides that one tenth of the male citizens of each of these States shall take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States before there shall be an election and convention. I am not contending that there should, not be at least this proportion of the people loyal to the Union and Constitution before they can properly resume the administration of their State governments. The point I was suggesting is that by the provisions of the bill under consideration, although the one tenth or one half or all the citizens of one of these States shall cease all resistance, submit to the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and take the oath of allegiance required, they are not permitted to resume the administration of their State government under its old constitution, or to be represented in the Federal Government, or to frame a new constitution for their State, in accordance with that of the United States, unless they incorporate in that new constitution certain provisions which by this bill we dictate to them, and which relate to matters within the exclusive authority of the people of the State.

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that so far as the House committee are concerned they have determined to make the same requirements apply to all States alike hereafter to be admitted. Colorado, Nebraska, and Nevada are all required to comply with these same conditions.

Mr. KERNAN. The admission of a State formed out of territory belonging to the United States is not a parallel case. The States to which the bill under consideration is to apply are existing States; the bill recognizes them as such. They are not to be readmitted to the Union; they are now in law a part of the Union. We are carrying on this war to enforce the authority of the Constitution and laws over them. When resistance ceases, when the usurped authority of those in rebellion in these States is overthrown, the constitution and laws of the State which existed when the rebellion arose will be again in force and vigor, and should be administered by those citizens of the State who never joined in the rebellion, and those who by amnesty are relieved from the penalties of treason.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this bill is in violation and subversive of the fundamental principles upon which both our national and State governments are founded. The Government of the United States is partly national and partly federal in its characteristics. In the sources from which it derives its powers it is partly federal and partly national; in the extent of these powers it is not national; it has not all the powers of government, only those granted to it by the Constitution. In the exercise and operation of its powers it is national. Its authority is operative upon the individual citizen, not upon the States composing the Union. The General Government does not enforce the Constitution and laws of the United States against the States, but upon the individual citizens. The importance of this was fully understood by the framers of the Constitution. In recommending its adoption in the Federalist, they point out the inherent weakness and evil consequences of the want of power in the General Government of prior confederacies to enforce their legitimate authority without coming in direct conflict with the States composing them. This was the great defect in the Grecian confederacy and the Germanic league. The confederate government legislated for States. It could not enforce its commands upon individuals, but was compelled to require States to obey, and when they failed or refused to comply with the laws and decrees of the Federal Government, and the latter attempted to enforce obedience, civil war was the consequence.

The same difficulty existed in the Union formed under the Articles of Confederation, and the evil consequences were already felt when the Constitution was proposed. The framers of the Constitution, therefore, intended to and did avoid this source of weakness and cause of collision between the Federal Government and the States by giving to the former full power to enforce the authority granted to it upon individuals, making it in this respect national and not federal in its character. The powers granted to the Government of the United States by the Constitution were confined to national purposes and objects. As to these powers it is sovereign and supreme, and rightfully commands and can compel the obedience of every citizen of every State. But it has no right to interfere with the people of any State in the formation or administration of their State government. Congress has no right to dictate to a State what shall be the provisions of its State constitution. When Congress does so, and the Federal Government attempts to compel the people of the States to submit to its decrees in this respect, a revolution is attempted in the Government as it was established under the Constitution. The sole power granted to the national reference to State governments is contained in the clause by which each State is to be guaranteed a republican form of government. Subject to this provision or condition, the right of the people of each State to retain the old or form a new State constitution and government is absolute. They do not derive it from the Federal Government. It is inherent in them; they never parted with it. Congress has no more right to dictate to the people of an existing State the provisions which their State constitution shall contain than it has to interfere in regulating the tenure by which property shall be held or transmitted in the State, or in declaring what shall be the relations of husband and wife, or parent and child. Under our system, power is derived by the national Government from the States and the people. It does not confer power upon the people of the States to make, alter, or administer their State governments, nor can it impose conditions upon them in reference to these matters, except that they shall be in accordance with and subject to the Constitution of the United States. The people of the States have never surrendered their right to regulate all local State matters as they please.

Where, then, is our authority to say to the people of a State that they may make a new constitution if they will make it with provisions like those prescribed in the bill under consideration, or that they shall not change their constitution or exercise the rights of local self-government unless they do so as we dictate?

In the grant of power to the Federal Government it is expressly provided that the powers not delegated by the Constitution to the United States nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or the people. The intention was by this to make it clear that the people in the respective States possessed and retained the right of self-government, except so far as they had delegated or limited this right. Certain powers necessary for national purposes were granted to the Federal Government. All others were retained by the people of each State, and they may exercise them in reference to State matters without interference or control. This reservation of power was intended to be and is the safeguard of the liberty of the people. While the people of each State retain and exercise this power, there can be no consolidation of authority in the Federal Government which could be made dangerous to the liberty of the people or the rights of the States, and any attempt by the majority of the people of the United States to wrong or oppress the people of a particular State through the action of the Federal Government will fail. But if Congress, the representative of the people of all the States, may interfere in reference to State governments, then the people of each State will not govern themselves as to their local matters as they please, but may be required to do so according to the dictation of the people of the other States.

I submit, therefore, that this bill is at war with the principles upon which the Federal Government rests, and is subversive of the State governments and the reserved rights of the people of each State to change and administer them. If Congress may impose upon the people of a State the conditions prescribed by this bill as conditions precedent to the exercise of their right to maintain, form, or administer a State government, we may require them to ordain as a part of a State constitution almost any other provision. Congress has no such power. As to States, and the local governments established by the people in them, the Federal Government has no power except to protect the people in the peaceable enjoyment of the republican government which they have established there for themselves. The Constitution of the United States is based upon preëxisting State governments which the people of the respective States may maintain or change at pleasure, being only bound to have them republican in character, subject to the Constitution and within the Union. This bill is in direct conflict with and subversive of all these principles and rights. It prohibits the loyal citizens of a State in which the rebellion has existed from administering their State government under and in subordination to the United States Constitution and laws after the rebellion has been suppressed and all disloyal men expelled from the exercise of their usurped power. It prohibits the loyal citizens of the State from reorganizing their State government by the adoption of a new State constitution and electing their State officers, except and unless they will incorporate in such constitution provisions not required by the Federal Constitution, and which are prescribed by a majority of the people of other States acting through their Representatives in Congress. (See the seventh and eighth sections of the bill.) Until they will do this, no matter how loyal to the Union the majority or all of them may have become, they are to be governed and controlled as to all their State affairs by arbitrary military power responsible only to the President of the United States. (See sections nine, ten, and eleven of the bill.) Nay, until they will comply with the conditions we prescribe they are not to be allowed Representatives in the Congress of the United States. They are as absolutely the subjects of despotic power as were the inhabitants of the Roman provinces who were plundered and tyrannized over by military governors like Verres. And yet this bill is called one "to guaranty to the people of these States a republican form of government!"

I have supposed we were striving to maintain our old governments, national and State, in all their beautiful harmony, and with all their nicely balanced powers and wisely constructed checks; that this war was prosecuted to preserve these, and secure the blessings they have in the past and will in the future confer upon us as a people. But if this bill passes and is put in force, we will have destroyed the system of government transmitted to us, and commenced the construction of a consolidated national Government which will soon extinguish the States and, I fear, the essential liberties of their people. How long, think you, will the people of the northern States bear patiently the burdens and sacrifices of this destructive war for the accomplishment of such a purpose?

Mr. Speaker, the bill not only violates these principles, but it is without warrant in the Constitution of the United States and in violation of its provisions. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] who reported the bill to the House and sustained it on the floor, stated that the authority for it in the Constitution is to be found in the clause which declares that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

For all the purposes of this argument I will concede a broader construction to this provision than has been claimed for it by the advocates of this measure. It is a guarantee for the benefit of the minority of the people of each State, and the majority cannot disavow it or release the United States Government from its fulfillment; each State in the Union has an interest that every other of the States shall maintain a republican government, and therefore all the people of a State cannot discharge the Federal Government from this guarantee and establish for their State a monarchy, but for the benefit of the other States the United States Government is bound to require each State to maintain a republican government; and the State shall be compelled to maintain this republican State government "in this Union," formed by the Constitution. It must be subject to and in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States; and is to be formed and administered by citizens loyal to them.

What, then, is the duty and authority of the Federal Government under this provision as to the States in rebellion? Before the rebellion commenced each of these States had "in this Union a republican form of government." A portion of their people, if you please a very large majority of them, rebelled against the authority of the United States Government, repudiated the Constitution and Union, usurped the powers of the State government, and endeavored to set up and maintain a government without the Union and independent of the United States. The United States under this state of facts is obligated, both to the loyal minority in the State who have been overborne by the rebellious usurpers and to the people of the other States, to suppress the rebellion, restore to the loyal citizens of the State the State government which existed at the time it was usurped by the rebels, and protect them in the administration and enjoyment of it. In this mode alone will the United States fulfill its guarantee. When rebellious citizens have usurped the administration of the State Government, turned its powers against the Federal government and compelled the minority of the people to submit to their usurpation, the duty and the sole authority of the United States is to overthrow the power of the usurpers and restore the loyal people, or the people who under promise of amnesty, submit, to the identical State government the protection and administration of which they were deprived for a time by the insurrection or rebellion. But the United States has no authority or right, when the rebellion is suppressed and all illegal resistance overcome, to say, as we do by this bill, to the loyal people of the State, We will not restore or guaranty to you the republican State government which you had established rightfully, and which existed when the usurpers deprived you of its administration, but we will compel you to form another according to our dictation; and if as freemen, knowing your rights, you refuse to comply, we will deprive you of all political rights and privileges in national or State affairs, and govern you by military power until you submit.

It seems to me that in pursuing this course, so far from guarantying to them the republican government which they had rightfully formed for their State, we aid the usurpers and rebels in overturning the legitimate preëxisting State governments, by effectually completing what they began. This is not our duty or our right under this clause of the Constitution. The United States is to protect the people of the several States against changes in or destruction of their State constitutions and governments by violence. The people of the State have the right, and it is in them only, to peaceably make, reform, or alter their State constitutions. This is the doctrine laid down in the twenty-first number of the Federalist, and this is the principle contended for by Mr. Webster, and established in the Rhode Island case.

We are bound to secure to the people of each State under such State government as they shall see fit to establish, subject to the Constitution of the United States, the right to administer their own affairs, the right to enact and change their own laws as to all local matters. We have guarantied that to them, and we must keep our guarantee, at least to the loyal men. For my part I say that we are bound to do it if there are but a hundred men in the State who have stood by the Union. Never let us say to them, "We fulfill our guarantee to you of a republican form of government in this Union, by the President's mode of allowing a minority of one tenth to govern the rest, or, as this bill requires, by compelling you to adopt a new constitution such as we dictate." We have no right to compel them to adopt any particular provision as to State matters. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] says that this is a political question, and that our judgment is final. Very likely that is so; but that is no reason why we should not act according to the plain meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. ASHLEY. The gentleman from New York will bear me witness that I stated in my speech I gave my support to this bill on no other hypothesis than that the constitutions of these States were destroyed or abolished.

Mr. KERNAN. It is due to say that I have so understood the gentleman from Ohio. This bill, the House will observe, does not so assume. This bill assumes that the States are in existence, and that the State constitutions and laws are in force there. It provides that the President of the United States shall enforce the State constitutions and laws (except as to slavery) which existed at the time the rebellion commenced.

It is said that these State governments have been overthrown, and therefore the General Government has a right to assume this power. It seems to me that all that can be justly claimed is that rebellious men, disloyal men, revolutionary men, have seized upon the machinery of the State government. Would our Government then, if the people of any State in the Union had by sudden violence lost the control of their State government, have the right, when the usurpation is overthrown, to deprive the people of the State who are loyal of the administration of their own affairs? Would it be right for us to say that because we had been unable to protect the people in their rights, and allowed them to be deprived of them temporarily by a usurper, that when we do subdue the usurper we will deny to the loyal people of the State the management of their State affairs?

Mr. LOAN. I desire to ask the gentleman this question. I wish to know how the gentleman proposes to ascertain who are loyal in a given State. As I understand the matter, the bill proposes a method of ascertaining who are loyal.

Mr. KERNAN. I will answer my friend. By this bill, when you have exercised your test, when you have administered your oaths to the requisite number, you then will not allow them to administer their own State government. What I insist is that after you have ascertained that the people, to a requisite number, are loyal, you shall allow them to retain their present constitutions, and not compel them to submit to the conditions on that subject which this bill imposes. I am not now discussing the question as to what shall be the mode of ascertaining who are loyal, or what number there should be in the State to authorize them to resume the administration of the State government.

I wish to see our armies conquer the rebel armies, and drive out the usurpers who have been carrying on this rebellion. The people of these States must be required to submit to all the United States laws. We must insist that they submit to all the laws in relation to the revenue, in relation to the currency, the post office, and all other subjects within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. When they do this there is no necessity that we should, nor in my judgment have we any right to, interfere as to their State governments. They have a right to maintain them as they were when the rebellion commenced, or they may change them. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that it is sometimes said here that the institution of slavery as it exists in these States is inconsistent with "republican government," and that therefore under the clause of the Constitution above quoted Congress has a right to compel the people of the States to abolish it.

Sir, I am no admirer or advocate of slavery. I object to it, believing it to be a great moral and political evil—a wrong to the slave, and, in the long run, a curse to the master. I shall rejoice to see it abolished, if it is done without violating the Constitution of the United States or interfering with the reserved rights of the people of the States to regulate their local institutions. We should not violate the Constitution of the United States or imperil the perpetuity of the Union under it to interfere with it where it exists in the States. We of the non-holding States are not responsible for it, nor are we likely to deal with it wisely for the benefit of the slave or for the peace of the country.

But it is too plain for argument that the institution of slavery as it has existed in the States of the Union is compatible with a republican government within the meaning of the United States Constitution. The States which adopted it were slave States mainly, and the continuance or abolition of the institution was carefully reserved to the people of each State. But the Government which is prescribed to the people of the States by this bill is, in its origin, in violation of the spirit of republicanism. What is a "republican form of government?" One author says:

"Republic: a form of government in which the supreme power belongs to the people, or to a portion of them, and not to a single person or family, as in a monarchy."

Another says it is "a nation or State where the body or only a portion of the people have the government in their own hands; where the people is possessed of the supreme power."

Madison, in the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist, asks and answers the question as to what is a republican form of government. He there says:

"What, then, are the distinctive characters of the republican form?" "If we resort for a criterion to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people." "It is essential to such a government that it be derived from the great body of the society." "It is sufficient for such a government that the persons administering it be appointed either directly or indirectly by the people."

Can there be any doubt, therefore, that the governments in existence in these States at the time the rebellion was inaugurated were republican within the meaning of the Constitution? To make them such it is essential that they be derived from the people governed, not imposed upon them by other Governments, States or people. Nevertheless, we propose by this bill, under the pretense of fulfilling our guarantee to them of a republican form of government, to compel them to adopt a constitution and government as to their local State matters, not originating from themselves, or in accordance with their wishes, but dictated to them by us; and we will trample upon all their rights, and rule over them by our appointees, levying upon and collecting taxes from them for our Treasury without their having any representation until they do our bidding in reference to the details of their State constitution. This is indeed guarantying to them a new kind of republican government! Are we willing to occupy the position before the world, or the American people, in which the passage of this bill will place us? I hope not. Let us suppress the rebellion in these States; drive out those who have usurped the State government, and restore it and the administration of it to those who have been loyal always in their hearts, I trust and believe many such will be found, and to those whom we think it wise and proper to recognize as citizens in each of those States under an amnesty.

Madison says in the forty-third number of the Federalist, commenting upon the clause of the Constitution under consideration:

"But the authority [of the Federal Government] extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution."

And yet we who have taken an oath to support this Constitution, and have no powers except those derived from it, are asked to annul and destroy the then "existing" State governments spoken of by him, instead of guarantying them to the loyal people of the States.

One other suggestion and I will close. I submit that the policy of this bill is unwise. It is not the policy to preserve our matchless Constitution and restore the States and their people to Union under it. Will we relight the fires of patriotism and Union among the southern people by a measure like this? The embers I trust and believe are still there. If not, we may bid adieu to any happy or desirable union of the people of the United States under one Government in our day. They cannot be permanently held together by mere military power. The northern people would not be willing to bear the burdens necessary to perpetually maintain and keep up such a Union. It would curse and desolate the South and be fruitless of good to the North. In holding them as subjects merely to us, if we can do so, in the end we will lose our own liberties. A military despotism would arise out of such a state of things; and our own liberties would be lost as well as the liberties of the people of the South. This is the experience of the world; this the teaching of history.

Mr. GOOCH obtained the floor.

The hour of half past four o'clock, p. m., having arrived, the House took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m., and resumed the consideration of the bill in reference to the

REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. GOOCH. Mr. Speaker, it is a grave mistake for us to suppose that the contest in which we are now engaged has been going on only since the rebels took up arms against the Federal Government. It is almost as old as the Government itself. More than thirty years ago it assumed a form which but for the patriotism, ability, and firm resolution of the man then in the presidential chair to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully to discharge the duties of the high trust which millions of freemen had committed to his charge, would have devolved upon the generation which has preceded us the duties and responsibilities which we are now called upon to meet. It is equally a mistake to suppose that the agitation of the question of slavery has produced this contest. The contest is older than the agitation. It has been going on ever since two antagonistic states of society commenced existence under our republican form of government, each striving for development and the mastery. I do not believe that any intelligent and reflecting man has ever believed that these two antagonistic states of society would or could continue to exist permanently under the same Government. In the early days of the Republic the leading men of both sections of the country looked forward to the time when it should be peacefully, and with the consent of all parties, abolished. When the leading men of the South came to look upon the institution as essential to their prosperity, and to desire its permanence, they at the same time began to look forward to a dissolution of the Union. The remark of Mr. Calhoun to Commodore Stuart, made more than fifty years ago, is precisely to this point. He said:

"That we are essentially aristocratic I cannot deny, but we can and do yield much to democracy. This is our sectional policy; we are from necessity thrown upon and solemnly wedded to that party, however it may occasionally clash with our feelings, for the conservation of our interests. It is through our affiliations with that party in the middle and western States that we hold power; but when we cease thus to control this nation, through a disjointed democracy, or any material obstacle in that party should tend to throw us out of that rule and control, we shall then resort to the dissolution of the Union."

Mr. Calhoun went on to say that:

"The compromises in the Constitution, under the circumstances, were sufficient for our fathers, but under the altered condition of our country from that period leave to the South no resource but dissolution, for no amendment to the Constitution can be reached under the three-fourths rule."

Mr. Calhoun believed the compromises of the Constitution to be sufficient to secure what its authors, the fathers of the Republic, desired and intended—the temporary existence of the institution of slavery—but not suited to the altered condition of the country when the permanent existence of slavery was deemed essential to the prosperity of his section, and, seeing that no amendment could be made to that instrument which would afford that security, he and his disciples wedded themselves to the Democratic party, and determined to stake the existence of their country on the success of that party and their ability to control it. When a tariff was passed, and the law enforced which in his opinion favored the development and growth of the free institutions of the North—beneficial to free society, and therefore prejudicial to slave society—he and his associates threatened nullification, and when, in 1860, his followers saw a "disjointed democracy," and their "power to control the nation" pass away, they attempted dissolution or destruction of the Government.

When nullification had been crushed, General Jackson, seeing that the cause of the conflict between the two sections of the country had not been removed, said:

"The tariff was only the pretext, and disunion and a southern confederacy the real object. The next pretext will be the negro or slavery question."

He felt that he had but prevented for the time being a contest which would be sure to break out again. Nullification did not go far enough to afford an opportunity to destroy its cause. Secession has not only afforded the opportunity, but made it both a duty and a necessity, if we desire to uphold and maintain the Government. Probably the time has been when every member of this House who desired to see his country rid of the institution of slavery has believed that its abolition could and would be peacefully accomplished; that by placing the Federal Government firmly on the side of freedom and preventing the extension of slavery into new territory it could be left to each of the States to determine the time and the mode of emancipation; knowing that although the time might be distant, still the day would come when the moral and material forces of every State would array themselves against it and secure its destruction. I believe now that such would have been the result had not slavery itself willed it otherwise. When it proved itself to be so antagonistic to the great fundamental principles of the Government which must and would be carried out in its administration; when it found free society, which it regarded as its enemy, making a far more rapid growth and development than slave society could possibly attain; when it found itself far outstripped in everything which can contribute to the happiness, wealth, and power of a people by its rival; when it found that five million people in the South could no longer rule and dictate law to twenty million people in the North, instead of being willing to assume that position in the Government which belonged to it, it determined upon the immediate destruction of the Government which it had so long controlled. The day and the hour which Mr. Calhoun had so long ago foretold had come. Slavery in making war upon the Government has staked its existence on the issue, and if the Government wins slavery must die. It has said that it could not and would not live under such a Government, and it must be taken at its word; and while our jurisdiction over every inch of our territory must be made good, that institution which has made itself so hostile to all the great principles of our Government that it has attempted its overthrow and sought its destruction must not find a place in it.

I have said that the contest in which we are now engaged has been going on ever since the beginning of the Government. But its character has been changed from a contest of ideas, of moral and political forces, to a contest of arms. That which would have been accomplished slowly, gradually, and peacefully by the working of moral and material forces, is now being done suddenly and violently by contending armies. The whirlwind and the tornado are the instrumentalities of an all-wise God not less than the gentle breeze and the summer shower, and perhaps it is little less presumptuous for us to question the instrumentality in the one case than in the other. Still, when the agency of man is so directly involved as it is in the scenes which are now going on about us, we cannot help feeling and asking how far is he responsible for that which is.

The contest between slavery and freedom; between slave institutions and free institutions under the same Government, was inevitable, and no man or organization of men now living are responsible for it; it is like the conflict between truth and falsehood, between right and wrong; a conflict which must and will go on until truth and right shall conquer. The men who have supposed that they could stop men's thinking and talking about slavery and freedom, or that by stopping them the conflict would end, are as wise as those men who stop their ears in a thunder storm that they may not be struck by lightning. The only question which we have ever had any power over is, what shall be the form of that conflict? Shall it be peace or war, logic or arms? The slaveholders, knowing that they would meet with no resistance from the Administration of James Buchanan, decided in favor of arms, and hence the bloody contest in which we are now engaged. Had that Administration the power to have prevented the change of the contest? I believe it had. I believe that there was power enough in the Government, properly administered, to have crushed this rebellion in the very bud. Had Andrew Jackson and James Buchanan but changed places and James Buchanan been in the presidential chair when General Jackson was there, John C. Calhoun, instead of being an extinguished nullifier, would have been President for a time of a so-called southern confederacy; and had General Jackson been in the presidential chair when James Buchanan was there, Jefferson Davis would today be an extinguished secessionist instead of president of the so-called southern confederacy, carrying on war against his Government, and shedding the blood of hundreds of thousands of loyal men. That thing happened which no one of the framers of the Constitution, or any other loyal man, ever supposed could happen. The man who had been chosen by millions of freemen to preside over the destinies of the nation, who had sworn to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of his country, basely betrayed his trust, consorted with traitors, consented to and connived at the destruction and overthrow of the Government; and during the long months that treason openly made its hostile preparation and avowed its purposes, not only took no step for its suppression, but kept in his Cabinet a Secretary of War who remained until he had stolen everything worth stealing, and then transferred it and himself to his fellow-conspirators; and a Secretary of the Navy who sent every vessel of war to the most distant ports of the world that they might be beyond the reach of the incoming Administration, and where they could render no service to the Government, who remained to the close and retired with his master amidst the contempt of all loyal men.

Slavery having found itself unable to contend with the moral and material forces opposed to it has appealed to arms. Now let arms decide the contest. Heretofore it has been freedom or slavery, the moral and material forces of the world contending. Now it is freedom or slavery, the armies of the loyal people of the country on one side, and the armies of the traitors on the other, contending. By no men is this truth so fully realized as by the men in the field, those actively engaged in the contest. I care not what their opinion may have been before the war, you can hardly find an officer or a soldier who has rendered service on the battle-field who does not most heartily agree to this.

The people of the North have not made this issue. We have not had the power to make it. It was made by the rebels, and we have been obliged to accept it. We have foolishly tried on more than one occasion to change it, but have found it impossible to do so. They hold us to the issue they have made. The Government and slavery cannot permanently exist together. Slavery demands the destruction of the Government to secure its own permanent existence, and the Government, to save its life, must destroy slavery. It would be simply an act of folly for us to recognize any government established in any of the seceded States as loyal, and entitled to a status in the Union, which did not provide in the terms of this bill that "involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and the freedom of all persons is guaranteed in said State." I know that there have been many and are still some men who are exceedingly desirous that we should fight a shadow instead of the real enemy of the Government, and they can look on with the utmost composure and satisfaction at any blow aimed at the shadow; nay, more, they will even assist in the stroke, but when you strike at the real enemy they will howl as though they themselves were hit. We hear from these men when we propose to adopt vigorous measures for replenishing our armies and giving to our noble volunteers who have so long borne the dangers and hardships of the field replenished ranks that they may march forth to meet the enemy with hope of success; we hear from them when the President proposes to exercise the rightful belligerent power of declaring the slaves of the enemy free; we hear from them when it is proposed that colored men shall be admitted into the service of their country and afforded an opportunity to fight for a Government which they are willing to shed their blood to defend; we hear from them when the President proposes to aid and assist in the reconstruction of a truly loyal State government in a rebel State, one that can be trusted; we hear from them when the Congress of the United States proposes to lend its power to aid in the construction of loyal governments in rebel States; we hear from them when our armies meet with defeat in the field, but they are dumb when loyal men rejoice in victory. Their watchword is "unconstitutionality," and their great fear is that the rebellion will meet with some unconstitutional injury or detriment, whereby its power to prolong its existence may be diminished. They wish no act done until the Supreme Court, after due deliberation, has decided that the act to be done is constitutional. They seem to think that the great object and purpose of our fathers in framing the Constitution was to see to it that nothing of harm should come to the human chattels and real estate of those who should rebel against the Government and seek its overthrow; and that every possible barrier should be placed in the way of the Government and the nation when attempting to maintain existence; and they seem to regard it as their special mission to see to it that these supposed provisions of the Constitution are rigorously enforced at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that these rebels have ceased to be subjects of this Government, or that they are out of the Union. I do not believe that their attempted secession and rebellion have deprived this Government of its right of sovereignty and jurisdiction over them, or released them from the relations and duties of subjects, bound to render obedience to the Constitution and laws. While they, by treason, rebellion, and levying war against the Government, have forfeited all right to the protection of the Constitution and laws; while they have made themselves public enemies, and come to be recognized as belligerents, not only by other Powers but by the Federal Government, still they owe obedience to this Government not less than they did before secession was attempted. This Government holds to them the twofold relation of sovereign and belligerent—a sovereign carrying on a just and necessary war to maintain a rightful sovereignty; and they hold to this Government the twofold relation of subjects and belligerents—rebellious subjects carrying on an unnecessary and unjust war to overthrow a Government which they themselves assert has never purposely done them a wrong or withheld from them a right.

This being the relative position of the two contending parties, the question arises, what are the rights and powers of the Government in the prosecution of a war for the maintenance of its rightful sovereignty and the reduction to obedience of its rebellious subjects? I answer that it has all the rights and powers which any Government on earth has in carrying on war against its enemy. It can exercise any power, do any act it may deem proper and necessary to do, not prohibited by the law of nations to all Governments alike. There is not a principle or provision, line or word, in the Constitution of the United States which prohibits or prevents the doing of every act or thing Congress may deem necessary or proper to be done to crush rebellion and maintain the sovereignty of the Government. Since the time when the rebels claimed for themselves, and we accorded to them, the character of belligerents, the Constitution of the United States has imposed no more restraint upon Congress and the Commander-in-Chief of our armies, and of course no more protection to the enemy, than it would have done had we been engaged in war with the most distant people on earth. I am wholly at a loss to know what men mean when they talk about straining the provisions or leaping the barriers of the Constitution in the prosecution of the war we are now carrying on against the enemy, and in our efforts to uphold and maintain the Government and save the life of the nation. I know of no provisions or barriers in that instrument that it would be necessary to strain or leap over in order for us to wield against them all the power human ingenuity can devise or human agency can execute.

When these rebels assumed the character and position of belligerents they said to us and the world, "We no longer claim the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States, but we stand or fall by the sword;" and the Government said to the rebels, "As you have so willed it, let the sword decide the question." From that moment it ceased to be a question of constitutional and legal right, and became a question of military power and force. I do not wonder that in the very outset of the rebellion we did not fully comprehend the changed relations we bore to these belligerent rebels. We had ever been accustomed to appeal to the Constitution as the great arbiter of disputed questions during our whole national existence, and for a time, at least, many seemed to think that by its provisions we could settle questions between belligerents not less than questions between peaceful and law-abiding citizens. They seemed to think that while the rebels could conduct against us a war, unrestrained and untrammelled by law or Constitution, we could do to them only those things which we were expressly authorized by statutes and the Constitution to do; and some, even now, seem to fail to understand that the war powers of this Government are undefined. The war powers of any Government are from their very nature undefinable, and the men who should undertake to prescribe, limit, and define them would demonstrate in the very outset that they did not understand the first principles of government, and were wholly unfit to prescribe the fundamental law for any people. The men who framed our Constitution made no such mistake. They had had the experience of both war and peace, and knew full well the powers a Government must possess in order to maintain its existence and an independent position among the nations of the earth. They were too wise to restrict the powers and tie the hands of the Government they were establishing in the prosecution of a war against an enemy seeking its destruction and overthrow, be that enemy foreign or domestic. From the moment the rebels levied war against the Government, and we recognized their acts as war in fact, and prepared to meet military force with military force, our right and power to prosecute war against them were in all respects the same as they are to prosecute war against any foreign enemy who may commence against us an unprovoked and unjust war for the dismemberment of our territory. This is and must be the position of this Government until the military power of the rebels is entirely overthrown, the last vestige of rebellion wiped out, and a true and legal government established in every rebel State.

Still, the right of jurisdiction of this Government over all territory and people within the rebel lines is not destroyed or impaired, but remains as perfect as it would have been had it not been interrupted by rebellion; and when we shall have crushed the rebellion and restored peace to all parts of the country we shall hold this territory, not by a new title, but by the old, not as territory acquired by conquest, but territory defended and maintained against revolt; and the jurisdiction of this Government over the people within the now revolted territory will not be a newly acquired right, but the assertion and maintenance of a right which has always existed. Any act of the so-called confederate government, and any act of the State governments, since secession, will be regarded by this Government as nullities. The rebellion, while it has not destroyed the right of jurisdiction of this Government over any part of our territory, has interrupted its jurisdiction for the time being over so much of our territory as is within the rebel lines, and the seceded States have themselves overturned and destroyed their State governments, so that one of those governments can now claim no more rights, protection, or recognition from the Federal Government than can the rebel himself.

I know that some say that if this is the fact the overthrow of the rebellion will immediately reestablish the old order of things in the revolted States, and that they will be, at the end of the rebellion, exactly where they were at its beginning. This by no means follows. They themselves have destroyed the old order of things; they have overturned their State governments; they have brought about an entirely different state of things from that which existed before the rebellion; they have created a new state of society demanding a government and institutions different from those which before existed, and could not continue in harmony with the General Government. The Federal Government cannot recognize, other than as an enemy, any State government which has given in its adhesion to the rebel confederacy. However liberal the President may be in his amnesty proclamations, or the Congress of the United States in its legislation, for the pardon of traitors, I apprehend that rebel State governments will hardly find themselves in the catalogue of the forgiven. Those States must first come under the military rule and control of the United States, and how long they shall continue in that condition is a question which the United States alone has the power to determine. The Federal Government having found itself unable to enforce its lawful authority by civil process has been obliged to invoke the military power, and that power must be continued until a loyal government, truly republican in form, has been organized in every seceded State, and until the people of that State have given satisfactory evidence that they have both the will and the power to keep and maintain such State within the Union against all traitors within its limits. When this time shall come, then such State can with propriety ask that the military power shall be removed, and that her Senators and Representatives shall be admitted into the councils of the nation.

I can see no reason why the President, as Commander-in-Chief, should not, in the mean time, so use the military power as to aid and assist the loyal people of any one of these States in the organization of a loyal State government. As the government which has given its adhesion to the rebel confederacy can never be recognized by the United States, a new government must be organized during the military occupation, which can, at the proper time, be recognized by Congress. All these acts by the President, or the military power under him, in thus aiding and assisting the loyal people in these States, impose no obligation upon Congress to recognize them until such time as it shall deem proper to do so, and any recognition of the military power may see fit to give to these governments can never fix their status in the Union. Congress alone has the power to determine what government is the legitimate one in a State, and its decision is binding on the other departments of the government. The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Luther vs. Borden et al. is precisely to this point:

"Under this article of the Constitution [article four, section four] it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guaranty to each State a republican form of government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can be determined whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal."

The question of the recognition of a government in one of the revolted States does not differ at all from the question of recognition of the government in any State in which the legitimate government has been interrupted, overthrown, or destroyed, and the Federal power invoked to determine which the established and legitimate government is. The question is a political one, and is to be decided by Congress, not by the Executive or the judiciary, and the most authoritative decision which Congress can give to the question is the admission of Senators and Representatives to seats in the councils of the nation; and as each House is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, each must determine for itself what government it will recognize as the established one in any State, and when the Senate and the House have by the admission of members to seats decided in favor of the same government in any State the question is settled, and the decision binding on the other departments of this Government.

The conclusion to which I come is this: no matter what laws may be passed by Congress, no matter what acts may be done by the Executives, as the governments in the revolted States have by treason, rebellion, and adhesion to the southern confederacy been overthrown and destroyed, no such State can have any status in the Union for any purpose until a loyal State government shall have been established therein, and recognized by the Congress of the United States. And when that shall have been done it will become the duty of the other departments of the Government to immediately recognize the act and accord to such State all the rights and privileges of a State in the Union.

Mr. PERRY. Mr. Speaker, we are about entering, nay, we have already entered, upon the fourth year of the war. And this simple statement should invite reflection. It should induce every man to pause, to take a careful scrutiny of the past, and to look forward with profound anxiety into the opening future. If we are wise we will condescend to learn from the teachings of the past; from its defeats as well as its successes, from the destruction of our most cherished plans as well as from the consummation of our most brilliant hopes and efforts; from the dangers we have passed and the evils we have suffered; in fine, from our experience in every form, whether for good or ill.

We should look back upon the past, Mr. Speaker, not with any frivolous idea of vain curiosity or amusement, but to draw from it lessons, so that we may guide the fortunes of the Republic aright in the future. If we have been betrayed by treacherous rocks or sands, beguiled by false landmarks or fatal currents, or misled by ignorant or wicked pilots, it is the part of wisdom to profit by our experience and not suffer ourselves to be again betrayed or misled. We should scan with solicitude the chart of the great and bloody ocean upon which the bark of the Republic has been launched, and upon whose surging billows it is now madly tossed. What a period of vicissitude these years have been! What gigantic events have been piled in upon them in terrible confusion! What herculean efforts, what prodigious exertions of force, what enormous strifes, what vast expenditures of sorrow and agony and death, have they witnessed! From our most glorious battle-fields come wafted on every breeze the groans and shrieks of the wounded and dying, telling with fearful eloquence not only of suffering there, but of many a wound that no medicine can cure in some far-off and once happy home.

Sir, in these terrible years vicissitude has trod rapidly upon vicissitude, change upon change. Disaster and success, defeat and victory have chased each other in quick succession. We have vibrated between hope and fear, and have experienced quick transitions from mourning to rejoicing. Now we have fallen prostrate in fasting and humiliation at the feet of Him who had chastened us by reverses, and now we have thronged ten thousand temples to pay Him the homage of thanksgiving for victory. We have sunk in shame and trembled with alarm over the disgrace of the first and second Bull Run. We have waited in breathless suspense upon the progress of the vital campaigns in Virginia, with their magnificent episodes of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Hanover Court-House, Seven Oaks, and Malvern. We have been plunged into an agony of grief and disappointment by the tragedies of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. We have breathed bated breaths over the invasion of Maryland, the battles of Murfreesboro' and Chickamauga, and the siege of Knoxville. And we have rejoiced with full hearts over the victories of Antietam, New Orleans, Vicksburg, Gettysburg, and Chattanooga.

Nor is this all. With this procession of grand military events and their alternations of emotion there have been equally great vicissitudes of civil events. Sir, we have witnessed the stealthy strides of unlawful power; we have seen the theory of the abolition of slavery in the Territories transformed into its abolition everywhere; we have noted the transition from emancipation with compensation to emancipation without compensation, from bills striking down the rights and properties of individuals to acts crushing out the rights, the institutions, and the very existence of States, as the bill we now have under consideration proposes to do; we have seen the negro made first a soldier, then a citizen, then a member of conventions, and we behold him now stretching out his hand to grasp the exercise of the franchise and the enjoyment of political distinction. We have seen a reign of terror, when every man became the spy and accuser of his neighbor; when men were hauled to prison without knowing their accuser or their crime; when the habeas corpus was struck down by proclamation, and the cowardly act was applauded by a pliant Congress; when the will of one man was converted into law, and the law changed with his capricious and fluctuating notions and ambitions; when established constitutions were brushed aside like cobwebs, and free speech and a free ballot were crushed by the mailed hand of power. We have seen "military necessity" hurl men into prison, invade the sanctity of the hearthstone, drive citizens into banishment, block up the avenues to the ballot-box, and intimidate the free expression of political opinion. We have seen proclamation culminated after proclamation with indecent haste, all threatening to reduce the nation to political chaos. All this we have seen, and the end is not yet. New changes and still more violent vicissitudes are brewing, and more intolerable dislocations are being conceived, as this bill proposes. Where and when it shall end it is for Divine Providence and the American people to determine.

In reviewing the vicissitudes which I have described, the unavoidable questions that present themselves are, "What has been gained in all this time?" and "To what agency may we attribute that which has been gained?" He will be a bold man who will deny that whatsoever practical results have been attained have been secured solely by our armies in the field and by our Navy—by the indomitable resolution, the unshaken constancy, the unparalleled endurance and heroism of our brave soldiers and sailors, and not by our civil policy or the wisdom and ability of the Administration. What has our military policy done for us, and what has our civil policy accomplished? Let us see.

Our Army and Navy have given us New Orleans and Vicksburg and opened the Mississippi river, cutting the confederacy in twain. Our armies have rescued Kentucky and Tennessee. They have saved to us our Federal capital; they have arrested and punished the invasions of Maryland and Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana. They gave us glorious victory at Antietam, at Gettysburg, and at Chattanooga; and they now stand at the great natural gateway to the heart of Georgia and the southern confederacy. This is what our soldiers and sailors have done.

But what have our rulers accomplished by their civil policy? They have not won a single stronghold. They have not detached a single State nor wrested a single acre of ground from the public enemy. They have not overcome a single army nor struck the sword from the hand of a single rebel. On the contrary, they have again and again paralyzed our heroic armies when they have been on the very verge of victory. They have destroyed the best-laid plans and brought to naught the labors and costly sacrifices of many a long campaign. What man is to be found so bold as to assert or so infatuated as to believe that a single victory less would have been won if the President had never issued a proclamation or if Congress had never passed an act except those needed to form and maintain our armies in the field? Had the President and Congress been dumb on all beside, our armies would have still won every victory that has been gained. Nay, our victories would have been far greater and far more decisive; for every proclamation and every act has been firing the spirits of the confederates and welding them so firmly together as almost to defy the frown of Deity.

But who will have the supreme folly to say that if our armies had stood still, if our soldiers had not shown valor, fortitude, and skill, the whole brood of presidential fulminations and congressional enactments would have won us a single battle? They would have been mere waste paper, a useless "war of words." And such, indeed, they have been for any good results, although they have been a prolific cause of doubts and dissensions among ourselves while they have silenced them among our enemies. In sober truth they have been a clog and hinderance to our armies, and every victory that has been won has been gained in spite of them.

I am conscious, Mr. Speaker, that it were a bootless task for me to undertake to convince the present Administration of the folly of their past policy, and there is nothing to justify the hope that, even if I might succeed in convicting their minds, any change would be wrought upon their future course.

That task has already been attempted by one who has a hold upon the confidence and affection of the people scarcely second to what was entertained for Washington and Jackson; and it was undertaken with a breadth of mind and a comprehensiveness of judgment, a power of thought and language equal to anything exhibited by the greatest statesmen in the best days of the Republic. But it was received with indifference and contempt, and I do not flatter myself that anything I might say will meet with a different fate. If the Administration rejected the comprehensive and wise plan of military operations submitted by General McClellan to the President at his request—a plan which every subsequent event has proved to be remarkable for its forecast and prescience, and which if it had been adhered to would have placed us a year ago as far in the advance as we are to-day; which would have averted innumerable reverses, saved countless lives, and prevented an incalculable outlay of treasure and blood—if the Administration rejected such a plan, proceeding from such a man,

I have no right to expect that any counsels of mine will arrest their attention or influence their action.

And as with the military plans of this general so also with the civil policy which he advised should go hand in hand with it. His advice to the Administration that they should consider the rebellion as having assumed the character of war, and that it ought to be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization, was rejected. His warnings not to convert the war into one looking to the subjugation of the people of a State, and not to make it a war against populations, but only against armed forces and political organizations, were unheeded. His adjurations that we should not contemplate the cruel confiscations of property, or the political executions of persons, or the forcible abolition of slavery, were not listened to. His noble counsel that in prosecuting the war all private property and unarmed persons should be protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations; that property taken for military uses should be paid for, pillage and waste to be treated as high crimes, all unnecessary trespass be sternly prohibited, and outrages of the soldiers upon the citizens be sternly rebuked, was contemptuously spurned. His caution that military arrests should not be tolerated, save where actual hostilities existed; that military government should be confined to the preservation of public order and the protection of political rights, and the military power should be obedient to law and not suffered to interfere with social relations, was treated with contempt. His urgent appeal to concentrate the military power against the vital parts of the confederacy, so as to destroy their political structure, and not to disperse it on distant and unimportant points, was disregarded. His calm and respectful admonition to the Administration not to declare radical views on the subject of slavery, but to follow a constitutional and conservative system of policy, was derided, and made the occasion of his disgrace and disfavor.

If no sense of obligation has saved from treatment such as this the man who twice saved the capital and gave the trembling occupants of its palaces a respite from their unmanly fears; if a man of such a mold was scorned and derided for the expression of his sincere convictions and his efforts for the public good, what ground is there for me to hope that I can make an impression upon the impenetrable self-conceit and stubborn willfulness of this Administration? I have no such hope. They are, like Ephraim, joined to their idols. Let them alone! But thank Heaven they are not yet supreme! There is a higher authority, and to it I make my appeal. If the Administration are deaf, or blind, or fanatical, or weak, or wilful, the people, their masters, are neither. They will listen to counsel. They are quick to detect error, or imposture, or imbecility, or corruption, and although they may be misled or deceived for a time it cannot be for long. In the end they will follow the right, and render justice to all. They will give honor, high reward, and love to the men whose counsels have been rejected, and whose splendid services have been treated with base ingratitude, and ignominy and disgrace to those who have trampled on public and private rights, and sought to prostitute a holy war waged for the nation's life to the purposes of a political faction. The American citizen is long-suffering, and his indignation slow to move, and it were well if those who are now trying his forbearance to the utmost, and who are sheltering themselves in fancied security from his slumbering indignation, would bear in mind these apt lines:

"Patient of constitutional control,
He bears it with meek manliness of soul;
But if authority grow wanton, woe
To him that treads upon his freeborn toe:
One step beyond the boundary of the laws
Fires him, at once, in freedom's glorious cause."

Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to indulge in a merely factious opposition. And if I criticize severely the acts of the Administration, and reprobate, with all the earnestness I can command, the policy it has adopted in conducting this war, it is because I am urged on by convictions of duty that I cannot suppress. And it has been my constant endeavor to effect a change in the management of affairs and to institute a different and more beneficent national policy. And though my opposition to the civil power of the Government has been so strong, still I have not allowed myself to forget that there is also a military power upon the efficiency and force of which our nation's safety greatly depends. Acting upon this conviction, I have ever felt it to be my duty to stand by the citizens whom the people have invested for a season with the administration of affairs in all the lawful and necessary measures proposed by them for the increase of the numbers and efficiency of our military forces, for their payment and support, and for the suppression of this rebellion against the Union and the Constitution. I have never withheld my voice or my vote for men, or money, or means to this end. And although the Administration has been guilty of many acts which I believed to be wrong in principle and almost fatally so in practice, although much of its policy has appeared to be madly suicidal, neither have I felt it to be in a line with my duty to cripple them in the conduct of the war, even though their errors were certain to be repeated. On the contrary, I have never deviated from the course I marked out for myself in the beginning; and have supported every measure intended to make our military and naval strength adequate to the necessities of our great emergency, and have placed in the hand of the authorities whatsoever was necessary to the prosecution of the war with vigor and success. At the same time, in common with the great and patriotic party with which I have the honor to act, I have reserved the right to hold the Administration responsible for the right and lawful use of the means thus intrusted to them, and accountable for the perversion of the war from its legitimate objects. And I shall, therefore, not hesitate to exercise my duty as a free citizen to criticize with frankness and even severity, but still with candor, such of their acts as I believe to be pregnant with injurious consequences to the country, and to denounce with all the energy at my command what I conceive to be their dangerous and unwarrantable intrusions and usurpations upon our free institutions. In this spirit I am obliged, Mr. Speaker, to raise my voice in earnest remonstrance against the policy marked out by the party in power in relation to confiscation, to an amnesty, and to the destruction or suspension of the existence of States.

On the subject of confiscation I have already on this floor expressed myself fully on a former occasion, and further reflection has confirmed me in the convictions to which I then gave utterance. I remain opposed, more earnestly and inflexibly than ever, to any sweeping act of confiscation which seizes on the property of men, unaccused, unheard, without trial, and by whole descriptions and populations. I am opposed to it because I believe it to be contrary to our organic law, and because, being so, it is intrinsically tyrannical and oppressive, for "where law ends tyranny begins."

I am opposed because it is an incitement to and a premium upon rapacity at the expense of misery and distress beyond our ability to imagine. But if my opposition is so strong against a confiscation of life estates, infinitely greater is my detestation and contempt for the man who would introduce the barbarous and inhuman proposition to entail the penalty of a parent's transgressions upon his innocent offspring, upon helpless woman, upon budding childhood, upon guileless infancy, upon the child unborn! It is a horrible proposition! It is more rigorous than the punishment of murder, for the family of the most brutal murderer when he is convicted and executed are not despoiled of his property and effects. In this case the whole family is punished for the crime of the individual; and when the father is condemned his wife and children are reduced to beg their bread. It makes political death a greater punishment than natural death, since in the latter the property of the criminal passes to his children, while by the former his innocent family are robbed of their lawful inheritance.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is full of evil, oppression, and inhumanity, and sweeps like a hurricane over a whole population. Against this inhuman atrocity, then, which is now proposed I lift my voice in indignant protest. It has in it no touch of human sympathy or pity. It is malignant, spiteful, diabolical. It has "a devil's purpose" without being redeemed by anything of an "angel's face." And if we are guilty of it I cannot believe that it will propitiate the Almighty to smile upon our cause, but rather fear that it will lead Him to pronounce upon us the dread sentence, "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again." I wash my hands of the enormity—the crime against God and against human nature.

My opinions with reference to the mockery of an amnesty which the President has promulgated in the proclamation annexed to his last message are equally decided. I characterize it as a "mockery," and so the President seems to have regarded it, for he defended it in advance by the remark, "True, the form of an oath is given, but no man is forced to take it." Can it be possible that the President did not perceive that the oath which he prescribed as the condition precedent to his amnesty was of a nature to defeat the very object of the amnesty? that the terms of the oath were such as struck down all motive to a return to loyalty, by making such return involve the destruction of their property and thus made it their interest to remain in rebellion?

But, sir, my objection to the President's proclamation of amnesty proceeds from something higher than the fact that it is an unsubstantial mockery and defeats its own ends. I object to it because the President has no right to declare a general amnesty; or, if he had, the terms in which it is conceived are without any strain of mercy or generosity, and without any inducement to those to whom it is addressed.

I am aware that the President declares in the portion of his message which is excusatory of his proclamation that "the Constitution authorizes the Executive to grant or withhold the pardon at his own absolute discretion." But precisely upon this point I respectfully take issue with him. The language of the Constitution (article two, section one) is: "He [the President] shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States." That is to say, when a man has been tried for an offense against the United States, found guilty, and condemned by regular established process of law, the President shall have power to reprieve or pardon him. But he has no right to declare a man free from the consequences of his acts before he shall have been tried, convicted, and condemned. And if he exercises such alleged right he exceeds his power; he causes the executive to usurp upon the province of the legislative, while at the same time the reprieve or pardon thus granted would be utterly void and of no effect. It is a usurpation upon the legislative power, because all the provisions entering into a general bill of amnesty are necessarily and solely legislative in their nature. And such was the opinion of the men who formed our Government. In the preliminary stipulations to the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1783 Congress enacted and agreed "That there shall be no future confiscations made nor any prosecutions commenced against any person or persons for or by reason of the part which he or they may have taken in the present war; and that no person shall on that account suffer any future loss or damage, either in his person, liberty, or property, and that those who may be in confinement on such charges at the time of the ratification of the treaty in America shall be immediately set at liberty, and the prosecutions so commenced shall be discontinued."

This, Mr. Speaker, was both a legitimate and a real amnesty. But the President's amnesty lacks all the full and free generosity and magnanimity which characterized the amnesty offered to the malignant Tories of the Revolution by our forefathers. The one is full of life and human sympathy; the other is cold, emotionless, without any trace of pity or compassion. The one was the product of the Republic in its best and purest days; the other comes from the present Administration.

But, Mr. Speaker, the President, as if conscious of the weakness of his case in this particular, cites the confiscation acts as giving him authority to extend pardon and amnesty to persons who have participated in this rebellion. But, sir, he couples with his amnesty conditions that are violative of the law he cites as his authority, and destructive of the rights of persons and of States—conditions which neither the President had a right to impose nor Congress to give him the power of requiring.

A few words, Mr. Speaker, upon the President's plan, and the bill under consideration to

"reestablish" State governments in the insurrectionary portions of the Union. It does not command my approbation, either by what I conceive to be its real design or by its avowed objects. It is not a statesmanlike plan, but a crude and visionary experiment, not calculated to lessen our embarrassments, but certain to add to them. It is not a statesmanlike measure having for its object the composition and settlement of our national difficulties, but it is a political artifice, intended to have a bearing upon the coming presidential election. It is a plan which can only result in a nominal resumption of the relations between these States and the Union. The operation of this scheme would be, by a political fiction, to bring back the whole State into apparent but unreal relation with the Union, enable it, or the fragment acting in its name, to elect United States Senators, and by pretended elections to send its full complement of Representatives to the House of Representatives. And here the President's design is perfectly evident, to secure a majority of the delegates to the nominating convention of his party, and to provide for his own election by the House of Representatives in the event of there not being an election by the people. By this plan the narrow foothold maintained by our armies in North Carolina, Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, Florida, Arkansas, and elsewhere may send the pretended full delegations of those States to this House. Mr. Speaker, I denominate the whole plan a political trick worthy of the most adroit and unscrupulous wire-puller of our ward primary meetings.

But, Mr. Speaker, this plan to "reestablish" State governments is based on the assumption that they have been destroyed. This, sir, I deny; nor can they be destroyed unless the rebels are finally victorious, and establish their independence. If a foreign enemy should invade us, drive out our forces, seize and occupy New Jersey or Massachusetts, governing them in the mean while by their authorities and laws, those States would still exist, and our laws and constitutions, though temporarily obstructed, would yet be held to have a theoretical course in them. And the instant the invaders were driven off the States would resume their old relations, our laws would flow into their old channels, and all would go on as before, without a single act of legislation on the part of the General Government. And precisely similar is the case with those States now held by a domestic enemy; the States still exist; our laws and constitutions still have theoretical sway there; our authority has been merely suspended and our mutual relations interrupted by a public enemy in armed insurrection against the Union. The moment this enemy is overcome, and where ever he is overcome and driven out, our old relations will be instantaneously resumed, and the laws of the Federal Union will again operate as if there had been no interruption. Yes, Mr. Speaker, all the States, the rebellious as well as the loyal, are all within the unbroken pale of the Union. Sir, that is the very question at issue between us and the rebels; they declare that the Union is finally and irretrievably dissolved, and we declare that it is not, and, so help us Heaven, shall not be so broken and disrupted. For this we are fighting. For this we are encountering unheard-of expense, making the most wonderful preparations, and marshaling our heroic soldiers under their gallant leaders. And if God blesses us with wise rulers and decisive victories, this is what will be at length established. No, there is no authority given the President to declare any State out of the Union that was ever in it. So long as the Constitution lasts the union of the several States lasts; and although the power of an enemy may lop off one or more States, and forcibly sever the Constitution, we have no authority to do what only the overpowering act of an enemy can do, or to admit that it is done until we have been finally beaten in the field, and retire from the contest ingloriously beaten. We may be utterly destroyed by a superior power, State after State might be overrun, our capital might be captured and destroyed, but in such a case only can our Constitution be torn in fragments or our Union destroyed. When we have absolutely succumbed to the power of an enemy, all our institutions will crumble into one fatal ruin, and our glorious democratic Republic be consolidated into the kingdom of a tyrant. But till this happens our Union and Constitution possess a principle of perpetual vitality, no death of a State and no severance of it from the Union. The life-blood may cease to flow for a time between the center and the extremities, but immediately on the removal of those hinderances and obstructions the life-bearing current will again leap through vein and artery, and the whole frame will once more rejoice in renewed health and vigor.

But, Mr. Speaker, we again recur to the fact that the war has already consumed three entire years, and is eating into a fourth. When we ask what has been accomplished to bring it to a close, although we can point to many glorious victories and to something gained, in the face of what yet remains to be done the further inquiry is forced upon us, "How much longer will it last?" Judging by what has been accomplished and by what remains to be done, may it not last years and years, unless it is ended by the sheer exhaustion of one of the parties? How long can it last? The total assessed value of all the real and personal property in the United States in 1860, according to the last census, was $12,084,660,005. If from this we deduct the value of the property of the States in rebellion and of the portions of States held by the rebel armies, the amount will be materially reduced. The grand total of real and personal property in the rebellious States is $3,972,101,522; this is exclusive of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri. But as portions of the rebellious States are held by our armies, I make a deduction of ten per cent. from the above estimate, which I believe to be a liberal estimate. This leaves a balance of $3,574,891,400, as representing the value of property in the rebellious States. Deducting this from the total amount leaves a balance of $8,509,768,605, representing the value of the property of the loyal States.

The question now arises, How long will it take to sweep away the whole property of the country by our expenditures, if they continue at the rate of the past three years? A few more statistics will illustrate the matter. Our present expenditures—including the sums expended by the General Government, by States, counties, towns, townships, and individuals—have been at least $3,000,000,000. Assuming that our expenditures will increase in the same proportion, there will be an augmentation of our expenditures at the rate of thirty-three and one third per cent. per annum upon the present amount. According to the last census, the rate of increase in the value of real and personal property in the States and Territories has been a little over twelve and a half per cent. per annum. Now the problem which these figures suggest may be stated as follows: if the whole property of the loyal States continues to increase at the rate of twelve and a half per cent. per annum, how long will it take our expenditures, increasing at the rate of thirty-three and a third per cent. per annum, to equal our assets or resources, and thus reduce us to bankruptcy? A very simple arithmetical process supplies the answer to this problem, and shows that if our expenditures and the increased value of our property each continue in the same ratio as in the past, at the end of eleven years our expenditures will have been nearly equal to the total value of all the real and personal property in the loyal States. Our $3,000,000,000 of expenditures, increased by an expenditure of thirty-three and one third per cent. per annum and five per cent. interest, will have reached at the end of eleven years the gigantic sum of $20,044,000,000, while our real and personal property, increased at the rate of one hundred and twenty-six per cent. in each decade, will amount to about the same sum, or $20,253,249,279.

Here are stubborn facts pointing at national bankruptcy. We have a terrible war upon us, which if not speedily settled will lead us to certain ruin. It is time to pause. We are only to choose between two roads. The one leads to sure destruction; the other may lead to life and to prosperity. We have been going down the one, and the prospect is gloomy and foreboding. The mutterings of the storm are already audible, and salvation is yet within our reach. We yet have time to choose "the good part which can never be taken away." Let me appeal to the "power behind the throne" to cast aside the idols that have promised them and us so much but have given us so little. We have begged of our radical deities to give us bread, and notwithstanding their promises we have only received a stone. Throw down the idols and abolish the worship! Thus, and thus only, may we see the day when all the States are again knit together in fraternal bonds and revolve in the old harmony around our beloved Union. God grant that we may live to see that day. Then we may look back upon this terrible war as upon a frightful dream; and when the scars it has made are healed and the whole land is once more smiling in prosperity we will gaze with amazement at the folly and madness which precipitated the fury of a war which might have been averted upon our beloved land, and which, to give a doubtful boon to the negro, endangered the life of a nation.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I had not designed to trouble the House with any remarks upon the bill, but, being compelled to leave Washington in the morning, and understanding that the question is to be taken to-morrow, as I shall not be here when the vote is taken, lest my views upon the bill may be misunderstood I have determined to submit to-night some few remarks upon it. I will say, sir, before proceeding to those remarks, that it is my design also, by the permission of the House, to refer to some other subjects somewhat personal to myself, and not entirely germane to the subject immediately under consideration. In deviating from a confinement to the discussion of the bill itself, I think I shall but follow the example of many very able gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate upon the measure.

Mr. Speaker, this bill, taking its title as a true indication of its character, is to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government. The chairman [Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland] of the committee which reported it describes it to be a "bill for the restoration of civil government" in those States. I have carefully examined both the bill and the speech of the honorable gentleman to ascertain upon what facts the assertion is made that the State governments of the southern States have been overthrown. In the latter I find an argument which aims to sustain the assumption. It is as follows:

"Those that are here represented are the only governments existing within the limits of the United States. Those that are not here represented are not governments of the States, republican under the Constitution. And if they be not, then they are military usurpations, inaugurated as the permanent governments of the States, contrary to the supreme law of the land, arrayed in arms against the Government of the United States; and it is the duty, the first and highest duty of the Government, to suppress and expel them. Congress must either expel or recognize and support them. If it do not guaranty them it is bound to expel them; and they who are not ready to suppress them are bound to recognize them."

Now, it will be seen that here again is little but assumption. It is taken for granted, and asserted with positiveness, that there can be no republican government that does not recognize the President and the Congress of the United States. "Those States that are here represented are the only governments existing within the limits of the United States." This is singular doctrine. What constitutes republicanism? It is not adhesion to any particular political community or organization. It does not consist in allegiance to any central constituted authority; if it did, it would not be republicanism at all, but a dependent condition without the power of self-control.

The gentleman assumes too much. If the authority or political rights of the States are dependent on their representations here, then if Congress refuses to receive the representatives of a State on any pretext, it ceases to exist, and loses the power of self-government. Suppose that a majority of both Houses of Congress and the Executive were to entertain the idea that the institution of slavery was inconsistent with a republican form of government, and acted upon the theory to the extent of the refusal to accept the Representatives of those States which held slaves, though they were not in rebellion, those States would not then "be here represented," and, under this doctrine, would not have republican forms of government, and it would become the duty of Congress to provide a form of government for them.

If Congress can do what this bill proposes on the ground alleged, so can it disfranchise any State in the Union at pleasure on any pretext whatever. The creature would thus become greater than the creator. It would be the arrogance of concentrated centralism in its worst features, because it would attempt to deprive a people of the inalienable right to form their own organic laws and to determine the nature of the Government under which they live. It seeks to establish a supervisory power, which, under the principle asserted, could at pleasure alter, modify, amend, annul, create, or destroy the constitution of every State in the Union, North or South, in times of war or peace.

There are some States in this Union, now represented here, whose constitutions have provisions utterly repugnant to republicanism, and yet no one proposes here to interfere with them. Even Utah has its Delegate. No one questions now the power of Congress over the Territories, and yet the gentleman does not propose to interfere with the notorious anti-republican government in that Territory.

But if refusing to recognize the Federal authority the States in rebellion cease to be republican, how is it that Mexico is a republic? When Texas seceded from the republic of Mexico, we accepted her without asking any questions; she came into the Union without any alteration in the character of her government. She substituted a Governor for President, and changed the titles of other officials. She maintains them now. Every one of the southern States possesses the same form of government now that they did before secession. If they were republican then they are so now. The people elect their own representatives, and govern themselves in all the essentials of republican government, and it is the extreme of folly for any man to assert otherwise. Indeed the confederate constitution has all the elements of republicanism. There is not a provision of it which, to the least extent, infringes upon the rights of the people. In many respects it is an improvement upon our own, because it defines the powers of the States with more clearness, leaving less to doubt and dispute. Indeed I assert that the people of the southern States enjoy a higher degree of liberty than we have been allowed the last three years.

Look at North Carolina! Her Governor, in behalf of her people, openly opposed the action of the confederate president and congress for the attempted exercise of authority much less repugnant to free institutions than has been repeatedly exercised unopposed here of late. What State Executives at the North would have dared to take similar action under far more aggravating circumstances? Doubtless despotism exists at the South. Military authority is antagonistic to liberty. War, and especially civil war, suspends more or less the free exercise of personal rights. The civil power cannot be maintained amid the clash of arms. It is and must be suspended in those States where any military conflict exists. But when the necessity for military authority ceases, when the cause which produces the contest shall be removed, civil government returns and again has the entire control; and so must it be in the southern States when this war ceases, as cease it must, sooner or later; the armies will be withdrawn, and the people of those States must be permitted to the full enjoyment of self-government. Otherwise it will not be republican. No people live under a free government if they are deprived of the right of self-government. To impose upon them a form of government of your own making, under the pretext of this bill, would be the worst kind of tyranny, whatever the provisions of your Constitution might be.

But this bill itself contains an inhibition which gives the lie to its title. It provides that none of the States in rebellion shall hereafter hold slaves. It does not leave to the people, therefore, the right to dispose of this question as the North have done. Is it republicanism to take away from a people the privilege of regulating their own domestic affairs, and to deny to others the privileges we have exercised ourselves?

But it is contended that by the rebellion these States have lost their right to form their own local governments, and even some go further and contend that by the rebellion all their rights as States have ceased; that they have placed themselves in the position of Territories, and that it has become the duty of Congress to provide governments for them as such. The advocates of these doctrines do not favor us with their authority for these extreme positions. They do not point to that provision of the Constitution or to the construction of any commentator which gives the least countenance to the existence of such a power in Congress, much less the duty of Congress. In every part of the Constitution, in the spirit that created it, and in the term "Union" itself, is one pervading idea, namely, that the Government of the United States is of limited authority, and that it is secondary to the States in all matters relating to the States; and, while no provision is made for a contingency like this, nowhere is it by the most distant implications hinted that Congress can in any possible event, either in times of peace or war, foreign or domestic, or any possible conditions of the country, interfere with, much less subvert, modify, alter, or amend the local institutions or constitution of a State.

I have before said that I do not justify or defend secession, but I do not fear to discuss the question on its merits. I contend that whatever may become of the Federal Union, the States themselves have a positive existence. The Federal Union is the creation of the States, and hence cannot become more powerful than the creator. The Union, when formed, was said to be, by one of its framers, "a bridge resting upon thirteen pillars; take away the pillars and the bridge falls." The States which claim the right to withdraw from the Union do not alter their positions as States; they retain the same attitude toward each other that they held anterior to the American Revolution and to the adoption of the Constitution. In seceding from the Union they did not attempt to alter their relations to each other. They are, therefore, still distinct political communities with their own State constitutions and forms of government deriving authority from the people. Whatever doubt as to their relation to the Federal Government, there can be none as to their relation to each other and as to their individual local domestic independence.

I assume, therefore, that the rebellion cannot alter this. The Constitution cannot be expanded to meet contingencies. Under our theory the people themselves of the States regulate their own domestic affairs. Each State is sovereign and independent so far as this regulation of its municipal concerns extends. The Federal Government can have no control over any subject of State concern any further than was delegated to it, and no one denies that this is restricted to certain defined and enumerated objects. Even Hamilton, the advocate of this strongest kind of government over the States, and the concentration of the largest powers in the Federal Government, did not in his wildest theories and most despotic ideas of Federal power assume as much as this bill. In his defense of the Constitution and explanations of its powers he quoted in application Montesquieu, who in discussing the subject of republican government said that "the Confederacy may be dissolved, and the Confederates preserve their sovereignty;" and again, "and as this Government is composed of small republics, it enjoys the internal happiness of each; and, with respect to its internal situation, it is possessed by means of the association of all the advantages of large monarchies." (The Federalist, paper nine, by Hamilton.) And Hamilton, in the same paper, which, as he says, was written "to illustrate the tendency of the Union to repress domestic faction and insurrection," fully declares that the American Union was simply "an assemblage of societies," or "an association of two or more States," &c.

Without referring to the well-known opinions of Jefferson, Madison, and the great founders of the Republic on this point, I have here taken the views of the head and front of the opposition to them—the ablest and most ultra man of those who advocated a concentration of unlimited power in the Federal Government. In a word, our Government is federal, not national. The former means a league, from fædus, according to Noah Webster, "derived from an agreement between parties, particularly between nations; consisting in a compact between parties, particularly and chiefly between States or nations; founded on alliance by contract or mutual agreement, as a Federal Government, such as that of the United States." National government is of the consolidated close character, which recognizes no authority except that which rests in the one head. The creators of this Government designed it to be Federal, to be a compact of States. It has been so regarded ever since by the best commentators. Neither in the debates of the Convention nor in the Constitution itself is any other designation given to its character. In nearly all of the States which subsequently ratified it, and in the very able debates that took place in them, as well as in the Federalist, a collection of papers written by Madison, Hamilton, and Jay, to remove the then prejudices and apprehensions existing in the popular mind that some portion of the rights of States would be parted with, it is treated as such. Massachusetts and New Hampshire in their ratification of the Constitution declared that the Union was a "compact." Webster, in his celebrated reply to Hayne, said in speaking of certain advantages he alleged the South had obtained in the construction of the Government, that "nevertheless I do not complain nor would I countenance any movement to alter this arrangement of representation. It is the original bargain—the compact—let it stand; let the advantages of it be fully enjoyed. The Union itself is too full of benefits to be hazarded in propositions for changing its original basis. I go for the Constitution as it is and for the Union as it is." This, then, is the peculiar nature of our form of government.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is the pet measure of the gentleman from the third district of Maryland. It is his peculiar specific for all those ills that man is heir to in this unfortunate country. He has often told us that the President's scheme was folly, that it would not accomplish the purpose, but that he [Mr. Davis] had discovered the philosopher's stone, and that in this bill would be found the "magic wand" that would at once remove the cause of the evil which afflicts us and secure a permanent peace hereafter. The cause of the rebellion he says is slavery; and this is repugnant to republicanism. He portrayed in his speech, delivered to this House March 22, all those horrors with his usual skill, and, I may add, without intending offense, his usual sophistry. His speech, like this bill, was founded on the one idea that slavery is the cause of the rebellion, and that where slavery exists republicanism cannot exist. He assumes that republicanism and slavery are inconsistent with each other. This is the motive for providing State governments for those which he says have been "usurped." He takes care, both in his speech and his bill, to declare that in the governments which shall hereafter be provided no slavery shall exist. Now this is assuming that heretofore those States which have held slavery were not republican. It casts a reflection on the slave States. Indeed it is a hard accusation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland has not always held these opinions. I think it quite susceptible of demonstration that he believed, as I do now, that many of his present opinions were fanatical, and that the southern people could never be subjugated. He is an author, sir, and he is withal a traveled gentleman. His opinions are upon record. In 1852 he wrote a book upon national and American politics, which I will do him the credit to say contains many very fine passages. I hold it now in my hand, sir. Its title is Ormuzd and Ahriman. The object of this work was to plunge this country into a war with Russia, and to make a coalition with Great Britain in the accomplishment of that herculean undertaking. He was then, as he is now, opposed to the establishment of monarchical governments on this continent. But in the course of the work he very fully discusses the nature of his own Government, and the dangers that threaten it by the abolition fanatics of the North and the Quixotic secessionists of the South. On page 345 he says:

"The name of the American Republic is potent among the nations. It is the watchword around the camp-fire, it is the model in the senate, it is the hope of struggling humanity. Its proud elevation, its peaceful splendor, its military prowess, hitherto signified only in defense, the plenty that rewards its industry, its wide asylum for the exile and the wanderer, the simple majesty of its Government, that, like the power divine, 'spreads undivided and operates unspent,' mighty at the extremity as at the center, swaying with a silent omnipotence, powerful to punish, yet powerless to oppress, unshaken in seventy years alone of all the nations by civil discord, unstained by fraternal blood, so mild in its rule that no treason has ever lifted its hand against its authority—these, its glories, covered with shame, and cast into the shade the gaudy and blood stained idols that elsewhere, crush humanity in their course, and boast themselves the sole possessors on earth of the right divine to rule."

Again, on page 348, he says:

"This people has swollen within the limits of the life of man from three to more than twenty-three millions, a population such as France could not boast when she prostrated Europe before her march. More than two million armed men, soldiers by birth, by nature, by early education, by manliness of spirit, by habit of self-reliance and self-defense, who are fitted to obey, because accustomed to the obedience of liberty and the laws, whom a campaign of a month converts into the regular soldier, and the word of command in his country's cause elevates to a hero; these men, the cheap, yet priceless defense of the nation, stand ever ready to guard their hearths and their altars from hostile feet, whether near or remote. They laugh to scorn the thought of subjugation!"

In 1852, then, the gentleman from Maryland thought that the people South as well as North "laughed to scorn the thought of subjugation!"

Again, on page 353, he says:

"The North is filled with the fanatics of liberty as the South is with the Quixotes of slavery."

And again, on page 354, he says:

"Fanaticism is not less dangerous because it is honest. There are fanatics at both ends of the nation."

I will quote but one more extract to show what the gentleman then proposed to do: On page 426, he says:

"This policy which I propose is no wild crusade to force freedom on reluctant nations. It is no propagandist policy made available for self-defense. It does not propose to enforce liberty by the bayonet, or to preach it from the camp. It is no proclamation of the rights of man to people in contented or in discontented slavery. No institutions accepted, or acquiesced in are proposed to be overthrown; still less is any hostility felt or avowed or recommended against kings and monarchical government."

Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that in the debate upon the expulsion of Mr. LONG, of Ohio, his colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK], representing the third district of Ohio, had consumed the time of the House by reviewing my official and political character. Instead of discussing the great questions involved in the subject then under consideration, and giving to this House and the country the benefit of his large experience in public affairs, aiding Congress to extricate the country from its present unfortunate and lamentable condition, he turned upon the humble individual now addressing you, deeming his past public career of more importance than a consideration of the subjects to which I have referred. I hold in my hand, sir, the speech which he made upon that occasion. He preferred four charges against me. These are, that when mayor of the city of New York I recommended the secession of that city from the General Government; that I had facilitated the passage of arms to the Governor of Georgia after that State had seceded from the Union; that I had once been a war Democrat, and made a war speech at the Union square meeting in April, 1861; and that I was responsible for the dreadful riots that occurred in New York in July last. At the time of this assault upon me, it will be remembered I made an effort to get the floor in reply, but with the usual delicacy, refinement, and courtesy which distinguish that member, with a waive of his military arm, he told me to "subside." This was his language, sir; and as was my duty under the rules of the House, which I never will knowingly violate, I did "subside" into my seat, and have had no opportunity until now to offer my denial to each and every one of the accusations in the sense with which they were preferred. He was personal, sir, in his assault, abusing the courtesy of the House and violating the decorum of debate. He took advantage of the silence which he imposed upon me at the moment to make personal intimations beneath the dignity of the House, and far beneath the conduct of a gentleman. In his accusation that I had once been a war Democrat, he said he could prove it because he was present when I addressed the Union square meeting in 1861. He said he spoke from the same stand with me, and that he stood near me; and, addressing himself to the House, he said, "You may call this an honor or a dishonor."

Sir, if he spoke from the stand with me, and, as he says, stood near me, he stood near a man who never ingloriously fled from the battle-field, or turned his back to an enemy; who never traduced the memory of Andrew Jackson, and became the eulogist and defender of that Jeffreys of a judge who had interfered his traitorous proclivities between Jackson and his military authority properly exercised; who never aided, abetted, and encouraged the Mexicans in their war with the United States, at a time when our noble soldiery were on Mexican soil; who never, as the bearer of a little brief authority over the noble and patriotic population of Maryland and Delaware, assumed the air and practiced the vile precepts of the tyrant and the despot, and in defiance of the Constitution of the United States, and of the constitutions and laws of two sovereign States of the Union, suppressed the freedom of the ballot, denying to men more loyal than himself the exercise of the sacred right of franchise, and who, notwithstanding all these dark surroundings and inodorous antecedents, has had the temerity to rise in his place in this House, and measure his personal veracity with the President of the United States, the head of his own political party, who has been his friend and benefactor. And in this connection, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that if means are furnished me by this House, I pledge myself to resign my seat if I do not prove that the member had a verbal understanding with the head of the War Department that he could withdraw or resume his commission as a major general in the Army whenever he desired to do so.

But, sir, I propose to reply briefly to these accusations. First, that I recommended the secession of the city of New York from the Federal Government. The Legislature of our State had for several years encroached upon the municipal rights of the city, in contravention of the constitution of the State, which guaranteed to every county, city, town, and village of the State the right to elect their own local officers, or to have only such as were appointed by the elective officers. The Legislature had appointed our prominent officials. It had appointed commissioners to improve our Central Park, to build a courthouse, to appoint, remove, and control our local police and other officers possessed with the exclusive control of managing more than one half of the public duty of our city. These encroachments upon our rights had become so frequent and so alarming that it had aroused the popular indignation. I had repeatedly remonstrated against the exercise of this oppressive power, and in my annual message delivered to the common council on the 1st of January, 1861, I did say, after referring to these wrongs, that if they continued it would become the duty of the city of New York to declare her independence of the State, to become free from the State to which she paid liberal taxes without receiving anything in return but oppression and unjust discrimination. I said this much then; I say so still. I did not recommend the withdrawal of the city from the Federal Government, as alleged by the gentleman from Ohio. We had no quarrel with the Federal Government. We attempted no resistance or nullification of Federal laws. Our differences were with the State, and those differences still exist.

The second charge, with reference to the arms of the State of Georgia, has been before denied by me in this House. The member now making it is but playing second fiddle to the Delegate from Utah, who represents here Brigham Young's dominions. He made the charge early in the session, and, with far more courtesy than now is manifested, gave me the opportunity to reply to it, which I did upon the moment, and satisfied, I am confident, this House and the country that it was an unjust accusation. I say again, as I did then, that before the commencement of any hostilities between the North and the South, while the mail and telegraphic communication were entirely open between New York and Savannah, before there was any interruption to commerce, or any proclamation of hostilities by the President, that the municipal local police of the city of New York, which, by the Legislature, had been placed beyond the control of the mayor, assumed the right to stop merchandise, passengers, baggage, and everything on the wharf in transitu to Savannah, which created at the time great excitement among the merchants and traders, who were following legitimate commerce, and who appealed to me as mayor to interfere for the protection of a legitimate trade. I had no power to prevent it, and so telegraphed the Governor of Georgia in reply to a communication from him; and, if there be wrong in that, my enemies are welcome to make the most of it. I did what I conceived to be my official duty, and, under like circumstances, I would do the same again.

As to the riots in the city of New York, they have been before referred to by Mr. DAVIS, representing the city of Baltimore—the author of this bill now under discussion. He has scarcely made a speech in this House that he has not referred to the riots of last summer in New York. Neither he nor the member from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] should reflect upon New York on this ground. The city of Baltimore, and the immediate constituency of the gentleman from Maryland, has long been distinguished for its riots, and for the honor of having some of the most cruel and bloodthirsty rioters which have ever disgraced any American community. As to Dayton, the residence of Mr. SCHENCK, there have been serious riots in that little town within three years; and but the other day a mob of drunken soldiers broke into the office of the Empire, a Democratic newspaper, and attempted to assassinate its editors and proprietors because they differed with them in political sentiment. Was that the result of the teachings of the gentleman from Ohio? The city of New York, with an average population of nearly a million, has had but two riots in twenty years. I was not in the city of New York at the time the riots occurred there. I had left the city some time previous, but I am well informed as to what occurred, and consider myself capable of speaking intelligently upon that subject. The causes of that outbreak can be placed at the door of this Administration or its agents. The quota demanded from the State of New York of the number of men to be drafted in July last was greater than it should have been. This has been well determined and admitted by the Administration since, and the quota demanded from the city was especially unjust. This, with a pervading belief that the conscription law was not only unconstitutional but unnecessary and oppressive, was the original cause of hostility to the execution of the law among the poorer classes of people.

Again, sir, the enrollment itself was unfairly made. There was a very significant omission on the enrolling lists of the sons of rich men who had political influences to exempt them, while the poor man's sons, who voted the Democratic ticket, found their names faithfully recorded. This increased the excitement. Instances are within my own knowledge where young, healthy men were exempted for alleged physical inability because they had the influence to which I have referred. Other young men, feeble in body, were held because they had not the political influence necessary to shield them. And when the drawing itself commenced the apparent unfairness with which that was begun in some districts of the city added injury to injury, and the people could not be restrained, and a disturbance occurred of an ordinary character which could have been easily suppressed by the exercise of the ordinary means. But this was not what the Republican managers wanted; they wanted the riot and a pretext for the declaration of martial law; and then it was that the military were ordered out—Federal soldiery, not the local militia, under the direction of Federal officers, secretly prompted by radical Republican politicians—and they let fly their murderous fire into a crowd of men, women, and children, without discrimination or hesitation. I need not say that this produced a riot. In less time than I have been rehearsing these facts thousands and thousands of poor honest men were found in the streets ready to offer up their lives a sacrifice upon the spot rather than be torn from their families by enemies more inimical to their rights and liberties than those against whom they were to be forced to take up arms. I have authority, sir, for what I say, and ask the Clerk to read some extracts from war papers in the city of New York, and also an extract from a letter from Thurlow Weed, whom none here will charge with sympathy with the rebels.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"We copy copiously from the Herald as follows: "THE REAL CONSPIRACY IN THE LATE RIOT.—The mystery that enveloped the events of the week of terror in this city is fast being cleared away. The nest of the conspirators has been probed, and they now stand before the public in their hideous forms. When we saw the Tribune, Times, and Post, day after day, amid the tumults and trying scenes in this city, filled with bitter, acrimonious, and bloodthirsty articles, we concluded that there was some secret under and behind all the disturbances, which was purposely hidden from the general public. Time has verified our suspicions. Facts that have come to light within the last few days conclusively prove that the incendiary course of the radical journals was prompted solely by a fixed determination to increase the extent of the riot and to force a collision between the State and national authorities.

"The latter point accomplished, it was to be followed with the declaration of martial law, a military governor, and all the appliances that this satanic radical committee, with Greeley, Raymond, Godwin & Co. at its head, with its dozen or fifteen tails, could bring to bear to control future elections in this city. They were foiled in their evil and bloody work by the tact and skill of Generals Wool and Sandford, with the cooperation of Governor Seymour. The riot and suffering and the reign of terror were, however, extended by them at least three days by their nefarious work.

"How these radical conspirators tampered with the military is shown by the reports of Generals Wool and Sandford. The letter of the former states that on Monday afternoon, 13th, General Harvey Brown tendered his services. His offer was accepted, and he was directed to report to Major General Sandford. It was soon found that General Brown did not act in harmony with General Sandford. General Wool thereupon issued an order; but this Brown did not obey, but presented himself in the evening, asking to be excused from the operations of the order. This General Wool refused to grant him, declaring—"That for efficient operations a hearty cooperation of the State and United States troops with the police was necessary to put down the mob.

"General Brown persisting, he was excused from further service. Mark the sequel. The next morning the radical papers denounced the military authorities in unmeasured terms, and howled for martial law. General Brown also appeared about eight o'clock in the morning at General Wool's headquarters and asked to be reinstated, saying, in substance, 'that he was in the wrong.' He was reinstated. What then? The same authority states that he acted without any reference to General Sandford.

"Right here comes in the important testimony of General Sandford. The latter, in his official report, asserts—

"That the rioters were dispersed on Monday night and Tuesday morning, and the peace of the city would have been restored in a few hours but for the interference of Brevet Brigadier General Brown, who, in disobedience of the orders of General Wool, withdrew the detachments belonging to the General Government."

"This act so weakened the small military force in the city that it was again placed at the mercy of the rioters, and the bloody scenes were continued two or three days longer. The Tribune clamored the next morning for the removal of General Wool.

"Thus we have the official testimony that General Brown was used by the radicals. It is a well-known fact that Generals Wool and Sandford were in frequent consultation with Governor Seymour, and that these three officials worked together in harmony. Brown, on the other hand, was no doubt urged to ask to be reinstated by the little satanic committee composed of Greeley, Raymond, and Godwin, they fearing that unless he was there to interfere with the plans of Seymour, Wool, and Sandford, the riots would be put down, and their plans of martial law and conflict between the State and national authorities defeated.

"Brown's reinstatement was essentially necessary for the success of their schemes. Hence the pretended confession that he was wrong. General Brown is no doubt a member of a church in good standing, and a good military officer. He has done good service for his country at Fort Pickens and other points, and, like Phelps and Hunter, is a good fighter, when the negro is not about. But hold up the negro to such men and they forget all their military knowledge. The radicals held up the nigger and nigger party to Brown, and all military ability departed except for mischief.

"If the above facts, which are corroborated in every particular by the official reports of Generals Wool and Sandford, do not show that the New York riot was fanned and fed by the abolitionists, if not by the Administration itself, for the purpose of aiding the Republican party, then the sun does not shine."

"Weed on the Mob Inciters.

"Mr. Thurlow Weed wrote a letter expressing his indignation at the cowardly treatment of the unoffending negroes by the New York mob. He inclosed a check of $500 for their relief, and said:

"For the persecution of the negro there is a divided responsibility. The hostility of Irishmen to Africans is unworthy of men who themselves seek and find in America an asylum from oppression. Yet this hostility would not culminate in murder and arson but for the stimulants supplied by fanatics. Journalists who persistently inflame and exasperate the ignorant and lawless against the negro are morally responsible for these outrages. But what can Wendell Phillips how many negroes are murdered, if their blood furnished material for agitation? There is abundant occasion for the public abhorrence of mob violence. But when all the circumstances have been reviewed the popular condemnation of those who, while the nation is struggling for existence, thrust the unoffending negro forward as a target for infuriated mobs, will become general and emphatic. Ultra abolitionists were hailed in South Carolina, as the 'best friends' of secession. Practically, they are the worst enemies of the colored man. But for the 'malign influence' of these howling abolitionists, in Congress and with the President, rebellion would not, in the beginning, have assumed such formidable proportions; nor, in its progress, would the North have been divided, or the Government crippled."

Mr. WOOD. Governor Seymour has been assailed in this connection. Much has been said by the Administration press and politicians against his course during those three days. In my judgment, whoever else may take exception to the policy which he adopted upon that occasion, the Republicans should not. It was by his presence and the exercise of a kind and beneficent spirit that he did very much to allay the excitement which existed. Had I been Governor of the State, no Federal soldiery should have been allowed within the streets of the city of New York. The Governor of our State is commander-in-chief of the militia of the State. He has an army at his command subjected to his orders; he has all the physical and legal power to preserve public property and to protect the peace of the State, and it was an insult to the State of New York for Federal troops to have been interfering in what was exclusively a local matter, over which the local authorities had the exclusive jurisdiction. And I repeat that if any just charge can be made to the door of Governor Seymour against his course upon that occasion, it was that he did not demand of the Government the withdrawal of the Federal troops, and if that demand had been refused, would have compelled them to have retired at the point of the bayonet. He should have said that this was our fight; these were our citizens, the preservation of peace and of order we were responsible for, and until the city and the State authorities had failed to perform their duty, the General Government had no right or power under the Constitution to interfere. When the State calls upon the Federal Government for aid, it is the duty of the Federal Government to give it, but until the State does, it is a usurpation for her to attempt interference. These are my views of the relative powers and duties of the two Governments on this subject—views I have always held and shall always maintain.

And as to my address at the Union square meeting, I did make an address there. I did urge the raising of soldiers to protect the Federal capital. I did more than that. Out of my own purse I raised a regiment, the Mozart regiment, for the purpose of protecting the capital and preserving the integrity of the Union; and if that be guilt, thus far am I guilty. But my presence at the Union square meeting, and the men that I raised and placed under arms, were not designed to aid in the prosecution of an abolition crusade against the domestic rights and interests of a sovereign people. I have never, knowingly, from the commencement of this war, contributed by word, deed, or act, anything to facilitate the continuance of the policy which has been pursued for three years back; which, in my judgment, is utterly destructive and ruinous, not only to the Union but to numbers of people both North and South.

So far as I am personally concerned I am neither wedded to nor shall I become the victim of party. I do not believe that either party, if pledged to a continued prosecution of the war, and keeping that pledge, will remove the evils which surround us. These evils are the results of and incident to the war. The war is the cause, and that must be removed before the evils can cease. Therefore I am free to say that I see no immediate relief. I complain of no man for not thinking as I do. There is an unnatural condition of public sentiment. "The times are out of joint" indeed. But they must continue out of joint for a while longer. Guizot said that "it is by exhaustion and necessity that God imposes justice and good sense upon nations." As yet our "exhaustion and necessity" have not reached that degree of intensity which teaches "good sense or justice." How long it may be delayed I know not; but, be it shorter or longer, we must wait. The like spirit of fanaticism now pervading this country had a duration of over a half century in England during its period of revolution. Ours is not the first instance in history in which the established order of things has had to yield to the destructive spirit of fanaticism and misrule.

Different periods present their own peculiarities of the popular mind. Sometimes for a longer or shorter period human thought and action are progressive and conservative, while at others it is retrograde and fanatical. In all countries during modern ages these periodical conditions of men's minds have developed themselves, and it is singular that in the most enlightened and powerful nations of Europe these changes have been the most frequent and violent. In France and England examples of the most striking as well as of the most destructive character have occurred within the last two centuries, and it is remarkable that in both countries these excitements have succeeded periods of large intellectual or philosophical developments. The revolution in England which produced the death of Charles I, and the revolution of France, which produced the death of Louis XVI, are examples. In each of those countries an enlightened and elevated condition of the higher classes existed immediately preceding these occurrences, and in each country the excitements culminated in the same results, though flowing from widely different causes.

That of England, which covered a period of over sixty years, commencing in the latter part of the sixteenth century, had its rise in the spirit of hostility to what had been considered the established church. Men broke violently loose from the forms of religious ceremony, rushing with blind zeal to the opposite extreme; surging from a narrow bigotry to an ultraism far more dangerous to their salvation and involving certain destruction to their temporal welfare. The largest liberty of religious belief and form of worship were demanded as natural rights. Those who clung to the ancient creed and ceremonies were deemed to be the enemies of mankind and to be put to the sword as such. Thus a fanaticism equally bigoted and more intolerant than that which it sought to abolish ran rampant through the popular heart, subverting all laws human and divine. The established Government was assailed, not so much because it was monarchial but that it was suspected of Papist inclinations. Personal ambition was not slow to discover in this condition of the popular mind the material for self-aggrandizement, and hence hostility to the Crown was encouraged as part of the duty of those who sought liberty.

This rebellious spirit added materially to the rising tempest, and it created a power which swept before it the feeble effort made to resist it. It soon became irresistible. Constitutions, organic laws, and fundamental principles of law alike fell prostrate before its dreadful march. Charles I had neither the moral nor the physical power to maintain himself against it. He struggled, parleyed, threatened, but at last yielded, falling upon the scaffold unhonored and unpitied, without having earned a martyrdom in behalf of either Church or State. It was now that fanaticism had control—Puritanism and Oliver Cromwell assumed the reins of government. The former was evidently, if not altogether, composed of many sects. It comprised a variety of religious beliefs, all agreeing, however, in a common hostility to the monarchy and the church of Rome. Cromwell was their patron and representative; he became the embodiment of this hostility, and with masterly genius of discrimination, strongly backed by military power and renown, he held the angry conflicting zealots of fanaticism within his grasp, controlling, as no ordinary man would have done, the fierce element of popular commotions which the bloody spirit of the people had evoked. This excitement occupied the English mind for sixty years. During this period it assumed various phases. That internal struggle for political mastery was continued and acrimonious; it was consistent only in its unreasonableness, its ultraism, its pretensions to divine sanctity, its political and religious hypocrisy, and its opposition to all rule except its own.

The Revolution of France was later. It occurred long after England had passed through her religious period to which I have referred. And as if to illustrate the fact that fanaticism is of the same character and produces the same results in all countries and at all periods of the world, its justification was found in an anti-religious excitement opposed to divine revelation and to the existence of a God. It had its origin in the very opposite principle to that which created the English Revolution. And yet it was exactly parallel to it in all essential features and in the dreadful fruits it produced. The social fabric was overturned, the established Government was demolished, the ancient forms of jurisprudence and the fundamental systems were alike subverted. As to religion, not only was the Romish church ignored, but all forms of religion and all creeds of faith were swept away. Atheism was the worship.

Now, sir, what is the nature of this war? From whence has it risen? It what phase of man's peculiar nature can be found the idea—the moving impulse, the wish, the thought, the passion—which first prompted resort to arms, and is now prosecuting with such hellish fury on both sides the dreadful work of blood and carnage? We do not find in territorial dispute the cause; nor in misunderstandings growing out of diplomatic correspondence; nor in military conflicts; nor in any of the causes which have heretofore induced quiet and free communities to resort to the arbitrament of the sword. There must be some other cause, and, to warrant the nature of the conflict, it must lie in the deepest recesses of our nature, and to be found in our worst passions.

It is not a political war. Our political elements may have afforded a field for the development of the causes which engendered it, but those causes do not belong to the legitimate sphere of municipal government nor to the maxims which regulate the policy of a party and shape the conduct of an administration. They belong to the fundamental ideas which make a people and impress a distinctive character on the framework and organization of society. This is a war of ideas, a thoroughly revolutionary war, an unholy breaking of the seals of the Constitution in order to accomplish the reorganization of southern society, in conformity to the plans of the socialist reformers of the school of pseudo-philanthropists. This is neither a slaveholders' rebellion or an office-holders' revolt, but an aggressive movement on the part of those who proclaimed that this Union could not consist of States some free and others slave. The origin of the war is that firebrand theory which sometimes phrased itself in an irrepressible conflict between "free labor" and "capital labor." When anti-slavery fanaticism entered the field of politics and tainted the deliberations of party, then commenced the growth of sectionalism, a sectionalism doubly formidable, as it not only alienated State from State, dividing the Union by geographical lines, but assailed the vital interests of the citizens of those States, threatened the existence of their most important institutions, and demanded the unconditional surrender of the whole system of social order, to be reformed to suit itself. To abolish slavery by the sword is violently, unconstitutionally, to wipe out of existence what counted as property three years ago to the amount of $4,000,000,000. To abolish slavery thus is to destroy the settled order of society in sixteen States with whom the States where this idea prevails had entered into a solemn league and plighted faith that they and their citizens would not interfere nor touch. To abolish slavery by this mode is to pave the way for universal degradation, poverty, and social chaos, in the States where it is to operate.

I say that the principle of negro emancipation, recognized by the bill under consideration, and on which this war is now avowedly conducted, and which assuredly was the moving and effective cause of the same, involves the total disruption of society in the South and disorganization of the Government of the North. All races, ages, and conditions of mankind in both sections are interested in opposing the accomplishment of this most disastrous experiment. Negro and Caucasian, bond and free, slaveholder and non-slaveholder, are alike exposed to the evils that this monstrous social error will engender. We of this generation may not be able to estimate the full measure of the misery that will follow the realization of the fantastic theory which, promising to remove the yoke from every shoulder, will curse the earth with sterility and man with vice and poverty.

Apart from considerations based on a common origin, language, religion, ties of blood and affiliation, long years of amity and friendly and intimate association, and, above all, the obligations of a solemn compact, which made us as substantially one as are the parties to the matrimonial bond, we should look to the probable consequences of a war like this—a conflict nursed by discordant ideas and stimulated by the exaggeration of a social reformation, so deemed in the fanatical brains where it has been hatched. Do we comprehend the character of these wars of ideas—their long continuance, their remorseless cruelty, and the exterminating desolation they have uniformly left behind them? Amid the awful record of bloodshed and national crimes, the most horrible have been those of a social and religious character. Rome, the conqueror and mistress of the world, through the convulsions consequent on the distinctions in her social constitution into patrician and plebeian, was for centuries distracted by faction, revolution, and final civil war. There was no union between "the iron and the clay," to adopt the imagery of the dream of the monarch of Babylon. The civil wars of Marius and Sylla, of Cæsar and Pompey, of Brutus and Antony, of Antony and Augustus, if they did not destroy the great fabric of Roman conquest, did certainly consume the lives of millions of men, and were accompanied by cruelties of the deepest dye.

The wars which followed the establishment in Arabia of the Mohammedan faith extend, we may say, from the era of the Hægira to the time when John Sobieski, the heroic King of Poland, defeated the Turks under the walls of Vienna, extending over a thousand years, and embracing within its limits south western Asia, southeastern Europe, Spain, and northern Africa.

The French Revolution, to which I have referred, with its dark and lurid picture of massacres, anarchy, the guillotine in the background, concluded with a general European conflagration and the wars of the first French emperor. The emphatic and broken sentences of Carlyle fitly describe the scenes of the reign of terror, while the establishment of a new dynasty as the result of that stupendous social earthquake is now going forward before our eyes. We think, perhaps, more of Valmy, Lodi, Marengo, Austerlitz, Waterloo, Magenta, and Solferino in this drama of desolation, and less of the ingulfment of the abuses of feudalism which led to the breaking out of the Revolution. This is the usual error of mankind, to think more of the visible and material than the social and moral causes which have produced the merely physical outbreaks. Experience, however, continually calls on us to see how it is that ideas control the current of history, and that on them the fate of nations and the happiness or misery of the great masses of mankind depend.

A parallel but somewhat earlier struggle, based rather on religious than social ideas, took place in Europe. I speak of it because the English Revolution which brought Charles I to the scaffold and established Cromwell as Protector was to a certain extent an outshoot of the general movement. The German mind had divided itself on the subject of religion. It was a sectional as well as religious division—North against South—Protestant against Catholic. One of the great masters of modern war, Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, played his part in this, the Thirty Years' War. It drew in, from political considerations, France and her great minister Richelieu; it devastated Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, Denmark, Bohemia, and Hungary—all the central portions of Germany; it consumed a generation of Swedes, and it left traces of its horrors on the towns and cities of Germany for more than a century and a half. I doubt not but that there may be Germans now among us who have looked upon the monuments of that mighty and stubborn civil war and could tell us of the extent of the wreck and the ruin it caused by the relics of the catastrophe. So the geologist reading the course of creation in the rocks can describe the deluge and the earthquake of early epochs from the history left behind them on the stony tablets of the history of the earth.

Mr. Speaker, I have already transcended the time allotted to me in this discussion far beyond the hour. I am indebted to the courtesy of the House for the permission. There is much more I intended to say. The member from Ohio had arraigned me, to which I have fully replied. It was my intention at this time to have put him on trial; but he is not in his seat. I have additional facts which, I am confident, would satisfy the House that he, of all others, should not assail the public conduct of any man on this floor; but I will not use them now. I have no stomach for this kind of debate. The personal references made by me to him and others have been forced from me in self-vindication; and when assailed I hope always to be able and willing to break a lance with my antagonist, and to carry the war back again, "even into Africa."

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to follow the gentleman who has just closed, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] or specially to reply to him; but I cannot help, before proceeding to the general subject, making a remark or two. I have seen a witness in the trial of a cause contradict one after another of the witnesses who had sworn before him, until, when counsel came to sum up, they reckoned the number of witnesses who contradicted him, and justly argued that his testimony, so contradicted, was unworthy of belief. Robert Toombs's telegram to the mayor of New York spoke of arms, and not of merchandise, and so did the mayor's reply to it. They are of record, and stand against the gentleman's assertion. He tells us he fitted out, from his private purse, a regiment; but the men of the Mozart regiment deny the fact, and publish the denial over their signatures. He says the city of New York would not have given the country one hundred men for the Army could its citizens have foreseen the policy that has been adopted by the Administration; but the thousands of men who have just filled the ranks of her decimated veteran regiments, and are hastening to the field to sustain that policy, give indignant denial to the slander, and protest that New York city is not wanting in patriotism, though some of its people do confide in him.

I will not, however, follow the gentleman's challenges on the question of veracity. I will not comment upon his apology for the "disturbance," as he called the mob violence which led to the use of musketry in the streets of New York. Nor will I even press the question as to what his answer was to his friends, when they gathered about him and said to him, "There are rich men whose stout, able-bodied sons are walking free, but my poor boys are subject to the draft; what shall we do?" No; I will not press the question as to what his answer was before he left the city, that his friends, boiling and bubbling with sedition and murder, might do their work without involving him in responsibility. But I will proceed at once to the subject before the House.

The questions involved in the bill are of the first importance. It is not just such a bill as I should have proposed, nor does it meet my unqualified approval. Among other objections to it, in my judgment, is the want of some of the provisions contained in the amendment submitted by my distinguished colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.] I should like to see his distinct declaration that "the confederate States are a public enemy, waging an unjust war, whose injustice is so glaring that they have no right to claim the mitigation of the extreme rights of war which are accorded by modern usage to an enemy who has the right to consider the war a just one."

I would like to see it provide further, as his proposed amendment does, "that none of the States which, by a regularly recorded majority of its citizens, has seceded and joined the southern confederacy, can be considered and treated as within the Union, so as to allow them, or any part or portion of them, to be represented in Congress, or to take any part in the political government of the Union."

And, as more immediately important, I would like to have the bill declare in his language that "in all proceedings to amend the Constitution of the United States none of the States embraced in the southern confederacy can be permitted to participate, nor can they be counted as among the States necessary to form a constitutional majority to adopt said amendments; and that whenever any amendments shall be ratified by three fourths of the non-seceding States, they shall be taken and adjudged to be a part of the Constitution."

I will briefly and rapidly as I can proceed to give the reasons upon which my views are founded.

Sir, the flag of our country symbolizes the sovereignty of our whole country, which extends from the Bay of Fundy to San Diego, from Cape Sable to Mount Olympus, from Brownsville to Pembina, from ocean to ocean, and from the Gulf to the lakes. The question is, how shall the sovereignty the flag symbolizes be exercised over portions of that broad region? How is certain territory to be governed? The Constitution declares the method. Our country in part is governed as States, not confederated, but united by the Constitution of the United States, not united link by link, but so fused as to make a sovereign nation, in the Constitution of which is found ample provision for the government of every foot of the national domain, vast as it is. The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution contains the following provision:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

There can be no sovereignty over any portion of this domain while it is a territory save that of the Government of the United States. But two forms of government are provided for, namely, State and territorial government. But gentlemen say, here are States that were in the Union, but whose people have withdrawn their allegiance and rebelled: how would you govern them? Sir, a State is not immortal; it has a mortal existence; it has its beginning, its transitions, and may have its end. A State may be killed, a State may commit suicide. The act of God may carry through the portals of death the entire people of a State, and extinguish it by reason of the want of citizenship. A foreign Power may subdue the people of a State, hold and exercise dominion over them and their territory, overthrowing their institutions, and establishing others in accordance with the views of the conqueror, thus destroying the State and reducing the people to the condition of colonists, from which they could only escape by successful revolution, or by the assistance of a people from beyond the limits of their State.

Sir, I have said a State may commit suicide. A sovereign convention of the people called to consider the propriety of amending, revising, or abolishing the constitution may abolish that constitution, and having proposed no new one adjourn sine die, submitting their work to the people, and, if approved by them, the State would cease to exist. It might be succeeded by a monarchy, a despotism, or any other form of government; or its territory might be occupied by a foreign Power, or both people and territory be absorbed by a continuous foreign nation. This the people of the revolted States have done. They have destroyed the institutions which bound them politically to this Government. They have organized a foreign government, and seek to transfer to it part of our domain. How is sovereignty manifested? Is it not by the peaceful administration of the laws ordained by the sovereign Government? We have our system of customs, and our postal system; we construe our laws by a judiciary, who derive their appointment from the President, and are confirmed by the Senate. Our judges interpret and apply our laws. The marshals execute their process; but in the event of armed insurrection they appeal to the executive branch of the Government for power to enforce their judgments and decrees. But so long as it is mere insurrection, mob, riot, or local resistance, the fact of such resistance does not overthrow our Government or create war. The States of the Union maintain their connection with our Government by electing through their Legislatures Senators to represent them and express their voice in the Congress of the nation. At the beginning of each decade the Legislature divides the State into districts, each district of which is entitled to send a member of this House to participate in the making of laws. Thus the State and the people thereof, through its organization, make part and parcel of the Government, and while participating in the Government are governed under and by the Constitution.

Is there a State of South Carolina? Pray who represents it on this floor? Who in the other end of the Capitol? Will you name her Senators, or tell me what judge comes from a circuit whereof that State is a part to sit in the councils of our Supreme Court, or what judge holding authority from the President and Senate of the United States administers the laws in its district court? Who or where are the marshals, collectors of its ports, or postmasters, who hold power from our Government and act in its name and behalf? So, too, of the other confederated States. Where or how do you feel the influence of any of them in this Government? How do you enforce the Constitution and laws within the territory once governed by the constitutions of those States? Ah, sir, the sovereign people, or, to speak more precisely, the political people of each of those States, have overthrown the State. Through its corporate power each State destroyed its corporate life, and no one of them exists.

Sir, the destruction of a State by the severance of the constitutional ligaments that bind it to this Government is one thing; but the government of the people upon the territory, the ultimate right to govern, is quite another. The sovereign right of eminent domain is not with the State. Do not, therefore, let me be misunderstood as arguing that the people of a State may oust the jurisdiction and right of the nation, or transfer any territory within the limits or jurisdiction of the United States to a foreign Power. They cannot. Nor can they take themselves out of the jurisdiction of the country unless they leave the limits of its territory. To permit this would be to dissolve our Government; and whoever attempts it must be punished as a traitor. The President and Congress of the United States are bound to resist such an attempt, though it require the expenditure of every able-bodied man and the last dollar of treasure. Their oath to support and defend the Constitution binds them to reconquer possession of territory which is attempted to be thus taken from the people and the Government, as it does to defend the country against any other foe who strikes at the nation's life or attempts to divide its territory.

But the people of our once sister States have not merely destroyed their State governments; they have established others, unrecognized by our Constitution, and have confederated in a foreign and hostile government. The seat of that government is at Richmond, and they send senators and members of congress there to participate in its doings. They have a judicial system, administered by judges appointed by the chief of that confederacy. They have their custom and postal systems, and we know, how terribly have we been taught, that they have an army and navy, the army and navy of a foreign Power, engaged in a struggle with our own. Thus they are alien enemies, though they occupy territory within the limits of the Union. That territory belongs to the people of the Union and their posterity through all time, and none but a traitor or coward would surrender it.

I know that gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House think that we could get along if our country were reduced to its original dimensions. I know that there are among them those who favor the acceptance of peace on any terms, and that there are those who, to judge by their every word and act, would rather see the country divided than that the present Administration should maintain the integrity of our country and reestablish its institutions. Posterity will find it difficult to believe that such men acted in the name of Democracy. Sir, I chanced to find among my papers to-day a speech delivered by General Cass in the Senate on May 10, 1848, and as I read it I could but think of the degeneracy of the men who now claim to speak for the Democratic party to which it was once my pride to belong. The speech was in advocacy of a bill which proposed to enable the President to take temporary military possession of Yucatan. Let me read you a brief extract:

"Mr. President, many of the great principles of national action depend on existing circumstances. There are few mere questions of abstract right in the intercourse of nations. Peaceable acquisitions of territory, or acquisitions in a just war, can give no offense unless to nations whose safety they endanger. Where this is the case, they may be protested against, or resisted, if necessary. It is a question which each nation must judge for itself, and upon its own responsibility, but one which it ought to judge fairly. Much of the public law of the world is founded upon this principle of safety, and the elementary works abound with its illustrations. Traces of it are to be found in all the questions about the balance of power in Europe; in the disputes concerning Malta and Algiers and Belgium, and many other subjects which have engaged the attention of Governments and formed the labors of diplomatists. Its perversion has, no doubt, led to abuses, as has the perversion of many other principles; but its foundation rests in the nature of things. Self-defense is as incident to communities as to individuals, and a provident foresight requires us to watch any dangerous projects of domination and to provide for them as we can. I repeat, that a nation under these circumstances must judge for itself. Proximity of situation, the nature of the intercourse resulting from it, commanding positions to do injury, and other considerations, are all elements to be taken into view. In my opinion, we owe it to ourselves to avow distinctly to the world that we attempt to procure the transfer of Cuba from Spain to any other nation, whether peaceably or forcibly, would be resisted by the whole power of this country. To others it may be a question of territorial aggrandizement or of mercantile cupidity; but to us it is a question of necessity, I had almost said of political life or death. It would become the gate to close the great river of our country. The waters of that river, thereafter as heretofore, would reach the Gulf, but its commerce would never reach the ocean."

I will not detain the House by reading the entire extract I had marked, but will call the attention of gentlemen to another brief passage. Speaking of the Gulf of Mexico and its relation to the development, prosperity, and peace of our country, General Cass said:

"I now come, Mr. President, to other and perhaps graver considerations, directly or indirectly involved in this question. The Gulf of Mexico is the reservoir of the great river of the North American continent, whose importance it is as difficult to realize as it is the value of the country which must seek an outlet to the ocean through its waters. That country is nearly equal to all Europe in extent, embracing twenty-five degrees of latitude and thirty-five of longitude upon the great circles of the globe. This vast basin extends from the summit of the Alleghany to the summit of the Rocky mountains, and its population now equals eight millions. The man yet lives who was living when almost the first tree fell before the woodman's stroke in this great domain, and the man is now living who will live to see it contain one hundred million people. Already the hardy western pioneer has crossed the barrier of the Rocky mountains, and the forest is giving way before human industry upon the very shores that look out upon China and Japan. The Mississippi is the great artery of this region, which, drawing its supplies from the fountains of the North, pours them into the ocean under a tropical sun, and drains in its own course and in the course of its mighty tributaries—tributaries in name, but equals and rivals in fact—the most magnificent empire which God in His providence has ever given to man to reclaim and enjoy. I have myself descended that great stream two thousand miles in a birch canoe, admiring the country through which it passes in a state of nature, and lost in the contemplation of what that country is to be when subdued by human industry. The statistics of such a region in years to come is a subject too vast for calculation. Its extent, fertility, salubrity, means of internal navigation, and the character of the people who will inhabit it, baffle all efforts to estimate its productiveness, the tribute which its industry will pay to the wants of the world, and the supplies which the comforts and habits of its people may require.

"During the palmy days of Napoleon, it is said that one of his projects was to convert the Mediterranean into a French lake. England has nearly done what defied the power and ambition of the great conqueror. She has almost converted it into an English lake in time of war. Gibraltar commands its entrance, Malta the channel between Sicily and Africa, and the Ionian islands the waters of the Levant. There were good reasons for believing a short time since that England was seeking to obtain a cession of the island of Crete, the ancient kingdom of Minos, which would give her the port of Canea, that I found one of the most magnificent harbors in the world, equally capacious and secure. If England, in the pursuit of the same system, should acquire similar commanding positions on the Gulf of Mexico, that great reservoir would become a mare clausum, and no keel would plow it nor canvas whiten it in time of war but by her permission. Now, sir, looking to the extent of our coast in that direction, to the productions which must pass there to seek a market, to the nature of our population, and to the effect upon all these which a permanent naval superiority would produce, where is the American who is not prepared to adopt any measures to avert such a calamitous state of things? Who can fail to see the nature of the predatory warfare which England would carry on in all times of hostilities from her various positions which would encircle the Gulf from the Bahamas to Cuba and to Yucatan? And who also can fail to see that even in time of peace her many harbors would become places of refuge for a certain class of our population, and that perpetual collisions would occur, involving the peace of the two countries?

"The Gulf of Mexico, sir, must be practically an American lake for the great purpose of security—not to exclude other nations from its enjoyment, but to prevent any dominant Power, with foreign or remote interests, from controlling its navigation. It becomes us to look our difficulties in the face. Nothing is gained by blinking a great question. Prudent statesmen should survey it; and, as far as may be, provide for it. We have, indeed, no Mount Carmel, like that of Judea, nor prophet to ascend it and to warn us against a coming storm. But the home of every citizen is a Mount Carmel for us, whence he can survey the approaching cloud, even when no bigger than a man's hand, which threatens to overspread the political atmosphere, and to burst in danger upon his country. It should be a cardinal principle in our policy, never to be lost sight of, that the command of the Gulf of Mexico must never pass into foreign hands. Its great geographical features indicate at once our safety and our danger."

What impudent effrontery it is for men who plead for peace and recognition and are ready to consent to the reduction of our country to its original limits to claim to speak the voice of the party to which Lewis Cass belonged, and whose principles and purposes he so admirably expressed. What claim have they to the name of Democrat? Why do they not raise a white banner and inscribe upon it "Peace, peace at any price," and proclaim boldly their willingness to barter hope, honor, and country, for ignoble peace. They cannot by flaunting the banner of a murdered party conceal the treason that would sell half the country to a semi-barbarous neighbor and so involve the remainder in perpetual war.

I will not pause to examine the extent of the domain they would surrender. Sixteen years ago that proud party would have involved the country in war with any European Power that had remotely menaced the trade of the Mississippi by the occupation of Yucatan. Then the leaders of that party gave "notice to the world," by their speeches in the two Houses of Congress, "that the attempt to procure the transfer of Cuba from Spain to any other nation would be resisted by the whole power of this country," because such transfer might embarrass or cripple the trade of that river; but the leaders of the peace Democracy propose to surrender not only all interest in the keys to the Gulf but the Gulf States and fifteen hundred miles of the Mississippi itself, from Keokuk, Iowa, to its mouth. Only men who perpetrate and would perpetuate the crimes of slavery in the name of Christianity would, while proposing so infamous a wrong to democratic republican institutions as this, claim to be governed by the principles or traditions of the party of Jefferson, Jackson, and Cass.

But it is argued that the old States exist and are in the Union, and that it is therefore not only not necessary but unconstitutional to provide for reconstruction. This is no longer an abstract question. The Supreme Court has settled it by repeated decisions. There was a time when gentlemen on the other side of the House accepted the decisions of that court as binding on their judgment and conscience. Yes, when it was disgracing the age and country by proclaiming that there were four millions of our people who possessed no rights, not even that of chastity, that a white man was bound to respect, these gentlemen accepted its decisions, and I hope they will not reject them now. In a decision made more than a year ago, (Claimants of the schooner Brilliant vs. United States, March term, 1863,) that high judicial authority declared that "the people of the seceded States, without distinction, as to loyalty or disloyalty, have the same rights, and the same rights only, as alien enemies invading the land." So also in all the prize cases reported in 2 Black's Reports they decide that they are traitors, and not only traitors but public enemies; and in the administration of law and conduct of the war we may not distinguish between them on questions of personal loyalty or disloyalty, because the war is a public territorial war, and must be conducted as between belligerents alien to each other.

The States are out of the Union but the territory belongs to the United States, and the people, if they remain upon it, must be governed by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The State constitutions having been overthrown, it belongs to Congress to provide for the reconquest of the territory and its government; and it is the duty of the Executive to effect that conquest by any and all means known to modern warfare and within the law of nations. These are the only limitations, not only upon the power but upon the duty of the Government.

Ah, but says the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR], the President does not agree with you in these views, and in insisting upon such legislation as this you are waging war upon the President and trying to break him down. It was well said last evening by my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] that if the assumption of the gentleman from Missouri that he speaks as the special and confidential friend of the President does not break him down we need not fear that anything else will. But let us see whether we agree with him or are trying to break him down.

Sir, our good President—and I mean what I say when I call him our good President; may God bless and keep him—has a habit of speaking for himself and at his own time. If his friends see fit to quarrel about what he thinks, it is their quarrel and not his; but whenever a public exigency may require him to act on the question that divides them, he will probably settle it, for he is a frank and truthful man. His friends need have no controversy on this question, as he has no concealments. He has not only spoken on this subject to the people of the North, but to those of the South. I have his amnesty proclamation which was read to us on the 9th of December, and has been scattered far and wide in the rebel States as the agencies at his command could carry it. What does he say there? The object of that proclamation is the restoration of the Union by the organization of loyal States on confederate territory. Among other things the preamble says:

"Whereas it is now desired by some persons heretofore engaged in said rebellion to resume their allegiance to the United States and to reinaugurate loyal State governments within and for their respective States."

"To inaugurate," says Webster, "is to institute; to invest with a new office by solemn rites." The very object the President desires, as expressed so clearly in this admirable paper, is the reinstitution of State governments over the territory over which they once prevailed.

I care not whether the States to be instituted be as large as Texas or as small as Delaware. When any given portion of the country shall be peopled by loyal men, who shall meet in convention and adopt a constitution and present it to Congress asking admission into the Union, it will be our duty to consider the constitution and to determine on the question of admission. Here, again, my views appear to be in perfect consonance with those of the President; for on this subject the proclamation says:

"And it is suggested as not improper that in constructing a loyal State government in any State, the name of the State, the boundary, the subdivisions, the constitution, and the general code of laws as before the rebellion be maintained, subject only to the modifications made necessary by the conditions heretofore stated, and such others, if any, not contravening the said conditions, and which may be deemed expedient by those framing the new State government."

Does the President insist upon the revival of the names, boundaries, or subdivisions of former States? No. But as it might in some instances be proposed to maintain all or any of them he suggests that it would not be deemed improper to do so. Why may not the two Carolinas be combined and called the State of Carolina, if so the people occupying that portion of territory determine, and, having held a proper convention representing all the territory within the two old States, come and ask us to accept the constitution and admit the State into the Union. Or suppose they come with two constitutions springing from two conventions, one representing the people who occupy the old State of North Carolina, the other the people who dwell within the limits of the old State of South Carolina; would it not be proper to admit the one or both as the case might be? Neither the Constitution nor the President's amnesty proclamation make it necessary that the limits or name of a future State shall be determined by what existed prior to the overthrow of the now rebellious States.

Sir, the question whether those States are in or out of the Union is said by some gentlemen to be an unimportant one. I think it is a very important one, and may, before a great while, be of great practical importance. We have before us a bill from the Senate providing for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States. How many and what States are to pass upon that question? Under article five of the Constitution, should it receive a two-thirds vote in this House, it will be submitted to the Legislatures of the States, and if ratified by three fourths thereof it will be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution. Are the rebel States in or out of the Union for the purpose of passing on this proposed amendment? If the amendment fails in this House the Legislatures of two thirds of the States may require us to call a convention for proposing amendments. The Legislatures of two thirds of how many States must unite in such a request? In either of these cases we must know whether the confederate States are in or out of the Union before we can determine this vital question. Certainly these are practical questions—questions which must be settled. I have no fear as to what the decision of the Supreme Court will be if we act upon the theory that the old States have been utterly abolished. The three fourths of the remaining States will unquestionably be held to be adequate to act, because the theory that the rebellious States no longer exist as States of the Union is true and in harmony with many decisions already pronounced by the Supreme Court.

It is in another point of view a question of great practical importance. We have a presidential election pending in which it may become important; and there should be some clear, well-defined expression of the opinion of Congress on the subject before the possible contingency arises. It is not frank, it certainly is not courageous, in a time like this to shirk a great question because it is possible that it may have no practical importance; while it may on the other hand be used as a means of extreme embarrassment to if not for the absolute overthrow of the Government. The President regards it as the duty of Congress to act on this question. He prepared the people of the South by his proclamation to expect Congress to act on the subject by saying in his offer of amnesty:

"It may be proper to further say that whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally rests exclusively with the respective Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive."

I apprehend that nobody can deny that we have properly passed on questions of the admission of gentlemen coming here claiming to represent the loyal people of rebellious States. Congress alone can determine who shall be a member thereof.

But the President, as if to remove all possible doubt as to his clear recognition of the power and duty of Congress in the premises, says:

"And still further, that this proclamation is intended to present the people of the States wherein the national authority has been suspended and the loyal State governments have been subverted a mode in and by which the national authority and loyal State governments may be re-established within said States or in any of them, and while the mode presented is the best the Executive can suggest with his present impressions, it must not be understood that no other possible mode would be acceptable."

It was certainly a mischievous spirit that prompted the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] to claim that the opinions he expressed were those of the author of the amnesty proclamation.

I object in part to the bill before us, because it is drawn rather too largely from the President's plan. It leaves to a military man, a brigadier general, the organization of the new governments. Mr. Speaker, we have a simple and a better mode of governing Territories. We give them a territorial government, a Governor, secretary, judges, and the right to elect a Territorial Legislature; and provide for their forming a constitution whenever they have sufficient population to constitute a State and to apply for admission into the Union. This method operated admirably during the long period in which we grew from thirteen to thirty-three States. The fact that most distinctly presaged this war, was an attempt to depart from it and establish a new one based on one of two novel theories, that of popular sovereignty, or that of the recognition of slavery as a national and not a local institution. We have already seen the evil effects of a departure from our territorial system and of a military governor attempting to organize a State. The experiment has been made in Louisiana, where a general announced that martial law was the fundamental law of the State in the proclamation in which he ordered the first election and fixed the day on which it should be held. Indeed, he undertook by proclamation to make a constitution for the State. Accepting the constitution of the old State as a basis, he set aside two distinct clauses of it, one which prohibited soldiers in the service of the United States Government from voting, and another which related to and regulated slavery; and the question is already powerfully made by loyal citizens of New Orleans, why did he not strike out the clauses highly prejudicial to them? No man will deny that the election was shaped by the military power, wielded by that general. He struck out or permitted to remain so much of what he was pleased to recognize as a constitution as was agreeable to him, and there is no reason why he should not have stricken out more, or, if he had the power to strike out, why he should not have added clauses. In fact, his military regulations were equivalent to new clauses in the pretended constitution. The election was a ridiculous farce, because General Banks assumed to be governed by what did not exist—the constitution of Louisiana, which had been overthrown when she withdrew her Senators from this Capitol and her members from this House. That he knew it had no force as a binding law is patent from the fact that he excised vital provisions by his mere edict. So will it be everywhere if Congress do not provide the means of reconstruction. Therefore it is that I would prefer to apply our old territorial system to the reorganization of the entire territory of the confederacy, but will, rather than omit all legislation on the subject, vote for the bill as reported, even though the amendment proposed by my colleague be rejected by the committee or the House.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] and others tell us that before we can establish any governments in the revolted States we must exterminate or annihilate the people of the whole wide field of the confederacy; that we cannot have peace between a conquered and a conquering people or their descendants.

Sir, the President, in the proclamation I have referred to, offers, with few exceptions, general pardon to the people of the rebel country. But his right to offer pardon is denied. His right to grant conditional pardon is denied. His right to pardon the people en masse is denied. These denials may be made in ignorance, but I fear they are prompted by a mischievous spirit. Certain it is they who make them shut their eyes against what they know to be the law of the land or speak in utter ignorance of that law. Such pardons have constitutional, congressional, and judicial sanction. The pardoning power is vested in the President by section two of article two of the Constitution. And Congress, foreseeing the necessity for the exercise of that power in behalf of the rebels against the Government, by an act approved July 17, 1862, provided as follows:

"That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such times and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

This is in accordance with settled law. The Supreme Court decided that the President may grant conditional pardons. (7 Peters's Rep., p. 161.) It has decided that a pardon does not take effect until it is accepted; that a man denying his guilt may reject the proposed pardon which proceeds upon the basis of his guilt. (7 Peters, p. 161.) The President also follows English precedents, as did Washington, the first President of the United States, who granted amnesty and pardon to the people of western Pennsylvania who had engaged in the whisky insurrection. Charles II, before returning to England, April 16, 1660, issued a general amnesty, proclaiming conditional pardon with exceptions, such as our good President has made; and he followed the course of George II in what was termed the Jacobite revolution in 1745. You will find in chapter fifty-two, 23 George II, 1747, that that king issued a proclamation granting conditional pardon to the Scottish insurgents who had fought for the Pretender. Ah! but, say the champions of the rebels on this floor, the pardon will not be accepted, and you cannot conquer them, and if you could you would breed only perpetual civil war. Then, Mr. Speaker, this broad, fertile, beautiful, heaven-enriched country of ours, this land upon which imagination paints three hundred million people dwelling in peace, with a measure and general diffusion of intelligence that the world has never seen, with a measure of comfort unequalled by that known to any people on the earth, is doomed to perpetual war. For, sir, if we recognize the confederacy, and create two continuous martial republics, with thousands of miles of frontier and conflicting systems of labor, we will make war inevitably perpetual.

But let us see whether those gentlemen speak from the teachings of history or with fair judgment of the facts that surround us, or take counsel of their sympathy with our foes. Let me remark, sir, that the progenitors of the hundreds of millions who are to people the South are not dwelling on that soil now. The confederate States claim to hold nearly one half of our territory lying east of the Rocky mountains, a territory on which may dwell one hundred and fifty million people, but on which there are now less than eight million white and four million black people. Throw your eyes across the Atlantic and behold Europe swarming with oppressed but restless and aspiring people. You see there the people and ancestors of the people who are to occupy the South as well as the broad prairies of the Northwest and the golden fields of the Pacific slope. We must go beyond our country to find those who will populate it in the long hereafter through which it is to live. Yet the Pilgrim Fathers will ever be hailed as the fathers of the country, for the civilization they instituted, resting as it does on intelligence, morals, and religion, will prevail over the whole country. Year after year from the crowded Old World the tide of emigration will swell and flow. The future owners of thousands of southern plantations are now upon the green hills of Vermont, or laboring in the industrious villages of Massachusetts or other northern States. They are strolling over the verdant hills and through the beautiful valleys of

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 131.

Ireland. They are singing the Ranz des Vaches among the free hills of Switzerland, or wandering along the historic and beautiful shores of the Rhine. The omniscient Eye sees them among the people of every nation in the world. A single generation hence the American people will read the story of this war as we read that of the Scottish border wars or of the conflicts of the Anglo-Saxons with their Norman conquerors.

In pursuance of our act of July 17, 1862, pardon is offered to all with few exceptions who will accept it. Hundreds of thousands have already signified their acceptance. In the northern States to-day you find thousands of men who deplore the wickedness of having bared their breasts to the storm of battle against their country's flag. You find under the flag of the Union whole regiments of men who have been taken prisoners, and who, while so held, have discovered the temper of our people, and the infinite and blessed contrast between northern and southern life and habits, and have rallied to the support of the old Government. On a recent visit to the New York navy-yard we found a body of young men training to the use of artillery. We were shown by the gentlemanly commandant their proficiency in working the guns. To our surprise we learned that there was not one of them who had not been in the rebel service, and who was not now glad to fight for the Union.

Look at Arkansas and Louisiana. Look at so much of South Carolina as we have occupied. Do the people require the strong hand of power to be held over them? Do they escape from our lines, or is their number daily increased by families who risk their lives in making their way to the old flag? At the inauguration of the bastard government of Louisiana, over eight thousand children raised their young voices in joyful chorus and were applauded by their rejoicing parents. The people attended en masse and expressed by every species of rejoicing their gratification at their supposed restoration to the Union. We carry with us to the South not alone the bayonet and cannon; we approach the people with other sounds than those of the booming mortar and whizzing rifle. The teacher follows closely the northern Army. The Christian church, gladly accepting the aid of its long offcast child, philanthropy, goes with him. Ours is not a slow age; we move with electric speed. The press is free and ever in motion. The landless and ignorant whites hail the social equality we offer them, and bless us for the schools in which we gather their children. Already they catch our meaning of the words "home," and "family," and hail us not as conquerors but as benefactors. Among the four million colored people there is not one who is not loyal and anxious to serve us despite the neglect and contumely we have heaped upon them. Let us, then, go on conquering. In complete conquest alone can peace be found, and as a means of organizing conquest and peace let us pass this bill.

Mr. COX obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. THAYER, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon the House (at twenty-eight minutes to eleven o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 4, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of commanders and lieutenant commanders of the United States Navy, praying for an increase of the grades of captain and commander; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of real estate and stock auctioneers in the city of New York, remonstrating against the proposed tax of one quarter of one per cent. on sales at auction of real estate and stocks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

TAXATION IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. GRIMES: Some two weeks ago the House of Representatives passed the bill (S. No. 126) to amend "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington," with amendments, and the Senate concurred in the amendments. A motion was afterwards made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] to reconsider the vote concurring in the amendments, and the bill has been suspended for two weeks. I have been solicited on the part of the city authorities to call the matter to the attention of the Senate again, in order to have it determined one way or the other.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope we shall go through with the morning business.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe this is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a special order coming up in a few moments.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I wish to offer a resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask that the vote be taken on the question of reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must announce that the time has arrived which was fixed for the consideration of the special order of the morning. That special order, being the resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] relative to the number constituting a quorum of the Senate, is before the body.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know whether the Senator from New Hampshire designs to contest the bill to which I have called attention, or whether he intends to withdraw his motion to reconsider.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that the bill regulating the grades here?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. HALE. With the leave of the Senate, I will state that I have no interest in that bill and care nothing about it, but some citizens of the District called upon me and stated that its provisions did not answer what was desired, and therefore I moved the reconsideration, and I subsequently introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was intended as a substitute for it, so that I do not care what becomes of the bill, whether it is passed or not; I have no feeling about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will withdraw the motion to reconsider, because I know there are universal complaints here in regard to sewerage, and the health of the people is endangered, and it is necessary that something should be done.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio perhaps did not hear me. I said that since I moved the reconsideration I had introduced a bill which was prepared in the city, and so far as the city press have spoken upon it it seems to be a bill which meets the public wants and expectations. That bill has been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The subject is before the committee, and I do not propose to interfere with a matter which legitimately belongs to that committee. They can do what they think proper without any interference of mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire to withdraw the motion to reconsider?

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. I move, then—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is before the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that it be suspended for a few minutes, until we take a vote on this subject, which can probably be done in five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that, if there is to be no debate, and the vote can be taken at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will be laid aside informally if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say that the bill which is now before the Senate is not, of course, before the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not before the Senate; it must come up by a motion.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 126) to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820.

Mr. GRIMES. This bill has passed both Houses of Congress without any opposition on the part of anybody so far as I know, and passed at the instance of the city authorities, to enable them to accomplish the purposes which have been stated by the Senator from Ohio, to perfect the draining and paving of this city. It is not as complete a bill as some of the private citizens of the District desire to have passed; but the passage of this bill does not preclude Congress from passing another bill; and another bill covering the same subject, but which is not at all in antagonism with this bill, is now under consideration before the Committee on the District of Columbia. I am not prepared to say what may be the action of that committee upon that bill; but if they shall report in favor of its provisions, and the Senate shall pass it, it will not antagonize with any of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HALE. The reason that induced me to make the motion to reconsider—and I will say frankly it is a matter that I have not considered, and I am not competent to give any advice to the Senate upon it—was this: there is a provision in this bill which says that it shall not be in contravention to that section of the charter which authorizes these repairs to be made upon the application of the property-holder, and it was supposed by the gentlemen who were opposed to the bill that that would nullify all that was beneficial in it. That was the reason that induced me to interfere. I have not examined the question; and have no disposition to interfere with the findings of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject appropriately belongs. The Senate can adopt just what they recommend. I do not care. I have done my duty in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate reconsider its vote on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives?

The motion was not agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of contractors for the machinery of the side-wheel steamers known as "double-enders," praying for additional allowance on their contracts, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. No. 50) for the relief of the contractors for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats known as "double-enders." The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to report a bill providing for auditing the claims of loyal citizens for property destroyed or taken by the rebels or by our own troops during the present rebellion, excluding slave property.

Mr. WILSON. I must object to it. I hope no vote of instruction of that kind will be made to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to its present consideration, it lies over under the rule.

CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate what disposition has been made of the lands granted by an act entitled, "An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river," approved June 18, 1838. Also, that he be directed to inform the Senate whether the State of Wisconsin has received the five hundred thousand acres of public lands to which she became entitled on entering the Union, under an act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant preemption rights," approved September 4, 1841; and whether any part of the grant to aid in the construction of the canal above named, or any part thereof, was included in the said five hundred thousand acres, and, if so, how much. Also, that he be directed to inform the Senate what part of the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within the State of Wisconsin, to which she became entitled under the act for the admission of said State into the Union, has been adjusted and paid; and if in the adjustment of the account between the United States and said State the said State has been charged with the value of any lands or the proceeds of the sales thereof, granted under any other law, and if so, to state the amount.

As I suppose there will be no objection to it I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HOWE. My impression is that all the information called for in the resolution is here, communicated by the Secretary of the Interior to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] who made the report on this subject.

Mr. HARLAN. I have read the report carefully, and it is not embodied in the report.

Mr. HOWE. It is here. It was sent to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HARLAN. Has it been sent officially?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. Let the resolution go over, and I will look into the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1865, and it had agreed to the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had insisted upon its disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes, insisted on by the Senate, insisted upon its amendments to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, Mr. ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, and Mr. WILLIAM R. MORRISON of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 207) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate the bill of the House (No. 159) for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State, the error in the engrossment of the bill having been corrected.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 3d instant the following acts:

An act (H. R. No. 47) for the relief of William C. Walker and others; and

An act (H. R. No. 388) for the relief of Jesse Williams.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 207) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendment of the House to the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill; and

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the first amendment of the House to the first amendment of the Senate thereto, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. VAN WINKLE, and Mr. POWELL.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUORUM.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must insist now on the special order being taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the special order of the day, the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio in relation to the quorum of the Senate, the question being on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I desired yesterday that the consideration of this subject should be postponed until this morning, and the Senator from Ohio with his usual urbanity and courtesy assented to that proposition, for which I return him my thanks. I think the proposition a very important one. I will ask the Secretary to read the resolution.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen or qualified.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, according to the estimate in which I hold that proposition it is not often that one of more importance is presented to the consideration of the Senate. It involves an inquiry as to what number of Senators constitute a quorum, and in addition to that the adjunct question whether legislative measures that may be passed are void and inoperative, they not having received the votes of a constitutional quorum of the Senate. I hold this proposition to be not only true but clear: that less than a constitutional quorum of either House of Congress is not competent to pass any measure of legislation. The principle involved in the resolution is therefore one of the highest interest and importance.

The resolution now under consideration reads thus:

Resolved, That a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen or qualified.

The same subject in a resolution of nearly the same words was considered, debated, and incidentally passed upon by the last Senate, about two years ago. That was in these words:

"That a majority of the Senators duly elected and entitled to seats in this body is a constitutional quorum."

It will be observed that there is a difference, and a substantial difference, between the resolution that was then presented and considered and the one now under debate. The pending resolution is—

That a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen or qualified.

There is this difference between the two propositions: according to the former one, a Senator, to be a part of the quorum, must have been duly elected and must be entitled to a seat in the Senate; and unless that was the relation in which he stood to the body, he was not to be estimated in making up the quorum of the Senate. It might be and often is the fact that a man may in truth be admitted as a Senator; he may be allowed to take the oath of a Senator and his seat in the body and to act with it for the time, when he may not have been duly elected; and it was with a view to that state of case, I suppose, that the honorable mover of the present resolution has varied its language and made it read in the terms—

That a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen or qualified.

There is another material difference between the verbiage of the two resolutions. In the first one it was proposed to ascertain what the constitutional quorum was: "that a majority of the Senators duly elected and entitled to seats in this body is a constitutional quorum." The present resolution is, "that a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen or qualified." It is not absolutely certain that it was the purpose and office of the pending resolution to ascertain what the constitutional majority in truth is, or whether it was not the purpose of the mover to give a different principle of the quorum of the Senate than that which is prescribed by the Constitution.

I do not know with absolute certainty whether it is the intention of this resolution to declare what the Constitution is, or to modify the Constitution upon the point of a senatorial quorum, but I presume that the first is its true object, and I shall so treat it, for the obvious reason that a provision of the Constitution, in that or any other respect, as everybody knows, cannot be changed or modified by this mode of proceeding.

There were offered at the same time with the resolution now under debate, and in the same series, two other resolutions, which I will read:

Resolved, That if a majority of the presidential electors, duly appointed and qualified, vote for one person, he is the President.

Resolved, That if the election of President devolves upon the House of Representatives, and the votes of a majority of the States represented in the House be cast for one person, he is the President.

These propositions contemplate a most important and novel construction of the Constitution on three of its great and most essential powers. According to my poor opinion they are each in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution, and if they are adopted and go into practical operation they will materially alter the Constitution in all the important points to which they severally refer. I will devote my remarks, though, exclusively to the resolution declaring a quorum of the Senate. The third section of the first article, paragraph one, of the Constitution, says:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote."

Section five of the same article reads, in the first paragraph:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide."

The question is, what the Constitution and those who framed it meant by the "majority of each House" which they constituted a quorum to do business. I hold that they referred to the Senate and House as they had ordained them, to persons answering to the description and having the qualifications which they had made requisite for membership of them, to be chosen in the mode, by the constituent bodies, for the terms, and of the number which it in previous provisions had established for the two Houses respectively. Neither House was then in fact in existence, so that it was to the two potential bodies, to their abstract organization, from which it eliminated "a quorum to do business." The quorum and the two Houses were then equally abstract ideas. The Constitution had ordained in a previous clause:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years."

And then in section five, same article, that—

"A majority of each [House] shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties as each House may provide."

There were then thirteen States, and each State being entitled to two Senators, the then potential Senate was as absolutely and certainly fixed at the aggregate number of twenty-six, and its quorum to do business at least fourteen members, as though the two matters had been provided for in one clause in these words:

The Senate, until there is a new State or States admitted into the Union, shall be composed of twenty-six members, of which the Legislature of each State shall choose two; and a majority of the Senate shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may prescribe.

If this had been the language of the Constitution a reasonable doubt could not have been raised that a quorum of the Senate to do business must be composed of a majority of its members, as the Constitution had ordained it and established its number. The language which it has employed is plainly of the same import and meaning: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two members from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof," the States being thirteen; "and a majority of each [House] shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide," as definitely and certainly fixes the quorum of the Senate to do business to be a majority of the number of which the Senate should be composed. It could not be the majority of the Senate of, any less number; if so, what less number? Where is it defined? How is it to be ascertained?

If the framers of the Constitution had intended that less than a majority of the whole number which they had provided to compose it should form a quorum to do business, they would have given some expression to that purpose, and probably in one of these forms: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years; but a majority of the Senators qualified and duly elected," or "a majority of the Senators duly elected, shall constitute a quorum to do business."

The reasonable presumption is that the Convention did not intend that a cabal of both or either House of Congress should ever exercise so much of the legislative powers of the Government; and therefore required the quorum of both to do business to be a majority of the whole number of its members. It intended further that it should be certainly known at all times and beyond doubt or contingency what the quorum of each successive Senate and House was; so that less than that quorum might not from inadvertence or ignorance upon any question of the number of the members of either House undertake at any time to transact business. Both these ends would be certainly secured by the law of quorum for which I contend; and both of them would be often defeated by the rule of construction set up in the pending resolution or any other that could be devised.

Though the whole number of the House varies according to each successive census with the ratio of representation fixed at each decennial period, and the number of the Senate is enlarged two whenever a new State is admitted, still the whole number of both Houses never otherwise fluctuates, and is always definitely and certainly known. One more than half of that whole number being the quorum, a simple count of those present will demonstrate whether or not they form a quorum. But the majority of the members duly elected and qualified, or duly elected or having the proper returns of election, would be an uncertain basis upon which to determine the fact of the presence of a quorum, because all or either of those rules would require in addition that the Senators and Representatives computed should be living. There may occur vacancies, or may have been recent vacancies, in distant States, that may or may not have been filled, and concerning the true state of fact the House to which it may relate shall have no information, and its quorum upon this principle being fluctuating it might proceed to do business without having a quorum according to its own rule, and its action would be null and void. No such dilemma could arise under the other rule.

But the danger of the power of the two Houses being absorbed by a cabal or a minority and faction in them would be frequent and probable. Within the last twenty-five years three special sessions of a new Congress have been called by the President. The members of the House from more than half the States were elected before the President issued his proclamation to convene the two Houses; but in the other States, approximating half, no Representatives to the new Congress had been elected. According to this new principle of quorums the members then elected who might have been convened by the President would have formed a constitutional quorum; and being less than two thirds, and only about three fifths of the whole number of Representatives, and a majority of that number being a quorum, the whole power of the House of Representatives would devolve upon less than a third or even a fourth of the whole number of Representatives, against the distinct expression that it should not be exercised by less than a majority of the whole.

But the unsoundness of the principle of the proposed resolution is more strikingly illustrated by the present condition and number of members-elect to the Senate. The whole number of States, including those in rebellion and Virginia and West Virginia, is thirty-five. There are two gentlemen present admitted as Senators from West Virginia, and one from Virginia, the other, Mr. Bowden, having died since the commencement of this session. My opinion is that West Virginia was organized and admitted as a State into the Union contrary to the Constitution, and that the gentlemen who are here as Senators are legitimately no part of the Senate; and that the gentleman who is in this body as the surviving member from Virginia, consisting of the ten or twelve counties that claim to be the Ancient Dominion, and to have their seat of government at Alexandria, has no better warrant for his seat. But for the argument, conceding that Virginia and West Virginia are two of the United States, the whole number of the States being thirty-five, the aggregate number of the Senate is seventy members. The States that have not elected Senators to the present Senate are, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, being ten; the remaining twenty-four are represented in this body, except Virginia, which has but one Senator, she not having filled the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Bowden.

There are, then, forty-nine members elected to the present Senate, twenty-five of whom, by the resolution under consideration, constitute a quorum to do business. The legislative power of the Senate being vested in twenty-five Senators, would be wielded by a majority of that number, thirteen. But the principle of the resolution goes to this extent, that if only New England, or any less number of States, were to elect members of the Senate and the House, a majority of these Senators and Representatives respectively would constitute a quorum to do business, and a majority of those quorums could put in operation the whole legislative power of the Government. The New England States have twelve Senators and twenty-seven Representatives; and by this new constitutional law, if those States only were to elect members of Congress, seven of their Senators and fourteen of their Representatives would constitute quorums of the two Houses, and four of their Senators and seven of their Representatives would be authorized by the Constitution to assume the legislative power of the Government, and if their authority and acts were opposed, it would be treason and rebellion against the United States. The Constitution does not allow, and it was not the intention of the Convention that it should, any such absurd consequences.

According to the position to which I give in my adhesion and to which the practice of the Senate has conformed since the beginning of the Government, the Constitution fixed the quorum of the two Houses in harmony with the great fundamental principle of popular government, the right of not less than a majority of the people to govern, by requiring a majority of the component members of each to do business. Besides, that quorum is certain, fixed, and may be learned and known by all persons in the shortest time and simplest mode. The only fact to be ascertained is the whole number of the members of the Houses, respectively, and we are then informed precisely and infallibly what the quorum of each House is. This resolution proposes to substitute an unknown, variable, and accidental quorum that may be represented not only by less than a majority, but by a small and contemptible faction of the Houses respectively. And when this work of innovation and reduction of the quorum shall have commenced, what limits can be prescribed to its further extension? When factions, and Presidents, and ambitious men at the head of armies have strong motives to control and direct the action of Congress, this innovation and others to mold and fashion quorums, that may be devised, will bring the legislative department in the effigy of a constitutional form to their feet.

This construction is fully sustained by the debates in Convention on the point, which show plainly how that body understood this provision.

The report of its debates by Mr. Madison shows:

"Article six, section three, was then taken up. "Mr. GORHAM contended that less than a majority in each House should be made a quorum; otherwise great delay might happen in business, and great inconvenience from the future increase of numbers.

"Mr. MERCER was also for less than a majority. So great a number will put it in the power of a few, by seceding at a critical moment, to introduce convulsions and endanger the Government. Examples of secession have already happened in some of the States. He was for leaving it to the Legislature to fix the quorum, as in Great Britain, where the requisite number is small, and no inconvenience has been experienced.

"Colonel MASON. This is a valuable and necessary part of the plan. In this extended country, embracing so great a diversity of interests, it would be dangerous to the distant parts to allow a small number of members of the two Houses to make laws. The central States could always take care to be on the spot; and by meeting earlier than the distant ones, or wearying their patience and out-staying them, could carry such measures as they pleased. He admitted that inconveniences might spring from the secession of a small number; but he had also known good produced by an apprehension of it.

"He had known a paper emission prevented by that cause in Virginia. He thought the Constitution, as now molded, was founded on sound principles, and was disposed to put into it extensive powers. At the same time he wished to guard against abuses as much as possible. If the Legislature should be able to reduce the number at all, it might reduce it as low as it pleased, and the United States might be governed by a junta. A majority of the number which had been agreed on was so few that he feared it would be made an objection against the plan.

"Mr. KING admitted there might be some danger of giving an advantage to the central States, but was of opinion that the public inconvenience on the other side was more to be dreaded.

"Mr. GOVERNOUR MORRIS moved to fix the quorum at thirty-three members in the House of Representatives and fourteen in the Senate.

"This is a majority of the present number, and will be a bar to the Legislature. Fix the number low, and they will generally attend, knowing that advantage may be taken of their absence. The secession of a small number ought not to be suffered to break a quorum. Such events in the States may have been of little consequence. In the national councils they may be fatal. Besides other mischiefs, if a few can break up a quorum they may seize a moment when a particular part of the continent may be in need of immediate aid to extort, by threatening a secession, some unjust and selfish measure.

"Mr. MERCER seconded the motion.

"Mr. KING said he had just prepared a motion which, instead of fixing the numbers proposed by Mr. Gouverneur Morris as quorums, made those the lowest numbers, leaving the Legislature at liberty to increase them or not. He thought the future increase of members would render a majority of the whole extremely cumbersome.

"Mr. MERCER agreed to substitute Mr. King's motion in place of Mr. Morris's."

"Mr. ELLSWORTH was opposed to it. It would be a pleasing ground of confidence to the people that no law or burden could be imposed on them by a few men. He reminded the movers that the Constitution proposed to give such a discretion, with regard to the number of Representatives, that a very inconvenient number was not to be apprehended. The inconvenience of secessions may be guarded against by giving to each House an authority to require the attendance of absent members.

"Mr. WILSON concurred in the sentiments of Mr. Ellsworth."

"Mr. GERRY seemed to think that some further precautions than merely fixing the quorum might be necessary. He observed that as seventeen would be a majority of a quorum of thirty-three, and eight of fourteen, questions might by possibility be decided in the House of Representatives by two large States, and in the Senate by the same States with the aid of two small ones.

"He proposed that the number for a quorum in the House of Representatives should not exceed fifty nor be less than thirty-three; leaving the intermediate discretion to the Legislature.

"Mr. KING. As the quorum could not be altered, without the concurrence of the President, by less than two thirds of each House, he thought there could be no danger in trusting the Legislature.

"Mr. CARROLL. This would be no security against the continuance of the quorums at thirty-three and fourteen, when they ought to be increased.

"On the question of Mr. King's motion, that not less than thirty-three in the House of Representatives, nor less than fourteen in the Senate, should constitute a quorum, which may be increased by a law, on additions to the numbers in either House—Massachusetts, Delaware, N. Y., N. H., Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, no—9.

"Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. MADISON moved to add to the end of article six, section three, 'and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.' Agreed to by all except Pennsylvania, which was divided."—Madison Papers, vol. 3, pp. 1287-1290.

Mr. President, this debate shows this state of fact in the Convention: that the identical question now under consideration was before that body for its deliberation and decision, and every member of that Convention, so far as he expressed himself, explicitly, or so far as his understanding of the point can be inferred from the language I have read, regarded the effect and the plain language of the Constitution as it had been reported, to establish conclusively and without any doubt the principle that a majority of the whole number of the Senate, as the Senate had been organized by the Constitution itself, was required to constitute a quorum to transact business. It was the inconvenience and difficulty that might often arise to obtain a quorum, consisting of the whole number of the two Houses, that operated upon many members of that Convention so as to induce them to attempt to make a less number a quorum. Various propositions to that effect were offered, but all of them were voted down, and the Convention steadily adhered to the principle that a majority of the whole number of the two Houses should be required to do business. After having persistently refused to reduce the number which should form the quorum of each House, it added to the clause words giving to a less number than a majority of the whole a power to compel the attendance of absent members, which is further and strong evidence that it intended the quorum should be a majority of the whole number of both Houses as organized.

This question has arisen several times in the Senate. It first came up at the beginning of its first session in 1789, and how was it decided? The former President pro tempore of the Senate [Mr. Foor] presented a most lucid and able paper on this subject when it was up before in July, 1862. I will take the liberty of reading from the authorities which he gathered and collated, or a portion of them, in the address that he caused to be read to the Senate on that occasion, and which had the effect of settling the question and inducing the Senate to lay the resolution to establish its quorum at a less number than the majority of the whole number which the Constitution had ordained for it, on the table. There were but eleven States that had then ratified the Constitution, and consequently there were but eleven States that were authorized to send Senators to the Senate.

"There being eleven States in the Union entitled to send twenty-two members to the Senate, of whom only twenty members had been elected by the States—New York not having elected them until the 15th of July, 1789—the Senate not having formed a quorum at the time appointed, continued to meet and adjourn from day to day until the 28th of March, 1789, when eleven members appeared, and although but twenty had been elected as above stated, they were still considered as less than a quorum. On the 6th of April, 1789, twelve members attended and were considered a quorum."

This construction of the Constitution was adopted immediately after its formation, and some of the men who gave it had been members of the Convention. There does not appear to have been any difference of opinion on the position that notwithstanding but twelve States had elected Senators, and consequently there were only twenty-four members in office, yet fourteen, a majority of the whole number of the Senate as ordained by the Constitution, were required by it to constitute a quorum to do business.

"January 4, 1790.—There being twelve States entitled to twenty-four members, of whom twelve appeared on the 6th of January, and were considered a quorum. In this case all the members had been elected by the States. But it is supposed that the seat of one of the Senators of Virginia (Mr. Grayson) had been vacated by his death, the date of which is not stated, but his successor was appointed 31st March, 1790."

As to this case of Mr. Grayson's vacancy there is some uncertainty about the facts. I concede that it seems to favor the position that one half of the whole number of the Senate formed a quorum; it does not tend to show that a less number would.

"November 3, 1794.—There being fourteen States entitled to twenty-eight members, of whom fourteen attended on the 17th November, the Vice President also being present—still not considered a quorum—but on the 18th November another member appeared and made a quorum."

This is another precedent which squarely and fully sustains the construction for which I contend.

The next precedent, occurring in 1797, is precisely to the same effect with the last one, and shows that the Senate refused to recognize one half of its whole number as a quorum. The two which follow, one in 1798 and the other in 1800, though not passing upon the question directly, conduce to sustain my position. The next precedent, in 1802, is in point, and shows that a majority of a full Senate was necessary to form a quorum:

"November 13, 1797.—There being sixteen States entitled to thirty-two members, of whom sixteen attended on the 21st November, but were not considered a quorum."

"December 3, 1798.—There being sixteen States entitled to thirty-two members, of whom fifteen attended on the 5th December, but were not considered a quorum. On the 6th December seventeen attended, and were considered a quorum."

"November 17, 1800.—There being sixteen States entitled to thirty-two members, of whom fifteen attended on 20th November; no quorum."

"November 21.—Nineteen attended, and the business proceeded."

"December 6, 1802.—There being sixteen States entitled to thirty-two members, and no quorum found until seventeen attended."

"November 5, 1804.—There being seventeen States entitled to thirty-four members; on that day the Vice President and thirteen Senators appeared; no quorum."

"On the 6th November seventeen members attended, and although one of the members had just resigned, and his successor was not elected until the 13th November, this number (seventeen) was not considered a quorum; but on the 7th November eighteen members attended, and were considered a quorum."

The preceding precedent of 1804 meets fully, and refutes absolutely, the principle of the pending proposition. So does the following one, presenting a parallel case, in 1812:

"November 2, 1812.—There being eighteen States, entitled to thirty-six members, of whom eighteen attended on that day, but were not considered a quorum. In this case one of the Senators of Louisiana had resigned some time previous to the session, and his place was not supplied until 15th December, 1812. On the 3d November twenty members appeared and the business proceeded."

This question has been decided diversely in the House of Representatives, and the argument of the late President pro tempore of the Senate, from which I have read the senatorial precedents, gives a good many from the Journals of the House; but their preponderance is decidedly in support of the position that a majority of the whole House also is necessary to constitute a quorum to do business. While I hold this principle to be certainly true of the House, I concede it is not so clearly so as it is of the Senate. The Constitution establishes the same rule for both Houses, and being so plainly the law, the law of the Senate is a weighty argument, and, in connection with so many others, conclusive that it is also the law of the House.

Mr. President, it seems clear to my mind that Congress cannot enact a valid law unless by a constitutional quorum of each House; and that all acts passed when there was not present such a quorum in both Houses would be void and of no effect. Any serious doubt on this point ought and should restrain the Senate from passing this resolution, at any rate until it has exhausted all means to procure the presence of a majority of its whole number to transact its business. This question may arise judicially in a great variety and number of cases; and if the courts should decide that legislative measures passed by both or either House when there were present less than a majority of its whole number, were void, it might produce great confusion, wrong, and mischief.

When the quorum of the two Houses was established by the Constitution, there were no Senators or Representatives in office or in being; but a Senate and House then existed potentially by the Constitution and as a legal entity. It was then, and in that state of fact, that the Convention declared what should be a quorum, not of the Senators but of each House, Senate and the House. It then provided, not that a majority of the Senators and a majority of the Representatives, but that a majority of each House, as they had already been ordained by previous sections of the Constitution then agreed upon, according to the numbers that had been declared and established as the membership and strength of each House, should constitute its quorum to do business. It seems to me that such is the plain import, meaning, and principle of the Constitution; that it was so molded, understood, and agreed upon by the wise and great men who framed it; received contemporaneously, and ever since, and uniformly by the Senate, that construction, and most generally by the House; and that the proposed resolution is another bold and reckless assault upon the Constitution, and if adopted will produce a vast amount of evil.

Mr. JOHNSON. It would be idle, Mr. President, to assert that the opinion which I am about to express is free from doubt, because the opposite opinion is entertained by many Senators, perhaps has been entertained by Senators who have heretofore been in this body. But at the last extra session of the Senate, without being aware that the Senate had come to the conclusion that a majority of the whole number of Senators who could be elected by all the States if all the States were in was necessary to form a quorum, I stated that my impression had always been that the true meaning of the Constitution in the clause which prescribes the quorum is that it had reference only to the Senators who are such, in other words to Senators elected, and I propose very briefly to try to make good that opinion, and to do so I shall address myself mainly to a reply to the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.]

In the first place, I ask the Senate's attention to the Constitution itself without reference to any decisions which have heretofore been pronounced. There are four clauses as I think in that instrument which bear upon the particular question under debate. The clause which gives rise to the discussion is that which is found in the fifth section of the first article. The other three clauses to which I propose to advert as bearing on the meaning of that clause will be found in the second section of the same article, and in the third section, and in the fifth article of the Constitution. The language of the clause prescribing the quorum is:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business."

Now, I suppose it would be perfectly clear, that with reference to the House which is to pass upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, all that is meant is those who are members by election or by appointment, not those who have not been elected to the House of Representatives or who have not been appointed as Senators by the respective Legislatures. It assumes, consequently, that there is an existing body actually in office by virtue of an election which has already taken place, and that that existing body is the one which is to pass upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of the members. It evidently therefore, to repeat, assumes that members have been elected or profess to have been elected, that returns have been made of such election, and that there may arise in relation to such elections a question of the right of the member to take his seat on the ground that he does not possess the qualification which the Constitution or the laws of the United States prescribe. If those who are in the House elected, and no others, or to take the case of the Senate, if those who are in the Senate, Senators chosen by the respective Legislatures, and no others, are to pass upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members, it would follow that the latter part of the clause, which provides for the number which is to constitute a quorum, is to be construed with regard to that House, for the language is "a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business." "A majority of each" of what? A majority of each of the Houses who have a right to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of the respective members. Then, if it be true that only those are authorized to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns, who have been elected to the House or chosen to the Senate by the respective Legislatures, it would seem to follow logically that a quorum of that House is to be a majority of the same number and no other. If it had been the purpose of the Convention to prescribe that the House should only be considered as organized for the purpose of passing judgment upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of the members, when all should have been elected by the States, or when all should have been chosen by the respective Legislatures, then they would have so provided; but on the contrary, as seems to me to be manifest, all that they meant was that whenever there were persons elected in the one or chosen in the other, a majority of the persons elected or chosen was to constitute the quorum of each House.

But if that clause was doubtful, considered by itself, I submit that the second and the third sections of the first article remove that doubt. The second section tells us who are the House of Representatives, and in these words: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year;" not of members which the States have a right to choose, but of members actually chosen; and in relation to the Senate the language is that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof."

It seems to me to be clear that by the true meaning of the Constitution the House of Representatives in the one case, and the Senate in the other, are to consist of those who have been chosen to the House or to the Senate, and nobody else. It would be an absurdity to say that the House of Representatives consists of members not chosen or that the Senate consists of Senators not chosen. The thing to be done under the Constitution was to bring into existence representatives of the States or of the people; representatives of the States in the vocation of Senators, representatives immediately of the people of the States in the person of the Representatives; but until Senators are chosen or Representatives are chosen, there is no House of Representatives and no Senate; that would seem to be clear.

The honorable member from Kentucky has referred us to the debates in the Convention. I have had occasion to consider those frequently and to refresh my recollection this morning. My friend from Kentucky, as I think, misapprehends the meaning of those debates. The question, what was to constitute a quorum, was before the Convention; how many, was the point to be decided. Having decided that the States should be represented in the Senate by two Senators from each State, and should be represented in the House of Representatives by members elected by the people in the way pointed out by the Constitution, and having ascertained, therefore, what would be the entire number which, if elected, would constitute the House, and if appointed by the Legislatures would constitute the Senate, it was suggested that to require a majority of the whole number might be very inconvenient. Then it was proposed to fix some number less than a majority of the whole; but in the debate upon the proposition to fix a number less than the whole, as well as upon the propriety of requiring a majority of the whole, the several speakers, to whose speeches my friend has referred, assumed that all would be elected to the House of Representatives and all would be appointed to the Senate by the respective Legislatures. That is evident from what the Senator, I believe, read; if he did not read it, it is here in the debate. It was said, in answer to the proposition to require less than a majority of the whole number, that no inconvenience could result from it, because they could give to the House the authority to send for the absent members and enforce their attendance. Mr. Mercer, for example, said that he was for a less number than a majority:

"So great a number will put it in the power of a few by seceding?"—

A few what? A few members. Nobody else. They can break up the Senate or the House; there may be a factious minority; and such things have happened. It has been proposed here in the Senate of the United States to leave the Senate without a quorum for the very purpose of defeating a particular measure; and Mr. Mercer therefore insisted that it was all-important that a quorum should be made to consist of a number less than a majority of the whole in order to guard against the inconvenience or the mischief which would result from some of those who were members of the House by virtue of election and qualification, or members of the Senate, from seceding and breaking up the deliberations of either body and arresting the action of either body. How was that met? In the first place, as I have said, the objection assumes that there are members to leave the Senate—not members not chosen, for they cannot leave it, they have never been in it.

"Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. MADISON moved to add to the end of article six, section three, and that may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." Agreed to by all except Pennsylvania, which was divided."

How was that to be done? South Carolina has no Senators elected or chosen, and there is no power in the Constitution to force South Carolina to choose Senators.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. The members of the Convention were then debating an inconvenience and a difficulty in doing business that was not certainly identical with the question now under discussion; but in debating that difficulty, in their argument they referred to the principle and to the fact of the provision of the Constitution, of what was and what would be a quorum to do business.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it. That amendment proposed by Mr. Madison and Mr. Randolph was offered after a speech had been made by Mr. Ellsworth, in answer to the objection of the inconvenience, the mischief, that might be the consequence of requiring a majority of the whole to constitute a quorum.

"Mr. ELLSWORTH reminded the movers that the Constitution proposed to give such a discretion with regard to the number of Representatives, that a very inconvenient number was not to be apprehended. The inconvenience of secessions may be guarded against by giving to each House an authority to require the attendance of absent members."

The whole debate then, I think I am justified in saying, assumes that they are dealing with those who have been chosen members of the one House or chosen Senators of the other. It was to meet that very apprehended mischief, that members chosen to each branch might break up the deliberations of each branch by—to use the language of the debaters—seceding, that Mr. Madison proposed the amendment to which I have just adverted, to give to each House the authority to compel the attendance of those who were bound to attend.

Mr. CARLILE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him just at this point, I desire to call his attention to the first decision that was made by the Senate as given in the memorandum presented at the last Congress by the then Presiding Officer, [Mr. Foor.] That first decision is directly opposite to the argument that the Senator from Maryland is now making. There were then eleven States in the Union. Ten of them had chosen Senators, and one, the State of New York, had not chosen; and although eleven members were present, the Senate adjourned from day to day for the want of a quorum in consequence of that fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. The next succeeding precedent is directly the other way, so that there is a precedent each way; that is all; but I am speaking of it now independent of precedent. I shall speak of the precedents presently.

Mr. CARLILE. The precedents are all against the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are not, begging the member's pardon; and he is the only member that has said so.

Mr. CARLILE. The only precedent to which the Senator has referred as at all sanctioning the view which he is now attempting to enforce on the Senate is that which occurred in January, 1790.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a very good one. Has there been none since?

Mr. CARLILE. None in the Senate since.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think there are, but I shall come to that presently. I have said, Mr. President, all that I proposed to say on the weight to be given to the debates in the Convention at the time the Constitution was adopted. I have said that there was a precedent in the Senate other than that to which the honorable member from Virginia had adverted which decides the very question as I have suggested it should be decided. The fifth article of the Constitution provides that "the Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution." It does not say how many are to constitute each House in passing upon constitutional amendments. The argument in relation to the quorum clause is that "the House" means the entire House that might be chosen, the entire Senate that might be selected, not that which has been chosen or selected. It will be seen that the language of the amendatory clause in relation to the manner in which amendments to the Constitution are to be proposed is identical, as far as the particular question is concerned, with the language of the clause which prescribes the number to constitute a quorum. The one says "a majority of each House," the other says "two thirds of both Houses." There can therefore evidently be no difference between the meaning of the term "House" as used in the amendatory clause and the meaning of the term "House" as used in what I call the quorum clause. Then what is the view of the Senate is "the House," two thirds of which are to act upon constitutional amendments? Upon that fruitful topic and melancholy fruitful topic which has brought us into the condition in which we are, the institution of slavery, an amendment to the Constitution was proposed in 1861. I read from the Journal of the Senate of the 2d of March of that year:

"The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) to amend the Constitution of the United States; and The following amendment proposed by Mr. Pugh being under consideration"—

It is not necessary to read the amendment; various other amendments were proposed. Finally, on the 2d of March, 1861, the question was taken on the passage of the joint resolution:

"On the question, Shall the resolution pass?"

"It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 12."

Then the yeas and nays are given.

"The PRESIDENT (Mr. Polk in the chair) announced that the joint resolution was passed."

"Mr. TRUMBULL raised a question of order: whether the joint resolution, being a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, it did not require the affirmative vote of two thirds of the members composing the Senate to pass the same."

"The PRESIDENT decided that it required an affirmative vote of two thirds of the Senators present, only."

"From this decision Mr. TRUMBULL appealed; and

"On the question, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

"It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 1."

That could not have been done if the meaning of the word "House," as used in the quorum clause, is that it embraces all who could be elected to the one House or appointed to the other. If it meant that, then there must have been an affirmative vote of two thirds of the entire number; and yet with the single exception of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who afterward said that he voted under a misapprehension, every member of the Senate voted to sustain that decision of the Chair; and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] although he called for the yeas and nays, voted in the affirmative.

Then, if it be true that the Constitution can be amended by a vote of less than two thirds of the entire number that the Constitution contemplates as composing the House or the Senate, it must be equally true that the quorum may consist of a less number than the majority of that whole number; and what is that? If two thirds of those present are all that are necessary in the one case, a majority of those who have been chosen in the other case is all that is required.

The great inconveniences of the decision under which we have been acting all along are manifest. My friend from Kentucky sees or thinks he sees great danger to States and to people by changing the rule. Is there no danger on the other side? Is not the Government to go on?

Mr. DAVIS. It has gone on.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is going on, I know, but going on how? Let yesterday answer, and let the day before yesterday answer.

Mr. DAVIS. And many days before the rebellion too.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then they were all here. But what is the hardship? Let me ask the honorable member what harm is South Carolina to receive and the people of South Carolina? What injustice is to be done them? Who keeps South Carolina from electing her Senators?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not expostulate here for South Carolina; I do for my own State, and I maintain that the business and proceedings of this Government so far as the interests of my State and of every loyal State in the Union are concerned, are deeply involved in the proper settlement of this question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Put it in another way, that would lead to this conclusion, which I am sure the honorable member does not mean: that the interest of the people of Kentucky will not be taken sufficient care of unless these seceded States are represented.

Mr. DAVIS. With the Senator's permission I will say that he draws his conclusion, not mine.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is mine.

Mr. DAVIS. My conclusion is that if a quorum, consisting of a less majority than a majority of all the members of both Houses, is allowed to do business, that state of legislation and that modification of the power of legislation will essentially add to the danger of the interests of my constituency.

Mr. JOHNSON. How? In what way? Suppose the independence of the confederate States was recognized to-day—

Mr. DAVIS. If it was, there would be an end to this Confederation, to this Union; it would stand dissolved, and every State would be thrown back upon its original sovereignty.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I deny.

Mr. DAVIS. That I maintain.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I deny, because if the honorable member is correct in that, if any one State could succeed, with the assent or against the opposition of the rest of the States, in getting out of the Union, the Union would be dissolved. Now, supposing the Union to be in existence—and I suppose I may assume that the Union now stands—how does it stand and why does it stand? It stands upon its own strength as represented by the loyal States. It stands maintained by the power of the loyal States. It stands in spite of South Carolina and those whom she has seduced to their ruin; and if those States were by some natural convulsion blotted out of material existence to-morrow, the Union would stand represented in her remaining States. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which requires for the existence of the Union that each State that comes in is to remain in forever; and yet the position of my honorable friend from Kentucky is that the moment any one State succeeds in getting out of, or is permitted to go out of, the Union, the Union is dissolved, and each State stands where it was before the Constitution was adopted by which the Union was formed. I protest, with all the respect I feel for the judgment and patriotism of the honorable member from Kentucky, that his proposition is wholly unfounded. I was about to say, Mr. President, if I am right, and I assume now that I am right, what has Kentucky to apprehend? What has Maryland to apprehend? Are not both States represented in this Chamber and in the other House? From whom is danger to be apprehended to either State? From the other States that are equally loyal with ourselves and united with us as a band of brothers to maintain the Government?

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator, with his permission, this question: does he maintain that the government of Maryland as it is about to be organized by the presidential proclamation and military interference will be legitimately organized?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see that that is the question before us in this debate. It has not been so organized that I am aware of. I rather think that Maryland is in the Union yet, and I am very much inclined to think that if she is enabled to maintain herself she means to remain in.

Mr. DAVIS. That does not answer my question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot answer the question, because the occurrence has not happened.

Mr. DAVIS. I put it hypothetically.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is not Kentucky in the Union?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have heard a great deal about military interference in the State of Kentucky, and Kentucky ought to be out—

Mr. DAVIS. Her constitution has not been pulled down by an illegitimate power and another one erected for her by military interference—not yet awhile.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is pulled down and disregarded by military interference. "If my honorable friend was elected by the use of military interference he ought not to be here."

Mr. DAVIS. I was not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know you were not, but I was assuming it for the sake of the argument. I know it could not well happen.

Mr. DAVIS. I agree to your proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have departed somewhat, being very anxious to answer any suggestion that falls from the Senator from Kentucky, from the argument with which I proposed to conclude.

My friend said in his speech that every law that shall be passed in virtue of such a construction as we put upon the Constitution by a vote in a body composed of less than a majority of the whole, will be a nullity, and every court will so hold.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not say that the courts would so hold. I gave it as my opinion that that was the true principle, and I said that if the courts so held, they would vacate the legislation as a matter of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. That amounts to the same thing. He says the courts ought so to hold, because that is the correct principle. If it be the correct principle, then the courts would so hold, because the courts are honest and intelligent.

Mr. DAVIS. In my judgment, that is the correct principle; but the courts might hold a very different opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should think that would be very likely on this particular question.

Mr. DAVIS. And I suppose it might be very different from yours.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may be; they have often done so, very much to the disappointment of my clients.

If my honorable friend from Kentucky is right in his legal proposition, we are in a very bad way. The House of Representatives during the whole of last session and during the whole of this have been acting upon the view of the Constitution which I am maintaining, and most of the laws that have been passed have been constitutionally passed—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me respectfully to propound to him another question? Does he maintain that a less number of either House of Congress than a constitutional majority may pass a law?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; but I say that there is a constitutional majority.

Mr. DAVIS. He agrees to the principle; he only differs as to the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. What difference does it make, looking to the result which the Senator apprehends, whether we adhere to the past course of the Senate, or whether we adopt the present rule of the House of Representatives? Looking to that result, if the rule of the House is to require less than a constitutional majority, then so far as the validity of our legislation is concerned it is perfectly immaterial whether our view which requires that constitutional majority is sound or not: the laws are equally invalid. And yet I have not heard from anybody except from my honorable friend a suggestion that the legislation for the last two years, when the House of Representatives have been acting upon the rule that a quorum consists of a majority of the members elected, is invalid.

Suppose it be doubtful. It cannot be, I submit to my friend from Kentucky, so very clear. Then if it be doubtful, what should we do in the present condition of the country? Adopt that rule which the convenience of legislation requires, which the business of the country demands at our hands; and we are not without precedents. In the absence of any express constitutional provision in relation to a quorum, what would be a quorum? In the House of Lords three of the lords constitute a quorum; in the House of Commons at one time forty members out of a House of over six hundred members. Lately, I believe, they have increased the number to sixty, which constitutes a quorum.

Mr. DAVIS. That is no authority for the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is no authority; but I mention it for the purpose of showing that there is no great inconvenience, and that in the absence of any express and positive provision requiring a specific number to constitute a quorum we must be thrown upon what may be considered as the law of Parliament, and make that a quorum which we ourselves think should constitute a quorum.

Mr. DAVIS. I make my apology to the honorable Senator for having interrupted him, and with one more question shall not interrupt him further. Does the honorable Senator contend that if thirteen members of the Senate were to get together and were to assume to pass laws, those thirteen members could legitimately pass laws for the Senate of the United States, and that when they were so passed by thirteen members with all the other forms of legislation, they would have the validity of laws?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I have not said any such thing. I have said that the Constitution required to constitute a quorum a majority of those who were elected to the House of Representatives or elected to the Senate; and that is the reading which I give to the only clause which prescribes the quorum.

Mr. DAVIS. I attempted to show that the principle might lead to that state of case, and that it was not an improbable state of case, when thirteen members would be authorized to assume the legislative powers of the Senate. The question that I propounded to the honorable Senator was this: if the Senate was placed in circumstances where thirteen members of the body would be assuming to act and acting for the body in passing its laws, would that action be legitimate according to the Constitution?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is very easy to put extreme cases about anything. The Senator might as well ask if one member was elected to the Senate he could constitute the Senate, and if one member was elected to the House he could constitute the House of Representatives. That is not the question which I was trying to discuss. What I mean to say is this: that according to my interpretation of the clause in question it requires only a majority of members; and until my friend can satisfy me that there are Senators entitled to seats on this floor who have not been chosen as Senators, or that there are members entitled to seats in the House of Representatives who have not been elected, whose names nobody has ever heard of or can hear of, because they are not in existence, I think I shall remain of the opinion which I stated when I rose to address the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to make a remark. The clause of the Constitution which determines what proportion of the two Houses severally as it had ordained them should be necessary to constitute a quorum to do business did not then apply to a Senate or House of Representatives in the concrete, to a body of men composing a Senate and another body a House; no such bodies of men were then in existence. It applied to the Senate and the House which it had organized by previous provisions, and also to the quorum of each which it was then about to organize, as abstractions, merely constitutional and legal entities. The matter to be determined was what part of the numerical strength of each House should be required by the Constitution to form a quorum to do business. The plan of the Constitution reported to the Convention by its committee proposed it in these words:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business."

A majority of what? Of each House? What was each House? Not the Senators and Representatives elected and chosen, but of the abstract Senate and House as they had been organized by principles that would give to each body a certain number of members; and the majority of the number of which each House was to be composed, it declared, should be a quorum to do business. When the question was under consideration in the Convention, there was no proposition to enlarge the quorum of the Houses beyond the majority of them respectively, but the inconveniences and obstructions to business resulting from such a large quorum were pointed out and enforced by several members, and sundry and different propositions were made to reduce the quorum below the majority, and they were all inflexibly voted down, and the objections against that large quorum were attempted to be obviated by giving to a less number than a majority the power to compel the attendance of absent members. If a less number had constituted a quorum, there would have been no reason for giving to them that power. The rule, the principle of the quorum of the two Houses is established by the Constitution; and that is, the majority of the Senate and not of the Senators chosen, and of the House of Representatives and not of the Representatives elected, constitutes the quorums to do business of the Senate and House respectively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CARLILE and Mr. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the suggestion of some Senators I will modify my resolution by striking out the words "or qualified;" so that it will read:

Resolved, That a quorum of the Senate consists of a majority of the Senators duly chosen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That modification can only be made by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it will be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection; and the question now is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Powell, and Riddle—11.

So the resolution was adopted.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the special order of the day, which is the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 308) to establish a Bureau of Military Justice. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—20.

So the report was non-concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the whole subject lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; move another conference.

Mr. WILSON. I move that it be laid upon the table, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion. I hope that we shall lay it on the table, and then we can get up a new bill on some sound principle.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senate has no right to get up a bill.

Mr. WILSON. I think it is in the power of the Senate to get up a bill in regard to that bureau.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better have another conference.

Mr. CONNESS, (to Mr. WILSON.) Withdraw your motion.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot do it.

Mr. HALE. Order! I object to debate.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to violate the rule of the Senate, and I am much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for calling me to order.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator desires to debate it, let him withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he desires the yeas and nays upon his motion?

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the question now?

Mr. WILSON. Now, I believe, the subject is open for debate.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill of the House, and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. WILSON. It is now debatable, and I desire to present this question precisely and exactly as it is.

The House of Representatives passed this bill on the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

It made Colonel Holt a brigadier general and gave him two assistants with the rank of colonel. It passed the House of Representatives with that recommendation without opposition. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. The committee, on investigation, desiring to save every dollar we could to the country, were led to believe that the assistants should be reduced to the rank of majors instead of colonels. When the bill came up for consideration a new theory must be sprung upon it. We could not give the general and the majors we proposed, or the colonels as the House bill had it, the pay and emoluments as we did everybody else; but we must single out Colonel Holt for degradation. We must fix a sum of money against these officers, though we never did anything of the kind before. We could not accept the committee's amendment. We must give these officers the rank of colonels.

But rank was not the question at issue between the two Houses. The simple question then was whether the general should have the pay and emoluments of a general, and whether the colonels we had made in preference to making them majors should have the pay of colonels or whether they should have a fixed sum. The Senate inserted a fixed sum for these officers. The House disagreed to our amendments, and committees of conference were appointed. You, sir, appointed the committee on the part of the Senate. I suppose it was appointed without any reference to or any thought of the opinions of the members of the Senate. I have no idea that the President of the Senate intended to make a committee that should do anything that was not just and fair. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] and myself were appointed on the committee. We met the committee of the House of Representatives in conference. Perhaps it is not for me to say what took place in that conference. The matter was fully discussed. The question was whether the committee would agree to those amendments or recede from them, and the committee finally agreed to recede from these two amendments of the Senate, which had never been placed before on any military bill.

The Senate has just decided by its vote that the policy of its amendments is to be adopted. If these officers are to be generals and colonels—and that we have settled; both Houses have agreed to that—then I say they ought to have the pay and emoluments of generals and colonels. If not, I think we had better drop the subject. If it is believed that these officers ought not to be military men—and how they can be anything else I do not know—we might make them judges, or give them some other title, and give them a fixed sum; or we can adopt a rule that shall take from all these other officers we have made the pay and emoluments that belong to their rank. I think, therefore, sir, we had better drop this bill and bring in a new bill. I cannot vote at any time to give officers the rank of generals and then vote away from them the pay we give others of the same rank.

Mr. HALE. I do not know and cannot conceive how the Senator from Massachusetts construes this matter into an attack upon Mr. Holt. I protest against any such personal motive being assigned to me, and I protest against the right of any man to say that. How does the Senator know who is to be appointed? The bill reads:

And the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the head of said bureau a Judge Advocate General.

Has the President told the Senator from Massachusetts that he is going to appoint a given man, and have the Senate told the Senator that they mean to confirm him? What right has he to assume that Judge Holt is to be the man? He may suppose so; but certainly, for legislative action neither he nor anybody else has the right to assume that it is to be Judge Holt.

Mr. WILSON. He is there now.

Mr. HALE. He cannot be there now, because there is no such office. The bill says he shall be appointed.

Mr. WILSON. He is there with the rank of colonel.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this bill is prospective entirely. Let me ask the Senator what are the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general? Where is the propriety of selecting a man for a civil office, a judicial office, the discharge of the duties of which requires him to sit in his office and do business, and putting him on the same footing as to pay and emoluments with a general who has to go into the field? Why should we allow him horses, and forage for horses and quarters and servants, and all these innumerable allowances which may or may not be proper for a general in the field? By what analogy, by what course of reasoning is it proper to make the same allowances to a man who performs judicial duties sitting in his office devoting himself to those duties?

Sir, as this matter has been put in this ungacious way, I do not choose to submit to it. I yield to no man in the high regard that I have for Judge Holt, for his spotless integrity, his untiring industry, his faithfulness, his fidelity, and his unsurpassed loyalty; but I do not choose to be led into a vicious course of legislation by my regard for any individual. I think that even for officers in the Army this is a vicious mode of compensating them. It ought to be carried no further than the absolute necessities of the service require it to be carried. Certainly, when you undertake to pay judicial officers who sit in their offices and perform judicial duties by the same rule that you pay officers in the field who are compelled to do their duties there, it seems to me you undertake to apply an analogy where there is no analogy from the nature of the case.

Sir, the officer that you propose to create here is a judicial officer entirely. He wants no arms, he wants no forage, he wants no horses, to enable him to discharge the high functions with which you charge him as a judicial officer.

The bill also provides that he shall appoint "such clerical force as in his judgment the interests of the service shall require." The next thing will be that those assistants must have the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains; the messengers the rank, pay, and emoluments of sergeants; and possibly those who sweep the office the rank, pay, and emoluments of corporals. It is trying to assimilate things where there is no similarity and no analogy to justify it. If you are creating a judicial officer, giving him judicial duties to perform, pay him as you do other judicial officers.

It is said that this is to degrade Judge Holt. If I knew that it was Judge Holt who was to be appointed I should consider it a degradation to vote that when he was to perform his judicial duties he must put on a chapeau and wear epaulettes, and his compensation must be according to that of a brigadier general. I think the system is wrong, and here is a good place to commence to alter it. The other officers that the Senator from Massachusetts has named, the Quartermaster General, the Adjutant General, and Provost Marshal General, are all military officers, and by the very circumstances of the case are connected with the Army and have military duties to perform. I would not say a word or give a vote that should detract a feather's weight from the just reputation that is due to Judge Holt or any other man; but, sir, I think here is a good place to begin to set a precedent. When you make a judicial officer, pay him a salary. Does any man here know what the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general are? Take your Army Register, and you will find that they vary widely, sometimes more and sometimes less. Where is the propriety in giving this uncertain, irregular compensation to a judicial officer?

It is for these reasons that I opposed the report of the conference committee. I hope the motion of the Senator from Vermont will prevail; but I should not be very sorry if that should be voted down, and the vote should be taken on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts and that should prevail. I am far from being certain that it would not be better to create a judicial tribunal and not undertake to make it ridiculous by tricking it out with the gewgaws and the rank, pay, and emoluments of a military officer.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from New Hampshire, like all the rest of us, is likely to be mistaken sometimes in his facts and in his law. This bill says:

That the office of Judge Advocate General, created by the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to amend the act calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the United States, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, approved February 28, 1795, and the acts amendatory thereof, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and is hereby, constituted a bureau, which shall be attached to the War Department and shall be styled and known as the Bureau of Military Justice.

This office has ever been filled by a military man. The last man who filled it was Colonel Lee. This office it is now proposed to make a bureau, and to make the officer at the head of it a general instead of a colonel. It is now a military office, and it ought to be a military office. Colonel Holt was appointed to this office. He is performing its duties, and doing now precisely what he will do if the bureau is created. The bill, if the Senate amendments should prevail, cuts him down $200.

It was intended to make this office, filled always by military men, and under military rules and regulations, a bureau, and the head of it a brigadier general. Nobody supposes that the officer who now fills it with so much ability is to be removed. Everybody is satisfied with Colonel Holt's management. The intention of the bill was to increase his rank and to increase his compensation, and give him some reward for the vast labors imposed upon him. Since he went into that office he has had more than ten thousand cases before him. During the first three months of this year he has had over eight thousand cases, and decided nineteen hundred of them. The good of the Army demands that these cases should be acted upon promptly. It is proposed, therefore, to give him two assistants with the same rank that he now holds. The good of the country, economy, the order of the Army, everything connected with the military service, demands that this bureau should be created, and enough officers put in it of talent and high character to discharge promptly the duties that are imposed upon them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the salary fixed in this bill by the Senate amendment for the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. WILSON. Four thousand dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You say he now receives $4,200?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As a colonel?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir, as a colonel, including forage for his horses, fuel, and quarters, at present allowances.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If he as a colonel gets $4,200, I suppose the two assistants put in by the House bill will get $4,200.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the Senator inform us how much a brigadier general receives?

Mr. WILSON. Four thousand nine hundred or five thousand dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator to allow this matter to go over. I wish to look into it. I hope action will not be had upon it now.

Mr. WILSON. I say to the Senator from Ohio that we had a letter the other day from his brother, General Sherman, in regard to these very cases sent up from the Army, in which he recommended a change in our laws so as to deal with guerrillas without sending their cases to Washington; that it took several months to send those cases here and have them examined or acted upon. These cases come before us, they are of great importance, and they ought to be settled promptly. No matter what may be the number of men we put upon them, it will be a saving of money, and will add to the efficiency of the Army to have those cases acted upon as soon as they possibly can be. It is proposed to appoint two officers as the assistants of the Judge Advocate General, who are to be good lawyers, men of capacity and character, who can take these cases up under his direction and determine and settle them. We have several thousand back cases now to be brought up and to be determined upon; and while we are failing to do it the military service of the country is suffering.

Mr. GRIMES. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that this bill had better lie on the table or be indefinitely postponed. If the Committee on Military Affairs or anybody else can draw a bill that will be more acceptable, it should be drawn and presented to us; for I am satisfied that this bill ought not to pass in any shape.

Mr. President, let me say in the outset that I repel entirely the idea which the Senator from Massachusetts seems to entertain, that those of us who voted against concurring in the report of the committee of conference entertain any hostility to Colonel Holt. I recognize Colonel Holt as one of the purest and ablest men in the country, and if I was going to vote upon personal grounds I know of no man in whose behalf I would sooner vote than I would for Colonel Holt.

But, sir, I think there is not the slightest necessity for the creation of this Bureau of Military Justice; but on the other hand it will be to the detriment of the public service to create it. The Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, is mistaken in supposing, as it seems to me, he might properly infer from the reading of the bill under consideration that the act of February 28, 1795, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion, and to repeal the acts now in force for that purpose," referred to a judge advocate in any particular. I have the act before me, and the only section in which the words "court-martial" even are mentioned is in the sixth section, where it declares "that courts-martial for the trial of militia shall be composed of militia officers only."

So far from it, if I remember the military history of this country correctly, we never had any judge advocate until within the last few years. Some eight or ten years ago Major Lee, when he was a captain in an ordnance regiment, was detailed to the War Department and stationed here in this place. His name, however, was all the time borne on the roll as a captain in the line of the regiment of ordnance, but he was detailed for the purpose of performing the duties of judge advocate in this city in the War Department; and he was holding that office at the time, and he held it for some considerable time after the breaking out of this rebellion. Perhaps two years ago a bill was introduced creating the office of judge advocate, raising him up two grades above that which was held by Major Lee at the time, and to that place Colonel Holt was appointed. Major Lee thereupon resigned his commission, and went to his plantation, I believe, in Virginia.

It is said that there is a vast accumulation of business in the office of the Judge Advocate General. I do not doubt it. I know that that is so. I know that there are probably as many, and perhaps more, cases than the Senator from Massachusetts has mentioned, in the hands of General Canby, who is also engaged in this same work with several officers detailed to his bureau, and in the office of Colonel Holt, which have been brought up from the various armies that we have in the field. But I should like to know how it is possible for Colonel Holt to perform these duties any more satisfactorily to the country, with the commission of a brigadier general in his pocket, than he now performs them with the commission of a colonel in his pocket? How is it going to advance the public interests by creating his two assistants colonels in the regular Army? for these gentlemen are not to hold merely during the war, as I understand it, but are to remain in the regular service of the United States and their successors after them. How is the public service to be promoted by creating these two officers colonels? Will the business of the office of the Judge Advocate General be any more advanced than it is now when these same duties are performed by volunteer lieutenants who have been detailed from the field to perform those duties? I presume there are fifteen or twenty—I do not know how many, but a large number of officers, some of whom have been invalided, who have been two or three years in the field and have distinguished themselves in the public service and have been wounded and are incapable of longer performing service in the field, who have been detailed to these bureaus, and they are performing or assisting to perform the duties in the office of the Adjutant General. Is it pretended that they are not performing them as well as they would perform them if they held the commission of colonels in their pockets? Is it worth while for us to burden the Government for all time to come by the creation of this new bureau with a brigadier general and two colonels in the regular Army? I think not. I have not heard any reason assigned for it.

The letter to which the Senator from Massachusetts referred as having been received from General Sherman is not to the effect, as I apprehend, that he is desirous that there should be any enlargement of the jurisdiction or any increase of the title or pay of any officer here; but he desires to have permission to establish summary courts-martial and have their judgments executed in the field instead of having them sent up here to be reviewed and rereviewed in the bureaus of the War Department.

Mr. President, I voted against this proposition on principle. I voted against the creation of all these brigadier generals at the head of these bureaus. I attempted before this rebellion to repeal the law which created the only brigadier general we then had at the head of a bureau—General Jesup—but that was a time when it was impossible to carry it through the Senate. We have now gone on, contrary to my judgment, and created a brigadier general at the head of each one of these bureaus, whose pay amounts, I think, to something in the neighborhood of six thousand dollars, stationed in this city and under the new regulations that have been established by the War Department in relation to the commutation of quarters and fuel. Here is a proposition to create another. I cannot for the life of me see what more reason there is for putting a brigadier general at the head of this Bureau of Military Justice than there is of creating the Solicitor of the War Department a solicitor general and making him a brigadier general with a salary of five or six thousand dollars a year. Where is the distinction? Where is the difference? Is it not as necessary that Mr. Whiting should have military rank, pay, and emoluments as that Colonel Holt should have them?

Mr. WILSON. He does not have any pay at all.

Mr. GRIMES. Still he is entitled to it, and if he should die or resign he is probably to have a successor, and that successor may not be as able to perform the duties for the public that Mr. Whiting now performs as Mr. Whiting is. The pecuniary responsibility may not be as great.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the bill of the House, and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the whole subject lie on the table for the purpose I have suggested, to see if we cannot do something better.

The motion was agreed to.

LIST OF ABSENTEES.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move now, and I believe the Senator from Ohio does not object to it, to take up the resolution which I laid on the table the other day with reference to making a list of absentees on the call of the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call up as the business properly before the Senate, the bill establishing a national currency, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that it be laid aside informally for the purpose of taking up the resolution I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the reporter be directed, in making up the proceedings of the Senate, to report in a separate list the names of absentees on the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. My attention has been called to this subject, as we have been left without a quorum several times, and the question has been started in regard to the power of the Senate to send the Sergeant-at-Arms after absent members. The proposition is generally put in an exceedingly cautious, guarded, and modest shape: "that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members." There is a provision of the Constitution that the Senate shall have power to send for absent members. I do not find that there is any provision, though it may be included under that one, that the Senate have power to invite absent members in. Perhaps that would exist in all bodies without any constitutional provision. I will read the words of the Constitution:

"But a smaller number [than a majority] may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide."

Mr. FESSENDEN. But there has never been any provision made for carrying out that clause. Mr. HALE. I know there has never been any law about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will cause the rule on that subject to be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"8. No member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate, without leave of the Senate first obtained. And in case a less number than a quorum of the Senate shall convene, they are hereby authorized to send the Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other person or persons by them authorized, for any or all absent members, as the majority of such members present shall agree, at the expense of such absent members respectively, unless such excuse for non-attendance shall be made as the Senate when a quorum is convened shall judge sufficient, and in that case the expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund. And this rule shall apply as well to the first convention of the Senate, at the legal time of meeting, as to each day of the session, after the hour has arrived to which the Senate stood adjourned."

Mr. HALE. I was about to say that I remember once hearing this rule discussed in the Senate. Possibly the Senator from Vermont may remember it. I remember that there was some very curious special pleading upon it. I do not remember what it was now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will allow me, while Mr. Breckinridge was Vice President we had a contest here one night, which went far into the night and even into the morning, upon some question on which parties were divided and we found ourselves without a quorum. The majority made a motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring in absent members. The then Vice President examined the subject very carefully and I examined it with him. I contended that there was no power to compel the attendance of members except at the first meeting of the Senate. He examined the question very carefully and so ruled, that there was no such power; that all the power there was was to send the Sergeant-at-Arms and ask them to come in; and whether they came or not was a matter to be decided by them in their own pleasure. He decided that there was no power in the Senate to bring them in after the opening of the session; that then if there was not a quorum they could be sent for and brought in; but after that there was no power to do it; and that decision was acquiesced in by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. There was an earlier discussion than that upon this rule, if my memory does not fail me, in which the late Judge Berrien, of Georgia, and some others took part, and I remember that there was something—I do not recollect distinctly what—suggested out of this clause: "That this rule shall apply as well to the first convention of the Senate at the legal time of meeting as to each day of the session after the hour has arrived to which the Senate stand adjourned." I do not remember what it was; but there was some special consideration suggested growing out of that clause. My own opinion is, with great deference to the gentlemen who surround me, that the better way would be to frame a rule somewhat analogous to that of the House of Representatives by which, if the Senate choose, they may compel the attendance of absent members. It is clearly given under the Constitution. I think it is time that the Senate should have the means to enforce the power which is clearly conferred upon them. I think it would tend to keep a quorum here, and possibly we should never have occasion to execute it.

Mr. CONNESS. With the Senator's permission, I should like to know where we could find the Senator from New Hampshire on such occasions. He is absent very much.

Mr. HALE. As I did not get up to discuss any personalities, I will not answer. I think the better way would be to have this matter arranged so that, whenever the necessity occurs, we might exercise the power; and, as I was saying when I was interrupted, I think it would be more likely to prevent the evil than anything else, even the resolution suggested by the Senator from Maine, though I have no objection to that; but I think it is a little too inefficient for the remedy that should be sought.

Mr. CONNESS. I think all these rules will prove ineffective unless the minds of Senators and the feeling of duty that they owe to the country keep them in their seats. Some Senators sit here from day to day, sometimes when they would like to be absent either on pleasure or other business, but they are nearly always in their seats; and cast their votes on every question. It appears to me that it should only be necessary on this subject to direct the attention of Senators to the degree to which the public business is retarded by their absence in order to have their presence in the Senate hereafter.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire regarded the question that I asked him as personal. I do not know how the Senator could so regard it. It may have been felt by the Senator to apply to him somewhat. I have often had the pleasure of listening to the Senator's speeches, always eloquently given, yet I have not heard his votes succeeding them when the question was taken. I did not intend, however, to present his case specially, but to intimate by that question that the way to have service in the Senate was to be always present. I do not think that the enforcement of any rule of this kind or any mode which you can devise will serve the purpose. It is the duty of every Senator to be in his place. He is elected to be here, and he is paid to be here. If the sense of duty which a Senator should feel will not compel his attendance, I think all other efforts will prove abortive and futile.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no sort of objection to the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire if he will frame a rule, but I submit to him and to the Senate that it will be inefficient, especially at this period of the session. We should spend half our time, if things go on as they have heretofore, in sending for men, bringing them in here, and hearing excuses if they can be found. Although it brings the names of absentees in the Globe, it is found to be a farce in the House, and amounts to nothing. To be sure they go on until they get enough to make a quorum, and then they stop. The few that are brought in in the first place help to constitute a quorum; they are there, and the rest entirely escape.

My belief is that this rule can do no harm and may do some good. I think Senators will hardly be willing on trifling grounds, business at the Departments or something of that sort, during the session of the Senate, to have their names published in the list of absentees when important votes are taken. And if gentlemen are necessarily absent on account of sickness in their families or their own sickness or for such other reason as they must be absent for, it will be very easy for a colleague or some one else to state the fact, and the excuse is sufficient in such a case. I feel that the resolution I have offered may be productive of good, and I think it will come in aid of the resolution we passed this morning. The honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] thinks we shall be certain now not to have a quorum; and lest he should be a true prophet in that particular, I wish to have this provision made in addition, and I think it will produce a good effect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to this resolution, but I cannot see the practical way in which it is to accomplish the object desired. This list will be published in the Globe, and nowhere else, I suppose. The Globe is always at this period of the session three or four days behind, and does not reach the people in any distant part of the country until a week after the votes have been taken. If this list is to be published at all, to attract any attention it should be published the day after the votes are given, and to do that it should be transmitted by telegraph, and that is entirely unnecessary, because when the newspapers publish the yeas and nays, they can make out the absentees without the expense of sending such a list over the wires. I think the papers do it now very frequently. The New York Tribune, I think, generally publishes the yeas, the nays, and the absentees.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can state to the Senator what effect I think this measure will have. The fact of the frequent want of a quorum in this body has become notorious, and I may be permitted to say, as I really think so, that it is shameful and discreditable to the body. Whatever may be the excuse given, the fact that it occurs so frequently, day after day, especially at this period of the session when we have so much important work to do, is discreditable. This list may not appear the next day, but when it does appear in the Globe the fact of the absence appears. The Globe goes to all the important newspapers of the country, and when the newspapers, instead of having the trouble to pick out the absentees and make a list for themselves, see them printed there, they will take notice of them, and I think gentlemen will feel a responsibility to their constituents, who now know nothing about it, that they do not seem to feel at present.

Mr. CONNESS. I will add to what the Senator from Maine has said that the effect of the other rule compelling attendance will be about this always, that the absent members will come in and immediately aid in adjourning the body. That is generally the result of compelling attendance. I am decidedly in favor of the mode proposed by the resolution of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot say that I have any special objection to the adoption of this resolution, but it really looks to me very much like child's play. It is very much like the calling of the yeas and nays sometimes when it is supposed that persons will vote differently when the yeas and nays are called from what they would if they were not called. I do not suppose that any member of the Senate ever changed his vote under such a consideration, and I should be sorry to think that any member of the Senate would be controlled in the least in his vote by the fact that it was or was not to go upon the record. I should think more meanly than I am willing to think of any member of this body if I supposed that because the yeas and nays were called on a question he would vote differently from what he would if they were not called, or that his presence or absence here would be affected by the fact that a list was to be published of those absent on a call of the yeas and nays. The fact appears sufficiently when a record is made of those voting. As has been remarked by the Senator from California, if a sense of public duty will not impel men to be present to discharge their duties in a time like this, I am quite sure that the publication of their names in a list by themselves will not have that effect, for when the yeas and nays are called now it is always apparent who is absent. I look upon the adoption of such a rule as trivial, if I can say so without being at all disrespectful to my friend from Maine. I think nothing will be accomplished by it, and its adoption is rather a reflection upon ourselves.

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me that the remedy suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire is decidedly the better one for us to adopt for the correction of this evil. The remedy suggested by the resolution before the Senate, it seems to me, will as often do injustice to individual Senators as it will do justice to the public service. The fact is that Senators occasionally are obliged to absent themselves from the sittings of the Senate on business. I myself occasionally happen to be sent to the other end of the avenue with enrolled bills; other Senators feel compelled to absent themselves from the sittings of the Senate, and their reasons for doing so cannot be put upon the Journal at the time their names are put upon it. The fact that they were absent would go out to the country without any explanation of the reason which compelled their absence. In those cases injustice would be done to individuals, and no justice would be done to the public service, as I conceive, in any case.

It is, I believe, the practice in some very well regulated schools, when boys do not come in exactly on time, to put down a black mark against them, and I believe that discipline is now enforced in the government of boys, but I do not believe it will have very much effect in regulating the conduct of Senators. What we want is Senators here to act, Senators here to vote, so that the public business can go on. The Senator from New Hampshire has pointed you to an authority, a power vested in you by which, if you please to exert it, you may compel their attendance. Do that, and then the public business will go on, and you will not content yourself by merely putting down a black mark against the name of a Senator who is not here. It seems to me that inasmuch as we are clothed with that power, we had better exert it. Then we secure these advantages to the public service, and we do not do injustice to anybody.

Several Senators. Question! Question!

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I am not sure now that we have got a quorum here even under our new rule. I rather think we have not; and for fear that our weakness will be exposed on this vote, I will say a few words before the vote is taken.

We are told that our remedy is the exercise of the power of sending the Sergeant-at-Arms after absentees. Really and candidly, will gentlemen appeal to that? What is that authority? Instead of insisting upon having our members here, or if they are not here, having their names reported, gentlemen say we should send the Sergeant-at-Arms for them. When we are taking a question and find ourselves without a quorum, we are to sit quietly in our seats with our doors locked, while we send out our Sergeant-at-Arms, by day or by night, to hunt up members who are in the city attending to other business, and then they are to come in if they choose, and when they get in help to adjourn us. That will probably be the effect of it, and the proceeding ends and always has ended in the other House in a broad farce, a general horse-laugh. The only result is, a great loss of time. How much the Sergeant-at-Arms is paid for it I do not know; he may get something out of it, but nobody else does.

Mr. President, I desire that there shall be no such course resorted to, nor any such expedient attempted in this body. It is altogether, as I think, beneath the dignity of the body itself. It is enough to publish the names. If gentlemen do not wish to do that, let us endeavor to be here; but I do not agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that it is our duty to be at another part of the city, at the Departments, during the sessions of the Senate. I disagree entirely in that. If that business can be done for our constituents when we are not employed in our duties and in our seats here, very well. If not, let the constituents be informed that it cannot be done. Say to them, "My other duties are paramount, so that I cannot attend to this matter, and you must dispense with requiring me to do it."

It seems to me that to be here is our paramount duty, and that this duty ought to be performed. Look at all we have said and done about it, and the time we have lost this session for want of a quorum. I hope this resolution may be adopted; it hurts nobody. I believe the tendency of it will be to help us at least to keep a quorum here.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that the resolution would be made more complete if it required also that the names of the absentees should be entered on the Journal. That would be more of a record.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Journal is too old ever to have any effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is published the next year. It is of no consequence.

Mr. SUMNER. But it makes a permanent record.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With the leave of the Senate I will amend the resolution by adding after the word "reporter" the words "for the Congressional Globe."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be so modified. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the reporter be directed, in making up the proceedings of the Senate for the Congressional Globe, to report in a separate list the names of absentees on each call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Would it not be well to have some resolution that those reporting the proceedings of the secret sessions for the New York papers should publish a list of absentees there? [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doobittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Catlie, Chandler, Davis, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, Pomeroy, Powell, Middle, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—16.

So the resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the order of the day, being the bill to establish a national currency, &c.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 4, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PREEMPTION RIGHTS IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion of Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate No. 216, to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CHANGE OF STEAMBOAT'S NAME.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of changing the name of the steamboat Gem to Emma Boyd No. 2; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the fortification bill.

Mr. JULIAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill in regard to homesteads in the rebel States, which was left unfinished on Tuesday of last week.

DISLOYAL APPOINTEE IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether there is employed in the Treasury Department as a clerk or assistant register a person named Garnett, and whether said Garnett formerly held a commission in the rebel army, and was for a time prisoner in the Old Capitol prison, and who recommended the employment of said Garnett in the Treasury Department.

Mr. FENTON. I ask my friend from Illinois to refer that resolution to the committee recently appointed to investigate the affairs of the Treasury Department.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no particular objection to that. I understand that a man formerly a captain in the rebel army, a nephew of Mason of Virginia, is now holding a position in the Treasury Department. He was arrested and put in the Old Capitol prison for a time, and then it is supposed that he was released on taking the oath of allegiance, and now he is found in the Treasury Department. I think my resolution ought to pass. I bring no charge against the Secretary of the Treasury.

There was no objection to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. FENTON. I move that the resolution be referred to the select committee on the Treasury Department. I will withdraw the motion, however, if the mover insists on the passage of the resolution now. I only desire to remark that this whole matter and something respecting the individual mentioned in the resolution is now under investigation by the committee to which I refer, and I thought it would be proper that the subject should be referred to that committee, so that they might report upon it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not offer the resolution with any feeling at all, but I am well informed of the facts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution to-day?

Mr. STEVENS. I think the resolution had better go over till to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. If it goes over until to-morrow it will not be reached until about two weeks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am willing that the resolution shall go to the select committee.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to that.

LAND GRANT TO MISSOURI.

Mr. BLOW, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the act granting the right of way to the State of Missouri and a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to postpone all the preceding special orders in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that the fortification bill may come up.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STEELE, of New York, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of bill of the House No. 207, making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending 30th June, 1865.

The bill was read a first time for information; and it was then read for amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, submitted the following amendment:

The Clerk read, as follows:

Insert after line twenty-seven:
For repairs to Great Brewster island, $40,000.
For Lovell's island and Deer island, $10,000.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from the War Department, which I think will satisfy the House of the justice of these appropriations.

The Clerk read, as follows:

ENGINEERS' DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, March 16, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of Hon. A. H. RICE, of the 23d February, received here on the 8th instant, and to state, in reply to his inquiries, that the Great Brewster island, Boston harbor, has long been undergoing abrasion by the sea to such a degree as to make remedial measures a matter of prompt importance.

Long Island Head, Boston harbor, is undergoing similar injuries, but the necessity for protection in that case is not so urgent as in the other. The detritus which is washed out by the lashing of storms from the hilly shores of these islands is carried by the current into the channels of the bay, and deposited in them to their serious injury.

Deer island and Lovell's island have also been subject to wearing by the sea; but it has been averted in these cases by protective sea walls. In the case of Great Brewster, like protection has been afforded, but only to a part of the extent necessary. At the Great Brewster, the unfinished work should be recommenced and completed as soon as practicable.

At Deer island and Lovell's island the existing structures are sufficient, but now need repairs. At Long Island Head the work may be deferred till the more urgent positions are secured.

For expenditure during the next fiscal year there should be appropriated:

For sea-wall of Great Brewster..... $40,000
For repair of sea-wall of Deer and Lovell's islands 10,000

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH G. TOTTEN,

Brigadier General and Chief Engineer.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Official copy:

C. T. CHRISTENSEN,

Major, Assistant Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 18, 1864.

Approved, and appropriation recommended.

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GANSON. I move the following amendment:

For repairs of the sea-wall at Buffalo, $37,500.

Mr. Chairman, a breach was made in that sea-wall in January last, and unless repaired it may be destroyed altogether. A report was made to the House from the Secretary of War that this appropriation is necessary for the protection of the harbor of Buffalo.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to say that the Secretary of War has recommended this appropriation in a report to this House?

Mr. GANSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I submit the following amendment to the amendment:

For the harbor of Chicago, $50,000.
For the harbor of Milwaukee, $50,000.
For the harbor of Racine, $20,000.
For the harbor of Kenosha, $20,000.

I have inserted Chicago, because I do not see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] with whom I have had some consultation on this subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his amendment until the amendment of the gentleman from New York is disposed of.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not see the application to the present bill of the present amendment. The amendment is for the improvement of a harbor, and this is a fortification bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that it was recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that the subject ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GANSON. I went to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he said that it did not come within his province. I then referred to the Secretary of War, who sent to the House a report recommending this appropriation.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I now renew my amendment. It is for continuing appropriations for preserving the harbors in these respective places.

Mr. STEVENS. There is no law for these appropriations.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. They are to continue previous appropriations. There is a law for the North Cut at Milwaukee.

Mr. STEVENS. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, and that there is no law for it.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. It is in the same condition with the amendments for other harbors. It is the same as the amendment in reference to Buffalo harbor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PIKE submitted the following amendment:

For the purpose of building a road to connect the military road leading from Bangor to Houlton with the east line of the State along the route of the Milford turnpike, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $30,000.

Mr. STEVENS raised the point of order that the amendment was not germane.

The CHAIRMAN ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STEELE, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 207, making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 126) to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820.

COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that a committee of conference be appointed upon the Army appropriation bill, in conformity to the request of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. STEVENS, Mr. SCHENCK, and Mr. MORRISON as such committee on the part of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the first amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 151) making appropriations for the support of the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1865, insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and have appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. VAN WINKLE, and Mr. POWELL as such committee upon their part.

HOMESTEADS IN REBEL STATES.

The SPEAKER announced that the next business in order during the remainder of the morning hour was the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands in regard to homesteads in the rebel States, upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] was entitled to the floor.

ALLEGED CORRESPONDENCE WITH REBELS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope I may be allowed by unanimous consent to make a statement affecting the character of gentlemen who have been assailed upon this floor. I see the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has just come in. I would have risen to this matter immediately after the reading of the Journal had he been in his seat. It will occupy but a short time.

Mr. JULIAN. In justice to others, I do not feel that I can yield at the present time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not ask that it be taken out of the gentleman's time, as a matter of course.

Mr. JULIAN. If it does not come out of my time, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. It will not come out of the gentleman's hour, but it will come out of the morning hour.

Mr. JULIAN. I yield to a short explanation, if there is no other objection.

No objection was made.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, I arise at this time to perform a duty which I owe to two of the most distinguished and worthy gentlemen in the State of Indiana, who are my immediate constituents, my neighbors, and my friends, and who have been most cruelly wronged and outraged on the floor of this House. In discharging this duty, I trust I may be able also to impress upon the public mind a wholesome lesson in behalf of truth, decency, and justice.

On the 8th of last month the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] made a startling and important announcement in his place as a member of Congress, in which he used the following language:

"I am reminded here of a fact which I had well-nigh forgotten. Last summer I remember a Union spy came to our camp bringing two letters addressed to 'Major General John C. Breckinridge, C. S. A.' They were letters of introduction, stating that the bearer desired to obtain a commission in the rebel army, and commending him as a gallant and reliable man whom Breckinridge could trust. One of these letters was signed by a man who lately held a seat in this House! [Cries of 'Name him!'] from the Democratic side of the House.] I will produce the letter in due time. It is not here with me. The other letter was from an associate of his, prominent in the local Democratic politics of the State of Indiana. I am responsible for producing those letters. [Cries of 'Name!']"

"Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will give the names now."

"Mr. GARFIELD. When I produce the letters any further testimony that may be called for can be had at his hands."

It will be seen by this statement that the gentleman pledged himself to the House and the country to produce the letters referred to, and any further testimony which might be required at his hands. The charge was boldly and explicitly made, and the responsibility distinctly assumed. I was not present when this announcement was made, and I heard of it with profound amazement. I did not deem it possible that a gentleman occupying a seat on this floor would thus make an unqualified statement of a fact which implied crime of the highest character, unless he had, as he asserted, the fullest and most satisfactory evidence to sustain him. I therefore awaited the production of these letters with a very natural anxiety. Public expectation, too, was stimulated and aroused by this positive proclamation of treason on the part of two prominent members and leaders of the Democratic party of Indiana. It was supposed by all those who hunger and thirst for the destruction of that grand old party that its day of doom was near at hand.

Sir, the promised blow after a tantalizing delay fell. The gentleman from Ohio arose on the 19th of April to redeem the pledge which he had so solemnly made. In order to show that he himself appreciated the gravity and serious nature of the charge which he had made, and which he now proposed to prove, and in order to call attention to the facts as detailed by him, I quote his language in full on that occasion:

"Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire the attention of the House for five minutes. When submitting some remarks in the House a few days ago in reply to the speech of my colleague, [Mr. LOUG], I made a very grave charge against some of the leaders of the Democratic party, alleging that they were in correspondence with rebels, and was called upon to produce the documents to which I referred. I take this occasion to do so. Before producing them, I wish to say a word in regard to them. It is a very grave matter for a member to rise in his place here and say that leading men of any party in the North are actually in correspondence with leaders in the rebel army. I made that statement, but not without a full knowledge of what I said. I have had opportunities for knowing of the existence of such correspondence—more, perhaps, than most other gentlemen here.

"These letters came into my possession in the following manner: we had learned in the army of the Cumberland that some of our regiments were being corrupted, that attempts were being made by parties at home to induce them to desert. This had become so great an evil with some regiments from southern Indiana and southern Illinois that we sent several of our secret service men into those States to find out, if possible, who were engaged in this business. Among others was a young man who had resigned a commission, nearly a year before, in consequence of ill-health. He consented to go to southern Indiana, believing he could not only find out these men but could get recommendations from prominent rebel sympathizers that would enable him to get through the lines into the rebel army. The result of this mission into Indiana was that he obtained two letters, the copies of which I now hold in my hand.

"When the letters were brought to me, I immediately called some Indiana officers who knew the authors and were acquainted with their handwriting. It was necessary that the scout should take with him into the enemy's lines the original letters, which, being recognized by Breckinridge, would serve as passes. I therefore took exact copies of them, placing them under tissue paper and tracing them as accurately as possible, so as to preserve the characteristics of the handwriting. Out of regard to the young man himself, I have omitted his name, as its publication might bring him into trouble. He went through the lines, and immediately afterwards the campaign began, ending with the battle of Chickamauga, and I have never heard of him since. I will now ask that the letters be read at the Clerk's desk.

"Mr. ELDRIDGE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question first.

"Mr. GARFIELD. Let the letters be read first.

"The letters were read, as follows:

GREENCASTLE, INDIANA, July 1, 1863.

DEAR SIR: I take this method of introducing to your favorable consideration Mr. ———, a resident of this place. Mr. ——— wishes to enter the service of the South in some capacity, so that he can be of some assistance to your cause. I can safely recommend him to you as an energetic and faithful man in any capacity you may place him, and I know that he can be of valuable assistance to you. Mr. ——— was for some time connected with the Union Army, but became disgusted with the party in power and resigned in consequence thereof. Any favor that may be shown him will, I am satisfied, never be betrayed.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
D. R. ECKELS.

General JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE, C. S. A.

ROCKVILLE, INDIANA, July 14, 1863.

DEAR SIR: I take great pleasure in recommending to your favorable acquaintance the bearer, Mr. ———, of Greencastle, this State. He wishes to visit the South, and not be subjected to any danger from such a visit.

Mr. ——— was connected with the Army for some months as a quartermaster of the —th Indiana volunteers, but resigned immediately after the evacuation of Corinth, Mississippi, by your forces, and has had no sympathy or connection with the Army since. Any duty he may agree to perform, you may rely upon it that it will be faithfully done. Any favor shown him will be reciprocated by me whenever any opportunity offers.

I am, General, yours, with much respect,

JOHN G. DAVIS.

Major General JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.

"Mr. GARFIELD. The last letter bears the signature of a man who was a member of the Thirty-Second, Thirty-Third, Thirty-Fourth, and Thirty-Sixth Congresses, and the predecessor of the gentleman from the Terre Haute district, [Mr. VOORHEES.] The other was a judge in Utah under Buchanan, and is also a prominent Democratic politician in the same district. Both are the gentleman's [Mr. VOORHEES's] constituents."

Mr. Speaker, I was present when the gentleman from Ohio made the above remarks and produced the foregoing letters. I saw at once that the district which I have the honor to represent had been chosen for this assault, and that two of my personal and political friends had been selected as the victims of party malice. I perceived, also, that the gentlemen aimed at were among those most dreaded in political warfare by their political adversaries. I could at that moment, with a clear conscience, have announced my perfect confidence in their innocence and denounced these letters as forgeries. I preferred, however, as I then stated, to pursue a different course. I knew that my knowledge of these gentlemen was not fully shared by the members of this House, and that my word, unaided by evidence, would weigh but little under the circumstances with those who have made up their minds to believe any calumny, however great, if it attaches to a member of the Democratic party. I therefore took my time, as the gentleman from Ohio did his, to produce testimony, but with a far different result, as I shall speedily demonstrate.

But let us pause at this point a moment and see how this case stands and what are the issues made and tendered by the gentleman himself. He said that he would produce these letters. He has not done so, and I call upon him to do so now. Copies even if correctly made do not comply with this bold and defiant promise unless they are proven by competent evidence. The copies here produced are attended by no proof at all that they are copies of letters written by Mr. Davis and Judge Eckels. The gentleman said that he "immediately called some Indiana officers who knew the authors and were acquainted with their handwriting." He leaves us plainly to infer that he was assured by them that the letters were genuine. Who are these officers? Where are their statements? The gentleman will remember that he stands pledged to produce any further testimony which may be required at his hands in connection with this case. I demand this and have a right to it if it is in existence. If it is not the gentleman will doubtless have the candor to say so. He alludes to his first statement on this subject, and says that he did not make it "without a full knowledge of what he said." The time has now arrived for him to make that avowal good or unqualifiedly retract the charge which he has made against two unoffending private citizens. He says that he took exact copies of these letters "placing them under tissue paper and tracing them as accurately as possible so as to preserve the characteristics of the handwriting." Where are these accurate copies? I demand their production. They were not the ones read at the desk on the 19th. Those were simply copies of copies. The gentleman states that the spy took the originals with him into the rebel lines. This accounts for their absence, but where are these tissue paper copies which show the handwriting of the parties charged? The telegraph and newspaper correspondents all in the employ and under the control of the gentleman and his party friends have flooded the country with the positive assurance that the gentleman from Ohio was abounding with overwhelming proof of the authenticity of these letters, and that I would not dare to call them in question. Sir, let the gentleman now make good the vaunting boast of his friends.

I do not thus call upon the gentleman from Ohio in any spirit of recrimination for the assault, the cruel assault which he has made on Mr. Davis and Judge Eckels, and through them on the Democratic party, nor on account of his particular allusion to the fact that these gentlemen are my constituents. Their characters will not suffer at his hands; the Democratic party will survive his blows; and I esteem it the highest honor to be reminded even by way of taunt that John G. Davis and Delana R. Eckels are my constituents. But it is my right and my duty to demand the proof by which this atrocious charge is sustained. The rules of evidence imperatively require that the author of a charge shall support it with his evidence before the party charged is called upon to defend. In the absence of such evidence, I might content myself with simply denouncing these letters as forgeries upon the denials of the two gentlemen charged with writing them.

But it happens fortunately for the cause of innocence, justice, and truth, that I am under no necessity of thus standing in an attitude of defense. The gentleman from Ohio having failed to produce evidence to sustain his deliberate and solemn statement, I will assume the affirmative and prove by clear, conclusive, and unimpeachable testimony that these letters are base, impudent, deliberate forgeries; acknowledged to be such by the spy who forged them, and from whom the gentleman from Ohio obtained his copies. I will prove by Republican testimony that the spy wrote them himself at a distant part of the State from where these gentlemen reside, and that he made no disguise with his friends of the purposes for which they were forged. I will first, however, submit the denials of the gentlemen themselves who are arraigned upon these forgeries. You have already heard read the telegram from Mr. Davis to me on this subject. I now produce the following letter:

TERRE HAUTE, April 21, 1864.

SIR: Inclosed find a publication made in the Terre Haute Express this morning.

This assault was first made upon me on the floor of Congress, where I have no voice. The whole thing is a wicked, malicious, and despicable forgery. General GARFIELD has evidently carelessly suffered himself to be imposed upon. He certainly cannot wish to do me a willful injury.

With Rankin I have no personal acquaintance. I only know of him through the channels of public reputation; and I may add that his character is universally condemned. I have not only written no such letter in his behalf, but I never wrote to John C. Breckinridge on any subject in my life.

Yours, respectfully,
HON. DANIEL W. VOORHEES

JOHN G. DAVIS.

I take the liberty also of reading a portion of a private letter from Mr. Davis to me on this subject. I do it to show, among other things, the keen inflection which has so wantonly and ruthlessly been brought upon an innocent, proud-spirited man:

TERRE HAUTE, April 23, 1864.

MY DEAR FRIEND: To-day I feel able to write you this line, though so badly I fear you will not be able to read it. I have just received your dispatch. All right so far. You will have received the Sentinel before this reaches you, containing a well-written article and a satisfactory statement of the forgery and origin of these letters. It is conclusive. This statement, with my letter and such other evidence as may come to hand before you address the House on this stupendous villainy, you will of course use.

Was there ever before in the history of crime such a bold and devilish attempt to malign and destroy the character of man? Has hellish malevolence ever before been so apparent?

Demand of GARFIELD the original letters. Make him disclose who has them and who furnished the copies. Let him show "his additional documentary evidence of the authenticity of these letters," which he has had vauntingly telegraphed over the country that he had in his possession.

Oh, my friend, how sadly have I felt the want of my former good health within the last four days! But I must bear patiently the will of him who does all things for the best. Language would utterly fail to describe my feelings. I must leave you to judge.

I leave my case and my character, which is much dearer than life, in your hands. I know you will not let it suffer. Sincerely your friend,
JOHN G. DAVIS.

HON. D. W. VOORHEES.

I will further state that Mr. Davis has pronounced the letter attributed to him to be a forgery in various newspapers in Indiana.

I will now submit the denial of Judge Eckels, which is contained in the following telegram:

GREENCASTLE, April 30, 1864.

HON. D. W. VOORHEES:

The letter read in the House by General GARFIELD, purporting to have been written by me to John C. Breckinridge, is a base forgery. I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Breckinridge, and have never written him on any subject.

D. R. ECKELS.

I read also the following letter, just received:

EEL RIVER, April 28, 1864.

SIR: I have this evening seen for the first time a letter purporting to have been written by me to John C. Breckinridge, recommending Oliver Rankin, and read by General GARFIELD in Congress, and I avail myself of the earliest opportunity to declare it a base forgery. I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Breckinridge, and have never written to him upon that or any other subject.

I am living on my farm fourteen miles from my post office, and have not received my mail for two weeks; but for this you would have heard from me sooner.

Your obedient servant,

D. R. ECKELS.

HON. D. W. VOORHEES.

The House is now in possession of the replies which these injured and outraged gentlemen have seen fit to make on the subject of these letters. I will next call a witness who proves this forgery affirmatively and explicitly. I read now a statement voluntarily made by Mr. Hays, of Indianapolis, a Republican in politics and greatly to his honor, capable of doing an opponent an act of justice when wrongfully assaulted:

INDIANAPOLIS, April 21, 1864.

The undersigned was well acquainted with Oliver S.

Rankin. The last time I saw him was at the Little's hotel in this city, in July, 1863. I have read the letters read by General GARFIELD in the United States House of Representatives, dated July, 1863, purporting to have been written by Hon. John G. Davis and Hon. D. R. Eckels, (or Eckels,) introducing said Rankin to John C. Breckinridge, a general in the rebel army. To my knowledge those letters were written at the desk in the office of Little's hotel. I saw them written and I read them after they were so written. Neither John G. Davis nor D. R. Eckels had any participation in or knowledge of the matter whatever. The said Rankin was acting in the capacity of a spy. He had as such crossed the rebel lines three times. The last time his friends heard from Rankin was three days before the battle of Chickamauga, and then he was at Bragg's headquarters, and they now suppose him to be dead. The object the said Rankin had in view in writing the letters referred to was to aid him in case he should be arrested by the rebels, as he thought such letters would recommend him to the rebel authorities in such an event, and help conceal his true character.

I make this statement as a matter of justice to Messrs. Davis and Eckels, whom I know, and with whom I have no political sympathy. It was the purpose of Rankin to have destroyed the letters named above if he had returned from his mission in safety.

Mr. Rankin was a staunch Union man, and an excellent officer. His daring and bravery had received many commendations from his superior officers. General Manson complimented him very highly in his official report for his services at the battle of Mill Springs.

J. McD. HAYS.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will be asked who Mr. Hays is, and whether his character may be relied on for integrity and veracity. I am ready to answer on that point. I submit in corroboration of his evidence the statement of Mr. Hyde, which is as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, April 27, 1864.

This is to certify that Mr. J. McD. Hays has been in my employ, as clerk of Little's hotel, for the past two years, and that I have all confidence in his integrity and veracity. It is also within my personal knowledge that the letters of introduction purporting to have been written by John G. Davis and D. R. Eckels, in July, 1863, to John C. Breckinridge, recommending one Rankin to his confidence, are forgeries, and that they were written as stated in the published statement of Mr. Hays in the Indianapolis Daily Sentinel.

A. R. HYDE,
Proprietor of Little's Hotel,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

I also submit to the House the following statement of ten worthy and respectable citizens of Indianapolis:

INDIANAPOLIS, April 27, 1864.

The undersigned are well acquainted with Mr. J. McD. Hays, clerk in Little's hotel, of this city, and they take pleasure in stating that he is a young gentleman of strict integrity and veracity.

A. GALVIN,
CHARLES SAUER,
W. J. HAWKART,
J. J. SWIGGERT,

MILTON A. OSBORN,
Captain Twentieth Indiana Battery.

WILLIAM H. SALTER,
Deputy Secretary-Mississippi Insurance Company.

D. C. MINICK,
D. H. CHASE,
A. C. BRYANT,
R. S. CUNNINGHAM.

In addition to the foregoing I will read a letter which my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] has handed me for that purpose:

LAWRENCEBURGH, INDIANA, April 25, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I notice in the newspapers a statement to the effect that General GARFIELD, of Ohio, had made an exposé of what purported to be two letters from Hon. John G. Davis and Judge D. R. Eckels introducing a certain individual by the name of Rankin to the rebel General John C. Breckinridge, who was desirous of obtaining a position in the confederate army. Since this exposition was made I have seen a statement made under oath by J. M. Hays, principal clerk in Little's hotel, Indianapolis, in which he says that from actual observation he knows those letters are forgeries, because he not only saw them written, but read them after they were written. From a personal knowledge which I have of the character of Mr. Hays for truth and veracity I do not hesitate to give his statement full faith and credit. I know him, and have known him for more than three years intimately, and I am fully persuaded he would scorn the idea of giving such a statement to the public to screen any man unless truth justified him in doing so. You know very well I do not indorse the position which Messrs. Eckels and Davis occupy in regard to the war; but I think I am doing nothing but justice in making this statement. There is too strong a tendency on the part of such parties as General GARFIELD to keep the public mind in a constant state of fermentation by starting upon the winds such humbug charges as the one in question, and hence where their slanderous declarations can be refuted it ought to be done.

Very truly yours,

HON. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN.

P. S. You are at liberty to show this letter to Mr. Voorhees if you are so disposed.

Yours, &c.,

O. F. R.

Mr. Roberts, the writer of the above, was four years a representative in the Indiana Legislature from the county of Dearborn, and was one of the ablest and most prominent members of that body. There is not a more highly reputable gentleman in the State, nor one whose word would weigh more in determining a controversy. My friend and colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] will bear cheerful testimony to this fact.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have known Mr. Roberts intimately a great many years—from his boyhood. He resides in my county; and I can fully indorse all that my colleague has said in reference to his reputation and character. He is a man of undoubted integrity.

Mr. VOORHEES. But as if a special providence was assisting in the explosion of this wicked calumny, I am enabled to produce the following statement which appears in the Indianapolis Journal, the State organ of the Republican party in Indiana. I know Captain Osborn well, and he is worthy of all confidence:

"He (Captain Osborn) is a resident of Greencastle, and well acquainted with both Eckels and Davis. He says while General Rosecrans was lying at Tullahoma last summer he (Captain Osborn) was at Nashville, and was there visited by one Oliver Rankin, of Greencastle, with whom he had had some previous acquaintance. In the course of a conversation during his visit, Rankin said to Captain Osborn that he intended to try to get through the lines into the rebel army as a sort of 'outside' spy. Being asked how he intended to do it, he said General Rosecrans would pass him through, and once in the rebel lines he had letters that would secure him good treatment. And he exhibited letters purporting to be introductions from John G. Davis and Judge D. R. Eckels to General John C. Breckinridge. 'If you depend on those letters,' said the captain, 'you may find yourself in a difficulty. They are forgeries. I know the handwriting of both Davis and Eckels well, and they never wrote them.' Rankin then admitted that they had not, but that they were imitations got up in this city. He nevertheless declared his intention to go on through the lines. He went down soon after to Tullahoma to headquarters, and made his application to General Rosecrans for a pass. It was peremptorily refused, the general saying with some warmth, 'I will not have your blood on my skirts.' Rankin then professed to have some knowledge of the movements of the rebel sympathizers in this State, and to have been in their confidence, and he proposed to come back here and obtain evidence upon which proceedings might be based against them. At the same time he exhibited the letters to Breckinridge as corroborating evidence of his statement. The matter was, as it might well be, deemed of importance enough to merit consideration, and General GARFIELD took copies of the letters, as he stated in the House when they were read. Rankin started back to Nashville ostensibly for Indiana, on his new mission, and there again called upon Captain Osborn and gave him the account which we have reported of the interview with General Rosecrans. The next day, or soon after, he went South instead of North, and probably passed the rebel lines, but nothing has been certainly learned of him since. He left the originals of the letters with some woman in Nashville, but Captain Osborn did not know her name or residence.

"This statement, which cannot be questioned so far as it rests upon Captain Osborn's own knowledge, and the material portion of it does, confirms the statement of Mr. Hays, and completely exonerates Davis and Eckels, and also it exonerates General GARFIELD from any imputations of using forged documents knowingly or carelessly."

Here, sir, I may well pause and ask whether a refutation was ever so complete as this? Did a conspiracy to ruin the characters and perhaps take the lives of private citizens ever come to so shameful and ignoble an end? Well may the Cincinnati Commercial, a leading Republican paper of the gentleman's own State, make the following admission:

"John G. Davis, of Indiana, ex member of Congress from the Terre Haute district, has telegraphed Mr. D. W. VOORHEES that the letter of introduction purporting to have been written by him to John C. Breckinridge for one Rankin, a copy of which was produced upon the floor of Congress by Mr. GARFIELD, is a forgery. This statement is confirmed by Mr. J. McD. Hays, a clerk in Little's hotel, Indianapolis, who states that the letters in question were 'to his knowledge' written at the desk in the office of Little's hotel. He says, 'I saw them written and read them after they were written. Neither John G. Davis nor D. R. Eckels had any participation in or knowledge of the matter whatever.' Mr. J. McD. Hays, we understand, is a respectable young man, and his positive testimony may be accepted as conclusive."

But, Mr. Speaker, in addition to all this evidence so conclusive in its character, there is still one further fact more overwhelming, if possible, to the minds of those who are acquainted with these parties, than all others. It will be remembered that the gentleman from Ohio withheld the name of this spy upon the introduction of these letters here. I consequently had no means of knowing who he was till I saw his name in the public prints. It is a very familiar name to me. I know Orville S. Rankin, knew his father and his grandfather before him, and when I saw it gravely stated that he had procured confidential letters of introduction from John G. Davis and Delana R. Eckels to John C. Breckinridge, of a character which placed their lives and fortunes in his hands, it became a question in my mind whether the infamy or the absurdity of the statement preponderated. He is a young man who was raised from his infancy in Greencastle, a close neighbor to Judge Eckels. He is violently opposed, politically, to both these gentlemen, and they as well know it as I do. He could no more deceive either one of them in regard to his views than I could deceive this House in regard to mine; nor would it be any more reasonable or less ridiculous for him to approach one of them for such a letter as is here produced than it would be for me to approach the gentleman from Ohio for a letter of introduction to Edwin M. Stanton recommending that I should obtain a contract by which to plunder the Government. He would have been spurned from their presence, and most likely with blows. And, sir, these important facts could all have been as well known by the gentleman from Ohio as they are by me if he had simply written to any intelligent member of his own party residing in Greencastle before he made himself responsible for this charge on the floor of this House. There is not an honest man in all the county of Putnam, of which Greencastle is the county seat, but what would have assured him that he would become the subject of mockery and ridicule in taking the course he has. Orville S. Rankin obtaining letters from Delana R. Eckels and John G. Davis to enable him to enter the service of the rebels! If it were not for the grave consequences of such a charge it might well be regarded as the most stupendous jest of this joking and jesting Administration.

A word or two now in regard to this young man Rankin. He is said to have been a good officer, and as such I commend him. But there is deep and damning villainy somewhere in this infamous transaction. I have proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that Rankin forged these letters and made no disguise of that fact. On the contrary, he left living witnesses to the forgery at Indianapolis when he started South. He knew their fraudulent character could be proved by Hays and Hyde, whose statements I have produced. He also knew that Captain Osborn was in evidence against him. Yet, knowing all this, he returns to the army of the Cumberland, according to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, and there in the confidential character of a spy submits to him these acknowledged forgeries, assures him that they are genuine, and leaves copies in his hands to be used for the ruin of Mr. Davis and Judge Eckels. He does this, too, after assuring Mr. Hays that he intended to destroy these forged documents after they had served his purpose in saving his life, perhaps, if arrested as a spy in the rebel lines. Such an act of baseness and perfidy, sir, is without a parallel for atrocity in design or cool and hardened rascality in the execution. From my knowledge of young Rankin and his family it would be wholly incredible if I had not the word of a member of this House to its truth. The publication of these letters has most likely cost Rankin his life. If he is in the rebel lines, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, they will lead to his execution as a spy. While this is a poor return for a general to make to his spy, sent by him on this perilous duty, yet there will be less sympathy felt by all honest men for his fate than if he had not thus attempted to ruin two honorable men who had never wronged him by word, thought, or deed.

And now, Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that I fully indorsed Mr. Davis and Judge Eckels as men of character, honor, and patriotism when they were first assailed in this House. I stated that they were incapable of this treachery to the Government under which they lived. For this I have been bitterly denounced by a servile and mendacious press. I now, however, repeat what I then said. I know these gentlemen well and have known them long. Judge Eckels has been a leading lawyer in Indiana for thirty years. He was on the bench when I came to the bar, and I made one of my first appearances when a mere boy in his court. From that hour to this I have admired his keen and powerful intellect, and the fidelity of his nature. He served with distinction on the bench of the Federal judiciary for some years, and in every position in life has proved himself an able friend of the Constitution and laws. He does not believe that the best way of preserving the Constitution is to destroy it.

He abhors the destructive policy by which the party now in power brought on the war of sections in which we are engaged, and he has no hope of union, liberty, or peace while that party retains its seat of power. In these views, sir, I am his faithful Representative.

Mr. Davis, sir, is no stranger in this House. He was my immediate predecessor, and served here with honor to himself and usefulness to the country for eight years. Who has left behind him here upon retiring to private life a more unblemished reputation than John G. Davis? Who ever breathed upon his integrity as a legislator? Whose word was more binding upon all who knew him? Who displayed a sounder or more practical talent for business, or abler or more patriotic views of the duties of statesmanship? There are many gentlemen here now on this floor who will bear testimony to the estimate which I place upon his character. And it will be a deep gratification for him to know that of all those who once served with him not one have I heard of, without regard to politics, but what has expressed his disbelief of this charge. His great common sense, for which he is proverbial, as well as his attachment to the laws of his country, alike forbid such conduct on his part. Mr. Davis is an excellent judge of men, and has been honored by the people with official station almost continuously for thirty years, from very early youth to the full meridian of life. In every station to which he has been called he has displayed striking ability, unsullied honor, unquestioned courage, and a will and energy that have seemed at times to court obstacles for the pleasure of overcoming them. His political views, however, are not those of the majority of this House. But they are mine, and I will defend them on all proper occasions.

Sir, these are the men whose destruction is sought by the felon's art and the forger's talent. It is no common game against which the gentleman from Ohio has flown his unhooded falcon of detraction and slaughter. He has used his high eminence from which to hurl his poisoned javelin at the breasts of private citizens of approved worth and tried reputations. It has, however, fallen harmless to the ground. I pick it up and send it back, and if it fails to transfix the gentleman from Ohio in public odium it will be because of his prompt retraction and reparation—all the justice which he now has in his power to make.

Sir, I will dwell but little longer on this matter. The injury was inflicted on Mr. Davis and Judge Eckels here, and here it must be corrected. They have both been arraigned before the country, throughout all its length and breadth, as criminals of the darkest hue. Whether even this ample vindication will overtake and correct a falsehood so delicious to the Republican party, is a matter of doubt. Every paper, great and small, in the interest of that proscriptive party has published and emblazoned this charge for party purposes. How few will ever notice the fact that their capital was obtained by forgery!

We have all experienced this evil. A calumny once started has the wings of the wind, and its dark pinions never tire. One moment you think you have struck it down forever, but in an instant after, like the bat in the room at night, it starts up and flutters with its clammy and disgusting features in your very face. This has been my fate ever since I entered public life. This may be the fate of the gentlemen who have been the victims of this forgery. I see it stated in the papers that there is no doubt but that I have written similar letters. I am prepared to hear them read any day. The only wonder is that it has not been done before. It has been persistently asserted by the abolition press that the Democratic party is treasonable and its members are traitors. This is a monstrous lie, of course, but it is necessary to prove it; and whatever of forgery, perjury, and subornation of perjury is found necessary for that purpose will be forthcoming. Doubtless many good people will always believe that McClellan had a secret interview with Lee after the battle of Antietam. It was published from ocean to ocean, but with what a snail's pace does the truth follow the falsehood! In view of such instances I am sometimes discouraged as I look on the conflict which is perpetually waging between truth and error. A few days since in glancing at an article in one of our monthlies I found a description of this evil so graphic and so perfectly expressive of my sentiments, that I adopt it as my own on this occasion:

"The man who turns to combat error needs the assurance of the true instincts of his race, for he enters on a task that must seem hopeless often.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again;"

so Mr. Bryant tells him, and he is much obliged to Mr. Bryant. But will not error do just the same? He killed a lie yesterday and buried it decently. He finds it alive again and prosperous to-day. Cut a man's head off and he dies. There is no help for it unless he is a St. Denis, and then he can only take a walk with his head in his hand. But, if he is not a St. Denis, he dies. That is the law. Cut the head off a lie it does not die at all. It rather seems to enjoy the operation. You will meet it like fifty St. Denises, on every morning during your lifetime. They have a marvelous vitality. I meet lies every day that, to my certain knowledge, were put to death a hundred years ago, by master hands at the business, too. They ought, in decency at least, to look like pale ghosts revisiting the glimpses of the moon, but they don't. They are snug, comfortable, and somewhat portly, as from good solid living.

"Now, this is discouraging, somewhat. But there is no good in shutting one's eyes to the fact. That is what I am going against. It is best to know that lies die hard. They will bear at least as many killings as a cat, and that is nine! Still, much depends on the manner of the operation. How is it best performed? Knowledge is needed in all pursuits. There is a science undoubtedly in killing lies. If you wish to go into the business, and I trust most honest men do, you need to study it somewhat. Otherwise you will waste much effort and get few results. It is not easy to kill one wolf with a stick, but call science to your aid, and an ounce of strychnine well administered will do the business for a pack. Instead of going into a rough-and-tumble fight with some coarse, rude, vile lie, and mauling it to death by sheer force of muscle, it is better to use science, and put it to death neatly, cleanly, and delicately, with unsoiled hands. Let us see if we can find the science of killing lies."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I have succeeded in killing this lie to-day or not. I have, however, brought all the science of which I am master—the science of truth—to bear upon it. If it lives after this it will at least be hooted as a guilty, felonious thing by all honest men. It may travel hereafter, but it will be with a crippled gait and wearing the brand of a condemned thief. It can no longer harm John G. Davis and Delana R. Eckels. It may sully and stain those who hereafter attempt to introduce it into respectable company.

Inasmuch, sir, as I understand that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio to retract the charge he has made if the evidence should appear sufficient to his mind, I have endeavored to refrain from all remarks of a character personally offensive, and have only indulged in such reflections as necessarily and inevitably arise out of the nature of this transaction and his peculiar and prominent connection with it.

I will now yield the floor to him that he may take such a course as justice and right may seem to demand at his hands, reserving the privilege of resuming the floor upon his conclusion if I desire to do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. A few days since, in conversation with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, on its being intimated to me by him, and also having seen it alleged in the public prints, that the letters in question were forged, made in the city of Indianapolis, I told him then and I still say that I should prefer, if it be proved that those letters were forged, to make a statement myself in vindication of the parties against whom the charges were made. I regret that the gentleman did not sallow me his evidence before he made his remarks.

Nevertheless, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments to some points which have been made in the remarks just submitted. I had not up to the moment of the gentleman's speaking heard that Judge Eckels had made any denial whatever. The only denial which had come to my ear was that of Davis, which was read to the House nearly a week ago.

According to the rules of evidence, the gentleman says, I should have proved the substance of what I have produced here as if before a court of justice. I wish to remind the gentleman that this is not a court of justice, and that we are not, in the conclusions to which as members of this Congress we are expected to come, required to proceed in the manner of deliberations customary in courts of justice. Nor do the evidences submitted to our minds need to be of that character before we form an opinion and act upon them. I did not pretend then, I do not pretend now, nor have I ever pretended that I had evidence in my possession on which before a court of justice I could have established the truth and genuineness of those letters, and I am willing to bear any evidence in proof that they are forgeries.

Allow me to say a word more in reference to the letters themselves. Before placed in my hands they were delivered at Nashville to the chief of Army police of the army of the Cumberland, and examined by him. The person named in the letters, and who delivered them to the chief of police of the Army, was placed under his oath, and certified copies of the letters were made on the books of the police department, and he testified that they were genuine letters. He then came forward to the front nearly a hundred miles, where we were, and submitted the letters to the general commanding the army and to myself. After deliberation, after calling upon a number of individual officers who were familiar with the writing of the gentlemen from whom the letters purported to come, the unanimous conclusion of the officers at headquarters was that the evidence of the genuineness of the letters was satisfactory. I made the tracing as I stated when this matter was last before the House, and I have here my private letter book in which I made these tracings. The gentleman is at liberty to examine it at any time he chooses. It may be that it may furnish a clue to the original handwriting. If it does I shall be glad.

Mr. VORHEES. Will the gentleman allow me to look at it now?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly. I have before me a letter from the chief of police of the army of the Cumberland, in which he also states that these letters were thus copied on his official records in his books, and certified to by the person bringing them as genuine.

Gentlemen will see at a glance the propriety of sending the originals through the lines, and not copies; for any copies we might make, if these letters were really genuine, would of course be of no avail to the party carrying them, but would subject him to extreme personal danger. It does not amount to anything, therefore, that the supposed writers of these letters say in such a defiant tone, "Demand of General GARFIELD to produce the originals." It is a very modest demand, indeed, after I have stated publicly that the originals were not in my possession, and had given the best possible reason why they were not. No one could expect me to produce the originals, unless, perchance, the party himself had returned through the lines and retained them, which is very improbable, as he would doubtless deliver them to the officer to whom they were addressed.

Such were the evidences which I deemed entirely sufficient for my action in this House; but I never at any time deemed it sufficient evidence to establish the fact before a court of justice.

Now, sir, what answer has been made by the gentleman from Indiana? He answers, in the first place, by reading a printed letter in a journal published in Indiana, which journal I have in my hand, and that is called evidence on which we are to believe that these letters were forged in the city of Indianapolis. I ask the gentleman why he did not produce the original letter of Mr. Hays? Perhaps he has it.

Mr. VORHEES. The paper containing the letter of Mr. Hays was forwarded to me with a letter from the editor stating that it had been obtained and published. I have not the manuscript; it was put in the printers' hands. But the gentleman from Ohio will allow me to settle that question. I have here the statement of Mr. Hyde, who says:

It is also within my personal knowledge that the letters of introduction purporting to have been written by John G. Davis and D. R. Eckels, in July, 1863, to John C. Breckinridge, recommending one Rankin to his confidence, are forgeries, and that they were written as stated in the published statement of Mr. Hays in the Indianapolis Daily Sentinel.

A. R. HYDE,
Proprietor of Little's Hotel,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

Mr. GARFIELD. It struck me as a little remarkable that the affidavit of the gentleman who saw these letters forged should not have itself been sent here; but that in place of it a printed statement in a political journal should be read as evidence, together with a letter, purporting to be an original letter of another party, vouching for the general and special truthfulness of this gentleman whose printed letter appears before us. It must of course go to the House for what it is worth. I shall be very glad, on seeing the original affidavit made by this party thus vouched for, to believe that the statements thus made are correct, and that I myself, together with all the officers at the headquarters of the army of the Cumberland, were deceived. But I must have more than newspaper evidence.

The gentleman has said it is morally impossible that Mr. John G. Davis and Judge Eckels could have written such letters to such a man for such a purpose. If there is any one evidence which has been to my mind stronger than all others from the beginning of this matter and now, it is the moral evidence that the letters were not forgeries, in this: here was a young man who knew very well from his acquaintance with the parties that they were personally known to General Breckinridge, and yet he proposed to stake his life on these papers as a pass for him through the rebel lines and inside the rebel camps. I ask if it is reasonable that this young man, intelligent as he evidently was, would dare to risk his life in presenting a forged paper to a man who very well knew the signatures of the gentlemen whose names were subscribed? A man might attempt something of that kind for a temporary gain in which life was not involved, but it seemed to me the fact that that young man was entirely willing to risk his life in that manner was the best proof of his sincerity. It seemed to me the very strongest moral evidence possible that he had faith in the genuineness of these documents. And in addition to that, what need was there that he should have certified on the official books of the police of the department that they were genuine letters? What need was there that he should have concealed from his associates the character of these letters if they were really forgeries? With all the terrible consequences to himself before him he went into the enemy's country with those letters as his passports. He could have gone through the lines without them; and they could only have been valuable to him by being genuine. On any other basis his act is not easily explained, for it would lack the usual motives that govern men.

Mr. Speaker, there is another fact. He would not have dared to go with those letters, even if they had been genuine, had he not known the character of the men who were the alleged authors. He would not have taken a letter from you, Mr. Speaker, and gone through the lines to present it as a passport to high favor in the southern army. He would not have taken a letter from the distinguished Governor of your State for any such purpose. He would not have taken it from any man whom he did not know to be in full fellowship and sympathy with the people of the South and with their army. He was, to say the least, wise in his selection of parties, if he designed to commit a forgery. Even one of the affidavits that has been here read by the gentleman [Mr. VORHEES] certifies that these two gentlemen have no sympathy whatever with the Administration in its conduct of the war, or with the war itself. That much, at least, has been developed, that these highly distinguished and worthy gentlemen, constituents of the gentleman from Indiana, are totally averse to the war and its objects. These facts, in themselves, are very strong ones.

These letters were not produced by me from any deliberate purpose of accusation against any party or set of men. In the midst of a debate which it seemed to me was a crisis of our condition as a nation; in the midst of a debate when it seemed to me that all along the lines of the Union Army and among the people there were traitors arising, it seemed to me at that moment that these letters formed only one link in the great chain of evidence, and I threw them in for the purpose of apprising the country of what was going forward, not from any personal attack on any man or set of men. I never heard of the two gentlemen in question until the letters were brought to me; and I only knew of them then through the letters and through Indiana officers in the Army.

Throughout the army of the Cumberland these two gentlemen are believed to have been in sympathy and correspondence with the rebels. I am told that the same belief has long been shared by their fellow-citizens at home. If the gentleman [Mr. VORHEES] proves to the country that they were not, he will not merely disabuse the public mind of what I have here said, but will do a far greater service to his two friends by disabusing the army of the West of the opinion which it has entertained from many mouths. I yesterday received a letter from General Rosecrans in which he expressed his full belief in the genuineness of these letters. I say this to show that I was not alone in my belief in this matter, and that I did not act without strong corroborating evidence. In conclusion, I will say that the exculpating evidence just presented by the gentleman, [Mr. VOORHEES,] coming, as it does, through the newspaper press and not by the original written affidavits of the parties, the letters have not been; to my mind, proved forgeries. If they were I have no pride of opinion that would keep me for one moment from retracting what I had uttered in the House. But I desire first to see the original affidavits.

I take no pleasure in personal or party accusations; and it will not be a matter of regret to me, but rather of pleasure, if these men be proved free of the charges. But I am unwilling, except on the fullest evidence, to believe that a generous and patriotic young man, engaged in a most perilous and difficult enterprise in the service of his country, has done that which would greatly increase his peril and tarnish an otherwise spotless name. It is a matter of painful regret to me that his name has been made public in this connection. It was done without my knowledge, and by some unfortunate mistake. I have, however, taken means which I hope will be effectual to shield him from personal harm if he is still alive. He has not been heard from since the battle of Chickamauga, and his friends suppose him to be dead. There may yet be further developments in this matter. No one can be more willing than myself to know and declare the whole truth in the case.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the consent of the House for a few moments—not over five or ten minutes.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was put in possession of the information which I have laid before the House he would have gracefully and ingenuously retracted the statement which he made against these men. I had no doubt of it at all, especially from a conversation which he sought and had with me on this subject; and I do candidly think that if he is not convinced in his mind that the letters are forgeries he is the only man in the House who is not so convinced.

He speaks of articles published in the newspapers. I have produced but one such, the statement of Mr. Hays, and I have accompanied it with a manuscript statement of the proprietor of the hotel in which he is clerk certifying to the character of Mr. Hays, and further certifying that every fact contained in his statement as published in the Sentinel is true to his own personal knowledge.

Now, upon the subject of handwriting. The gentleman has submitted his book containing the copy of this forged letter, and I now ask the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROBINSON,] who is intimately acquainted with John G. Davis and with his handwriting, to state whether he has examined that letter, and whether it bears any similarity to the handwriting of Mr. Davis.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have seen Mr. Davis write a great number of times, have received a great many letters from him, and there is no similarity in the handwriting of the letter in this book to the handwriting of Mr. Davis—none whatever, that I can discover. There may be a very slight similarity in the signature, but upon looking over the body of the letter, it is as unlike the writing of John G. Davis as one man can write unlike another. Mr. Davis writes a round, bold hand, utterly dissimilar to that of this letter in every respect.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will now ask Judge HOLMAN, if he is in the House, whether he has examined that letter, and whether it bears any resemblance to the handwriting of Mr. Davis. I am told that my colleague is not in the Hall.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have submitted my proofs on this question of forgery. I shall bid it farewell, perhaps forever, leaving the House and the public to form their own judgment of the sufficiency of the evidence which I have presented.

I confess to a feeling of disappointment with the course pursued by the gentleman from Ohio. He says he is not yet convinced that these letters are forgeries. I apprehend the House as well as the country are convinced of that fact, as even the entire newspaper press of his own party in the western country, so far as I have seen, admit that they are palpable forgeries.

And now, sir, in view of the course of the gentleman from Ohio, I am constrained to say what I regret, for I did not wish to utter anything personally offensive, that hereafter whoever undertakes to hold up this exploded calumny, this detestable forgery as genuine, whether the gentleman from Ohio, or any one else, he will wear the brand of a forger and calumniator himself. That is all I have to say.

REBELLIOUS STATES.

The House then resumed, as a special order, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 244) to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government, on which Mr. Cox was entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, my heart's desire and prayer to God is for peace and union to this distracted land. While urging undiminished and increased exertions by our Army and Navy to secure union, I have been ever ready to heal the wounds and check the ravages of war by all rational methods used among civilized nations. To those who can entertain but one idea at a time this position has seemed inconsistent; but to those who have read history it will appear that war is made for peace, and that to consummate peace in the midst of war, and to restore harmony in civil or international conflict, negotiation and friendliness are indispensable.

During the long and anxious years I have served here—from almost a youth to almost middle age—I have never failed to warn against the great crisis of force which came in 1861. These auguries have been unhappily too fully fulfilled. What could be done by an humble Representative to avert this strife, that I did. My constituents know this; and I might be content to leave this arena, conscious of their approbation for duty done. Since this war began I have sought but found no place for compromise in the dominant party. Hence I have mournfully though constantly, by vote and voice, upheld the sword, lest even a worse alternative—eternal separation and prolonged strife—should be our fate. The miseries which this war has entailed have not been the work of the northern Democracy; and if disunion comes through the open doors of Janus, if recognition of southern independence comes through war or its disasters, the Democracy are not responsible for the odium, and with my word and aid shall never be held responsible. Those who are swift to recognize southern independence may do so; but by all the memories of our conflicts with secession and abolition, I will never, never be counted among those who have aided in the dismemberment of the Republic.

Would that I could see in our present policy a gleam of hope for our future. How gladly would I hail it! But until that policy is reversed all our future is shrouded. Like my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] whose dirge-like speech still haunts my memory, I see in the continuance of the present misrule only the throes of this giant nation, writhing in the despair of dissolution. The bloody sweat, the feverish pulse, the delirious raving, and the muscular agony go before that prostration which "Death, the skeleton, and Time, the shadow," have consummated for all republics which have, in evil hours, yielded the scepter of the people to the grasp of passion and the greed of power. The eloquent requiem which my friend pronounced, sounding like the wail of the bereaved among the tombs of the dead, should, if heeded, teach us, before too late, how beyond all price is the boon which is passing from us forever. He finds hope in autumn, for the spring will bring its bloom; hope in the storm, for the cloud will pass and the sun shine again; but no hope in the grave of our Republic—none, none for our dying Republic. Mr. Speaker, sadly as his thoughts have impressed me, I can yet see some hope for our nation; for I believe in the success of Democracy, the immortality of civilization, and the grace of the Christian religion. While to him the future is black with a pall, I look beyond his prospect of the hearse and the tomb, the mourners and the darkened window, to the resurrection! The grave shall lose its sting and death its victory. The mourner shall be comforted. The light of a better dawn shall enter into the darkened chamber. I, too, go to holy writ as he did, but I go for the purpose of cheer and not of despondency, for I read there that "good tidings shall bind up the broken-hearted, and to them that mourn in Zion, give unto them beauty for ashes, and the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for heaviness." "And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and the garden causeth things that are sown in it to spring forth." "Go through, go through the gates, prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; lift up a standard for the PEOPLE."

Sir, that standard for the people shall be high advanced! My friend himself will bear it to the West. In the honest yeomanry of the Mississippi valley, and in the eternal principles of constitutional Democracy and regulated freedom, do I read a more cheering horoscope! I will not, do not, and cannot despair. I would rather die in my simple faith in popular intelligence and republican institutions than yield my heart to the sadness which freights each passing hour with its gloom. There is one hope left. If the bayonet shall be unfixed at our polls, if no persuasive appliances of money shall attain an honest election, I do not despair of a verdict in favor of that party whose principles I have loved for their national history and unsectional spirit.

Fond as I am of historic research, I cannot follow my friend in mourning over the dust of departed empire. I read in the decline and fall of republican governments lessons of wisdom and hope for our own guidance. In the remarks which I shall submit I propose to show from history how statesmanship has saved the falling columns of constitutional liberty, how the victories of war have been crowned by the more renowned, important, and difficult victories of peace, and how allegiance has been rekindled by the sweet breath of kindness fanning the almost dying embers of patriotism.

This may seem like a thankless and useless task, in view of the convulsions and prejudices of the hour, but the issue to be presented next November demands such an exposition. That issue is, shall freedom, peace, and Union be restored by a change of rulers and policy, or shall we set aside the teachings of the past, and permit the work of disintegration and ruin to go on?

The Executive has proposed an amnesty. I would not turn away from its contemplation. As each day may offer the chance of conciliation, I welcome any sign of peace, though the bow of promise be dim and unsubstantial, and though it be wreathed over the very cataract of our national doom!

The message of the President should be welcomed, not so much for what it is as for what it pretends to be. It is his first adventure beyond the line of force into the field of conciliation. As his former policy showed a will to change and crush civil relations by the iron hand, so the present policy is but its continuance; for he only draws over the mailed hand a silken though transparent glove. His plan is the will of the commander, while pretending to be the wisdom of the civilian. The war power, as illustrated by the Administration, has no more foundation in our Government than this peace power, assuming to pardon crime without conviction, and revivify dead States which are indestructible. But duty demands a thorough sifting of this pretentious amnesty. The Democratic party have worn the stigma, as it has been deemed, of leaning too much toward conciliation. Our gravest fault has been that we are suspected somewhat of having read the Sermon on the Mount, and that we have believed in the gentleness and effectiveness of our religion. Even such Democrats as have favored the superaddition of clemency to the enginery of war as a means of reunion have been ostracized, while those who have found no elements of union save in affection without coercion have been imprisoned and exiled. It would be ungracious in us, therefore, to dismiss even this semblance of pacification without examination. Let us examine it in the light of history. If it be right it shall not be rejected because it comes from a President not in our favor. If it sound hollow, if it be the Trojan horse, full of armed men, ready to surprise the citadel of our Constitution, let us drag its insidious features to the light for condemnation.

To test the genuineness of this amnesty: five months have gone, but we see no signs of thousands of southern citizens rushing to embrace this amnesty. Indeed, it is conceded that the rebellion is now more formidable than ever. Unlike the acts of grace granted by kings to their recalcitrant subjects, of which history is full, there is no general taking of the oath, no genuine movement toward the restoration of the seceded States, but a fiercer spirit of resistance, produced by the unwise and exasperating policy of the Executive. The President's plan has been widely published in the papers South, as the Richmond Sentinel says, to "animate their popular patriotism." The forgiveness offered by the President is deemed a mockery and its terms an insult. What a delusion to hold out such a Dead sea apple—ashes to the lip, and hardly fruit to the eye. How many people in the North would take an oath to support those negro policies of the past two years? I never, never would. I would as soon think of swearing allegiance to secession. I would as soon tie my soul to the body of death. And can you expect the southern people in their present temper, saddened by loss and irate with revenge, to do what our constituents—one million and a half of northern voters—would scorn us for doing? There could have been no hope of a returning South by such a plan. It is an amnesty which is a juggle, for it pleases no one who is to be reached. It is based on a proclamation which is a delusion, for no one was freed by it whom our armies had not enfranchised. It is the old unsoundness, newly daubed with untempered mortar.

There is one chief defect in the President's plan. It is the structure built upon his proclamation of emancipation. The same defect is observable in the bill of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.] That, too, is based upon the one-tenth system and the policy of forced emancipation. He proposes to "guaranty to certain States, whose governments have been usurped or overthrown, a republican form of government." This is the title of his bill. I deny, first, that these State governments are overthrown; and second, that his plan substitutes a republican form. His plan is to appoint provisional brigadier governors who are to be charged with the civil administration until a State government shall be recognized as his bill provides. He requires an oath to the Constitution to be taken, which is very well; but by whom? By one tenth of the people. They shall be sufficient to construct a new State, whose republican form of government is already dictated to them by the bill of the gentleman from Maryland. They "shall" abolish slavery. Then the other steps are to be taken, and the new republican State is to be recognized.

In some of its features this bill is an improvement upon the rickety establishment proposed by the President; but it is obnoxious to the same objection. It is a usurpation of the sovereignty of the people by the Federal functionaries, and it regards the old States as forever destroyed.

The plans proposed are objectionable, because of the mode of construction and the kind of fabric to be rebuilt. As the emancipation proclamation, or the emancipation act of the gentleman, can never be reconciled with the normal control of the States over their domestic institutions, so all oaths to sustain the same are oaths to subvert the old governments, Federal and State. The oath required, both of loyal and disloyal men in the South, is an oath of infidelity to the very genius of our federative system, for it is an oath to aid anarchy, and out of anarchy create a "new nation!" It receives no countenance from those who are wedded to the Constitution as it is and the States as they were; but it lifts the hand to God in attestation of a design to subvert both! The President's plan, therefore, whether intended or not, is an oath to encourage treason, and the plan of the gentleman from Maryland is a plan to consummate revolution.

By no state of war, by no act of secession, by no military power, by no possible or actual condition, can this change in our policy be allowed without a total subversion of our Government, and without breaking down the principle of permanence and reinstating a new and worse revolution. Who is there to deny the "normal supremacy of the States over their domestic affairs?" Is it the jurist? I refer him to repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, and of every other respectable authority in the jurisprudence of America. Is it the historian? I refer him to the debates of the Constitutional Convention and the history of our States, both the original thirteen and those afterwards admitted. Is it the diplomatist? I refer him to Mr. Seward's dispatch, wherein he says:

"The rights of the States and the condition of every human being in them will remain precisely the same, whether the revolution shall succeed or whether it shall fail. In one case the States would be federally connected with the new confederacy; in the other they would, as now, be members of the United States; but their constitutions and laws, customs, habits, and institutions, in either case, will remain the same."

Is it an old line Whig? I refer him to Henry Clay, who held that to break down the incontestable power of the State over its own institutions was to break down both Federal and State constitutions, and, beneath their ruin, to bury forever the liberty of both white and black races. Is it a Democrat? Read your platforms for thirty years and learn again the language of Jefferson and Madison and the practical teachings of Douglas in his great contest for extending popular sovereignty over domestic matters from the States to the Territories. Is it a Republican? I refer him to the Chicago platform, which resolves that "the maintenance, inviolate, of the rights of the States, and especially the rights of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends." Is it the members of the last Congress? I refer them to the Crittenden resolution, as to the rights, dignity, and equality of the States. Is it you, Mr. Speaker, the exponent of the will of this body? I refer you to the resolution you voted: "That neither the Federal Government nor the people, nor the governments of non-slaveholding States, have a purpose or a constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the States of the Union." Is it the President himself? Oh! shameful treachery. Shame to himself and treachery to the trusting! Shall I recall his repeated sayings by proclamation, calling on soldiers to peril their lives, or by message, giving us his solemn convictions of duty? Shall I refer to his message wherein he repudiated the idea of disturbing the system of slavery, as foreign to his inclination and his duty, or to his direction to Mr. Seward to inform foreign Powers that any effort to disturb that system "on his part would be unconstitutional?" Is it the philosophic thinker? I refer him to the exposition of M. De Tocqueville, (vol. I, page 69,) who, better than any one abroad, has examined the complex nature of our Government, beginning with the township and rising through many grades to the Federal authority, and who found here, "two governments, completely separate and almost independent—the one fulfilling the ordinary duties and responding to the daily and indefinite calls of a community, the other circumscribed within certain limits, and only exercising an exceptional authority over the general interests of the country."

These expressions were irrespective of peace or war. The independent spheres of national and State governments were ever regarded in words, if not in acts, by the very party in power; and now their test of loyalty is an oath to forswear their own oaths! Now their touchstone of patriotism is an oath to commit political turpitude! And this is called an amnesty! This oath which is to be taken at once by loyal and disloyal men is to be the sweet oblivious balm over past crime by a clement Executive! This battering down of the Constitution is to be the Aladdin witchery which in a night is to reconstruct a "perpetual cosmos of beauty and power out of the chaos of civil conflict." Because we do not shout hosannas to this new cosmos Democrats are reproached as favoring slavery. No, sir. We do not like slavery. For one, I say again as I have said before, let it die, if die it must, not by the rough usages of war, not by the starvation, miscegenation, or extirpation of the black race, not by the strangulation of State and popular sovereignty, but by the voluntary and legal action of the States when they are in a condition freely to express their choice. Why use the sentiment against slavery to crush out the fundamental principles of our Government? Why, in striving to destroy slavery, drag down the pillars of the Constitution? When to kill slavery you destroy the "balance of powers on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends," I must and will denounce you. How many expressions from the other side of the Chamber have I been called upon to denounce because they urge the abandonment of our old and rare political fabric. These expressions are all impeared by an exquisite thinker of the radical school, Senator GRATZ BROWN, when he says:

"Who cares for the Union of the past—a Union fraught with seeds of destruction—bitter with humiliations and disappointments? Who believes in the grief of these hired mourners, so lachrymose before the world? They are not even self-deceived. It is likewise with reconstructions—a free masonry that imagines it has only blocks and stones to deal with, or a child's play, that would build up as they have tumbled down its card-castles, putting affably the court cards on top again. Foolish craftsmen, seeing not that it is the life arteries and the veins and the sinews of a nation's being that are dealt with, and that it must be regeneration or death."

The Union thus dismissed with so much scorn is the same Union which Lord Brougham called (Political Philosophy, part 3, page 336) "the very greatest refinement in social policy to which any state of circumstances had ever given rise or to which any age has ever given birth;" which deserved his eulogy, because, as he held, there was in it "the means for keeping its integrity as a Federacy, by the maintenance of the rights and powers of the individual States."

The Union as it should be—the Union of the wise craftsmen of to-day, and not of the foolish fathers who made it—is not the Union I have learned to admire and loved to cherish; not the Union which, for the past seven years, I have pleaded here to maintain without blood and perpetuate without peril.

These plans of regeneration involve a change in the structure of the Government. They break down the spirit of municipal independence, in destroying which, as De Tocqueville has shown, you destroy the spirit of liberty. No matter what form is left, the despotic tendency will inevitably appear when the local authority is usurped. If you leave any form of government, it is the will of the Executive, it is a despotic centralization: Russian, Asiatic, the rule of military bashaws or provincial kinglets. Whether appointed by Congress or the President they hold their power from Washington, and they must remain at the head of their troops, and at the call of their chief. Our Republic, then, deserves not its name. It is no longer the "United States." It is a united State, a geographical unit, holding together subject provinces by the brute force of petty tyrants.

Believing that the scope and aim of the proclamation will not restore the Union nor propitiate any portion of the South, except demagogues and hirelings, who sell their birthright for the price of power, let us inquire what motive could have induced the President to proclaim it, in a moment of success to our arms and depression to the South. One suggestion will satisfy as to the motive. I am sorry to believe it; but the President desires renomination. He is a man whose mind has every angle but the right angle. In his nature cunning contends with fanaticism. From the time he developed his irrepressible conflict doctrine, so much praised by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] until its latest expression in his last message, his course has been equivocal. But meanwhile how shrewdly he has balanced between the factions of his party. His inaugural recognized his obligations to the Constitution. He would not interfere with slavery. How prodigal were his promises to the border. How quick to plant his foot on Phelps, Hunter, and Frémont, for playing Augustulus. He desired some day to play Augustus. Abolitionism should be hatched under no influences but his own. How he lectured one of his editors for impatience. Conservatives held up his hands while he prevailed against these radicals. He toyed with emigration, colonization, and compensation schemes. He made a gradual emancipation theory with a short fuse which soon exploded. It hurt no one. But the time came for him to play revolutionist; and with seeming reluctance he issued the proclamation of emancipation. He desired the people to pass on it. They did. They condemned it in 1862. He adhered to it. In his Springfield letter and in his late message he dedicates all power to its execution. Meanwhile, a contest springs up as to the State suicide doctrine. It divides his party, and even the Cabinet. He has Missouri on his hands. Radicals are rampant. He acts conservative awhile until the days of November, 1864, begin to approach, then lo! this message as the climax of his long series of ambiguities. That I may do the President no injustice, I quote from his own partisan, Senator POMEROY, in his circular, who says:

"The people have lost all confidence in Mr. Lincoln's ability to suppress the rebellion and restore the Union. He has been weak and vacillating, wasteful of national blood and treasure, profligate and corrupt."

There is only one solution for these inconsistencies. He is trying to please both wings of his party to secure his nomination. With dexterous chicanery he has phrased and framed his late plan so that it may admit of two voices. He will not give up his emancipation proclamation or the confiscation and penal laws. "To abandon them now," he says, "would be not only to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and an astounding breach of faith." This should suit the radicals. For a lighter shade of his party he promises what is a mere delusion—an adjudication of the questions of their legality by the Supreme Court. True, he has declared all means like these which he now promulgates unconstitutional; yet he would submit them to the court! When, and how? Why, after he has made the slave a freedman by the sword! What a mockery is such a submission. But it will do to make him a candidate, and, more than that, it might elect him President. If his plan of making one tenth rule in the States should succeed, then he will have ready at hand the electoral votes of Florida, Arkansas, Louisiana, Tennessee, North Carolina, and other States. He began this business in Florida the other day, and the blood which flowed at Olustee is the result of this scheme of personal ambition!

Nine States, without South Carolina, representing 679,310 voters in 1860, will now, by this peculiar republican form of reconstruction, cast electoral votes for the 67,931, who, as one tenth, are to be registered. How many of these will be stipendiaries, or how many bona fide citizens of the States? But, surely a candidate with so fair a chance for a gigantic, almost a continental fraud as this, must commend himself to a party whose use of power has made a debt of $2,000,000,000 and an expenditure equal to the expenditure of all former Administrations. Hence, when this amnesty to rebels was announced, it was regarded as a political movement only, and the excitement did not equal that of a prize fight. No one was affected by it. No opponent was changed to, and no friend alienated from, the Administration, either North or South. If it had been an act of good faith and not a partisan maneuver, it ought to have bound closer to the Administration every friend, and challenged the admiration of every opponent. The bells should have been rung, the bonfires blazed, and huzzas have rent the air, as the throb of hope pulsed through the fevered veins of our nation. No such thing. It was nothing but a bold attempt to perpetuate power, at the hazard of revolutionary war in the North and protracted war in the South. For as surely as the great States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Northwest are overborne by the coalition of these bastard States and rotten boroughs South, with New England abolition, so surely will the tocsin of inevitable necessity sound the alarm of resistance throughout the land. The people may sleep now, drugged by the opiate of temporary prosperity, but the excitement of the presidential election will stir to its very depth the popular disaffection, and in wild saturnalia the vessel of our hopes may founder forever in a sea of blood.

The pretense of the President is to reconstruct the Union. Where did he get his authority to build anew what we can never agree has been destroyed? Is it a part of the war power or the pardoning power? It is the "best mode the Executive can suggest, with his present impressions." Will any one point out the clause of the Constitution which would even create an "impression" that the Executive has the function either of lawgiver, State constructor, or supreme dictator? His meekness in referring to Congress and the judiciary the legality of his acts after they are accomplished is a piece of effrontery to which Louis Napoleon has not yet arrived. Where did this unfledged Cæsar get his warrant to create sovereignty?

In discussing this plan it would be sufficient, without questioning the right of the President to construct States on condition or pardon on terms, simply to discuss whether the conditions and terms are wise, practical, and likely to do good. But I propose somewhat in detail to discuss the President's plan, in the following order:

1st, the oath; 2d, the republican form of the government to be reconstructed; 3d, the question whether the State governments in the rebel States are vital; 4th, some wise and practical plan such as will aid in restoring the Union under the Constitution.

1. The oath.—There is a sort of odium historicum attached to all political test oaths. They are not original with the President. They have been the bane and foil of good government ever since bigotry began and revenge ruled. You cannot make eight million people, nearly all in revolt at what they regard as the detestable usurpations of abolition, forswear their hatred to abolition. You force by this oath the freed negro into the very nostrils of the southern man, whose submission to law you seek.

The conditions of the pardon only inflame and do not quench rebellion. The rebellion was in such a state when the amnesty was offered that it was a golden opportunity for magnanimous statesmanship to proffer generous terms. An amnesty based on another kind of oath (if oaths you would have that Heaven would not record as perjury) might avail. I mean an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and all laws made in pursuance thereof! But what does this amnesty in fact say? To all citizens South, whether loyal or disloyal, it proclaims that one tenth of the voters of 1861, and "excluding all others," shall reestablish a State government, which shall be republican and in nowise contravening said oath; that such establishment "shall be recognized as the true government of the State," which is to be considered republican in form under the Constitution.

The abolition oath is the basis of the new republican form of government. All who do not agree to that are excluded. All who do not agree to the pestilent theory of State death are also excluded. Hence this plan would allow any recent rebel who takes the oath to make a unit in the one tenth, and excludes the Union man, who has not forsworn his faith in the vitality of the States, and who will not swear to support policies and laws to which he can never adhere. What becomes of the many thousand loyal men of Tennessee, of Texas, of North Carolina, of Arkansas, of Louisiana? They are set aside for those whose oaths will bind them long enough to vote, and who, to save their lives and property, will swear with facility. The oath is tendered to men of patriotic probity, who will and ought to spurn the test oath of the traitor. Going upon the doctrine that all the rebellious districts are unsound, assuming the ground that the territory South, being belligerent, outlaws all, whether loyal or not, the President applies this bitter cup to the Union men who have never flinched in their love for the flag. The men who have stood the brunt of this red tempest, whose homes have been blackened by fire, and whose families have been destroyed by sword, whose ties of natural affection toward brothers and sons in the rebel army never made them swerve in their patriotic devotion; who have even withstood the fear of death and destruction, and in spite of the treachery and unkindness of this Administration have kept the standard of stars high advanced amid swamps and caves and mountains, these men must quaff the cup of bitter waters before they can stand before the world as the builders of the new temple proposed by the President! If they were worthy of association in this great cohort of States they would scorn reëfranchisement by such a plan. If there were no other reason to reject this juggling scheme, justice to "the faithful found among the faithless" South would demand its rejection.

II. As to the republican form of government to be made by this plan. Republicanism is founded on the will of the people. How does the plan work out this will? Suppose Tennessee to-morrow should register one tenth of her 145,348 voters in 1860, namely, 14,534. They make an anti-slavery constitution; a majority of the 14,534 adopt, to wit, 7,268 citizens. They may have all been rebels; no matter. They may the day after the constitution is adopted change its free clause into a slavery clause, or the State into rebellion again; no matter. There may remain 130,804 voters who do not agree to the constitution, who took no part in its manufacture. They may be mixed of Union and rebel proclivities. They, however, seek to return to their old allegiance. The spirit of Jackson and the fire of patriotism illumine their wasted hearthstones, and they—the nine tenths—agree to restore the old constitution of Tennessee under the Federal Constitution as it is; or they may even abolish, as they have the right, slavery in their midst; yet the President binds himself to hold them in forced submission to the 14,534, or its majority!

The truth is, a test oath to require citizens to support his policy as to slaves is not an oath of allegiance to republican government, but to the Republican party. It is an oath of fealty to Abraham Lincoln. He sends out heralds to proclaim: "Ho! ye; all who will prepare to forswear your sentiments and enter into an arrangement to make new States with one tenth over nine tenths, and thus form electoral colleges to vote for me, I swear by my Army and Navy, that you, though you are pardoned criminals, shall be the corner-stones in the new State, and shall have the shield of the Executive and the protection of this flag!" In vain we search Spanish American annals for so shameless a pronouncement for revolution and anarchy. It is thus, Mr. Speaker, that your party seeks to unhinge the massive portals which lead within the chambers of reserved popular power, those doors which for so many years, on golden hinges turning, opened so readily to the States as they entered within the sacred adytum of our political faith.

There is one answer to these propositions always on the lip of the anti-slavery devotee. He holds that no slave State can be accounted republican. This would be news, indeed, to the Jeffersons, Washingtons, Madisons, and Adamses, who established these States as republican, twelve out of thirteen being slave at the outset. This would be news, indeed, to the pioneers of the Northwest, to the early settlers of Ohio, who remember the deed of cession of Virginia, whereby our sovereignty was forever declared to be equal to and inviolate as that of the slave State of Virginia!

But what sort of republicanism is that which builds a State from a small minority of its people? The majority of a people, expressing its own will, forms a republic. A minority, or even a majority, following the will of a despot, forms a monarchy. One tenth of the legal voters ruling nine tenths is an oligarchy. Reconstruction of republican governments on such a basis is as absurd as the structures built by the architects in Gulliver, who began their houses at the roof in the air! The President quotes the guaranty of the Constitution as to republican State governments, and promises under its sanction protection to these pseudo-republics! But he forgets that if the southern States are deceased, or out of the Union, there is the third section of article fourth of the Constitution, which provides for the admission of States. Does the President in his theory propose to disregard this clause? Unless Congress consent, all these scaffoldings, erected by his own will, will tumble to naught. If States can be declared dead, or burned out by the fires of war, perhaps New England may some day find her theory come home, in a reconstruction of her six States into one, and the reduction of her twelve Senators into two! Lines of longitude, as well as of latitude, may sometimes reconstruct States.

The basis of our Federal Government is States, having constitutions and laws—the emanation of the popular will. This will is expressed through suffrage. This suffrage in States is regulated by their own constitution and laws. State voters thus qualified, and they only, can vote for members of Congress. When, therefore, the President undertakes to breathe into a State the breath of life by a new code of suffrage, even if the State were defunct, he usurps a power never granted, and a sovereignty belonging solely to the people. If these States in rebellion are destroyed—if the tubula rasa remains, upon which the President can write new constitutions, with new qualifications for voters—then secession and revolution have done legally what no one but a rebel or traitor ever believed could be done.

III. This brings me to the radical question of the day. The message of the President and the bill of the gentleman from Maryland assume that the State governments in the rebel States are out of existence or usurped, and that the territory should be governed as such by the United States until new State governments shall be formed. The President does not commit himself to this plan as the only one. "Saying one thing, he does not mean to say that he would not say another." Very well. But one thing he has assumed—that the old States are gone. But let us do him justice. He suggests that on "reconstructing a loyal State government in any State, the name of the State, the boundary, the subdivisions, &c., may be maintained," provided always the abolition policy prevail. This is like the prescript of the old Sultan, who in commanding an obnoxious vizier to be ensnaked and thrown into the Bosphorus, generously hoped his turban and clothes might remain unmoistened.

I know it is said that he repudiates the policy of reducing the States to Territories. His plan is to select, as nearly as may be, the old building spot; perhaps use some of the old foundations, say one tenth; but he changes radically the plan and structure of the building, and takes away from its lord the sovereign control of the establishment. He insists that there shall be homogeneity of arrangement in the structure; that for different conditions, classes, systems, climate, and position, the same relations shall be instituted. This plan is not only absurd in philosophy, unsound in economy, but revolutionary in practice. He in fact says, "I shall fight on to keep the southern States out until they conform to my views as to negroes. My abolition condition to Union is inexorable! The proclamation shall be on a par with the Constitution. Let no one bleed for one without dying for the other!" God help the nation, plunged in an abyss of blood, for such crudities!

Surely if the State suicide doctrine be sound this plan of rebuilding is not. Let me consider that State suicide doctrine. It professes to be based on the decision of the Supreme Court in the Hiwatha case. That decision is perverted to sustain this theory. The court condemned certain property captured, because the property was within the lines of the enemy actually holding those lines by force, though without right, and not because of the moral or political relation of the owner. The court decided nothing as to the legal and political status of the owner, but because the property would help the enemy it was to be taken as prize of war. There is in that decision no recognition of the right of secession, much less of the monstrous and cruel doctrine that rebels in arms can abolish the legal rights of loyal men or the institutions of States.

If war blots out the States insurgent by virtue of its territorial and belligerent character, then war does by its violence what secession would do by its ordinances. The right to expunge a State is coordinate with the right to secede. If a State can be forced out by the vote of its own sovereignty or by combinations of men without a constitutional amendment, then any State can be expelled by Federal action. If the Union becomes disagreeable to a State then the State may become disagreeable to the Union; and if a State may retire at pleasure why cannot a State be repudiated at will? These rights, if they exist, which I deny, correlate. They are inseparable. Suppose it had been proposed to expel South Carolina from the Union for her contumacy, or Massachusetts for her intermeddling, what a burst of indignation we should have had from each! They would have exclaimed, "Show us the power to throttle our State sovereignty by denying us participation in this blessed Union. What! strip us of our American citizenship, place us outside of your navigation and commercial laws and treaties; leave us at the mercy of foreign Powers; belittle us to nothing; rob us of our common interests in a common treasure, territory, government, history, and glory. Never!" Yet wherein does this claim of holding these States South as conquered provinces by military force, degrading the equal dignity of the States by the creation of a new sovereign power, differ in principle from secession?

If secession be a nullity, and if the Constitution is not impaired nor the rights of the States destroyed, then I can see how arms, inspired by wise and persuasive measures, may in time redeem the States; but on the other theory, all the tears, miseries, confiscations, and blood are in vain, in vain, in vain. Can we be surprised, therefore, that an analytic mind like that of the Postmaster General should have at once descried in these fallacies of abolition a conspiracy in aid of the rebellion?

IV. I now propose to apply the lessons of history, by inquiring whether, even admitting all these plans to be legal, and even if decided to be so, some wiser, better, and more practicable plan may not be adopted. Is there no amnesty, no accommodation possible? There is. I believe that the restoration of the Union is possible if we pursue a proper policy. The restoration of the Union as it was is only impossible to those who, for other objects, do not desire it. The reconciliation of all the States is possible, nay, probable, with the restoration of the doctrine of local self-government and State sovereignty on matters not delegated to the Federal Government. I know no other hope. If this fail, all is dark and chaotic. Diversity of interests and systems find their unity alone in this system of laissez faire to the States.

How, then, is it possible to restore local and State sovereignty and thus unite our hapless and lacerated country? History never presented so grand a problem for statesmanship. I approach it with something of that awe which solemnizes the soul when we enter within some vast and consecrated fabric—vistas and aisles of thought opening on every side, pillars and niches and cells within cells, mixing in seeming confusion, but all really in harmony, and rich with a light streaming through the dim forms of the past, and blessed with an effluence from God, though dimmed and half lost in the contaminated reason and passion of man.

Conscious of the magnitude of this rebellion, and oppressed with the feebleness of the policy directed against it, I still believe in the restoration of the old Union. Hence, whatever method I should advocate for the conduct of the war, or the celebration of peace, I am forever concluded against one conclusion, the independence of the South. I believe the principle of unity to be absolutely superior to the right of sectional nationality. The destiny of these United States is to continue united, and, perhaps, to add other States, until the whole continent is in alliance. Our fate is to expand and not to contract our influence or our limits. All other notions are but transitory and evanescent.

I am happy to be in accord with the President, if indeed he holds yet to the doctrine announced in his inaugural: "Physically speaking, we cannot separate." I had adopted the same sentiment, that there were Union foundations, by the very political geology of God, upon which the old

Union could and would be rebuilt. In his first message the President held:

"The two sections could not remove from each other, nor build an impassable wall between them; that intercourse, amicable or hostile, must continue. Is it possible, then, to make that intercourse more advantageous, or more satisfactory, after separation than before? Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws? Can treaties be more faithfully enforced between aliens than laws can among friends? Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when, after much loss on both sides and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you."

These sentiments are founded in principle, and drawn by correct deductions from history. They are the germ of all true politics. Sorry am I that in a moment of pressure and temptation he should have been drawn from them by the weird whisperings of ambition under the baleful eclipse of fanaticism.

The argument from physical, and therefore from economic reasons, for the perpetuity of the Union, is powerful. But history and the experience of other nations show that the dissolution of the old Union might consist with a different kind of unity. Any Union which would leave trade free and locomotion unrestricted between the States, North and South, interior and exterior, would answer the mere physical and economic objects of union. It is well known that Judge Douglas contemplated as among the possibilities an American Zollverein, which would have secured unity of territory for commercial purposes. In an essay, which he said had cost him more labor than any work of his life, and which death prevented him from giving to his countrymen, he ascribed our situation to the aggressive spirit of abolitionism, and held that for the present nothing but a commercial union, founded upon the plan of the States of Germany, would be practicable to sustain those influences which made the United States the happiest and most prosperous of nations. But he only contemplated it as an initial point from which he would, through common interests and kindness, move on to a more intimate Union until in time the Union as it was might again be restored in its primitive fullness and glory. (Speech of Hon. Henry May, February 2, 1863—Globe, third session Thirty-Seventh Congress, p. 687.)

Something more than physical boundaries and commercial reasons must exist to make that old Union possible. The President understands it, without giving it full emphasis, when he says, "Friends make laws," and the "identical old questions as to terms of intercourse" remain after fighting. Fighting may do much, it may be admitted; exhaustion, calamities, and bloodshed may make it the interest of men to coalesce to avoid such horrors; but what can produce in a people the idem sententiam de republica? Can that be forced? If not, what will you add, to and after force, to inspire the common sentiment which we call patriotism?

Many sad and harsh experiences may be ours before that event. Military rule, anarchy, destruction of individual opinion, speech, and liberty; all these may be in the path of the old or of another polity. These will be our experiences, unless we take the straight, short, and right line of the Constitution. We may wander forty years in a political wilderness before we attain the promise of our youthful and exultant nationality.

Before attempting to show how this nationality may be restored, it would be best to define it. What then is nationality? Let the definition of the English logician, John Stuart Mill, answer: "We mean a principle of sympathy, not of hostility; of union, not of separation. We mean a feeling of common interest among those who live under the same Government, and are contained within the same natural or historical boundaries. We mean that one part of the community shall not consider themselves as foreigners with regard to another part; that they shall cherish the tie which holds them together; shall feel that they are one people; that their lot is cast together; that evil to any of their fellow-countrymen is evil to themselves; and that they cannot selfishly free themselves from their share of any common inconvenience by severing the connection."

Is it not strange to a dispassionate thinker that those who are not hostile in the sense of hate to the South, those who would woo them to the ancient order and Union by reason, old associations, the allurements of peace and patriotism, to make again of the circle of equal States the old Federal sovereignty, should be held to be the least national; while those who have so far forgotten the common interest of all under the same Government, who regard themselves as alien to the South, even as the South regard themselves as alien to us, should be held as the most national? I do proclaim it, on the basis of a logic incontestable, that he among us who wishes most evil to any part of the country is THE MORAL TRAITOR AND SOCIAL ANARCH. They, too, who would selfishly free themselves from their share of any common inconvenience by severing the connection, like those of the South, are also enemies to the whole country. What can we think of his national feeling who would so disregard the interest of one half of his own country as to wish to see it utterly erased by war, a tabula rasa; its cotton crop and other exports, worth $200,000,000 annually, which is required as the basis of our commerce and for the payment of our debts, and which gave the nation the advantage of the world, entirely ruined or transferred to other and alien hands; its laborers colonized in tropical lands to benefit foreigners or suddenly freed without benefit to themselves or to the superior race, and its very statehood blotted out, because of the sedition of its people!

We are powerful in proportion as we are national. If we should follow the advice of passion and treat the southern States now in civil war as England treated Ireland, we become weak and denationalized. If we pursue the South with a licentious uncivil soldiery, gloating with anticipations of the plunder of private effects, or with the promises already held out of parceling out the lands of the South as the bounty which revenge pays for pillage, thus whetting a tigerish appetite for a great festival of blood and rapine, we may be sure that the special Nemesis which Herodotus traced through the early eras of history will haunt the men who instigate and the men who execute such a fell and imbecile policy. If, as in Rome once and in Spanish America now, we bribe one part of the nation by the robbery of another portion, then we may be sure that conflicts will be renewed when exhaustion is overcome, and our flag, like that of old Spain, will typify a river of blood between margins of gold. If we would avoid the constant aggregation and disintegration of feeble masses in different provinces, such as the history of South America demonstrates, we must learn to carry out, better than the President has done, his own principle of friendly legislation, instead of repellant alienation. Powerful as are our armies—gradually encroaching amidst many mistakes and vicissitudes upon the territory which is insurgent—great as are our Parrott guns, and invulnerable as are our iron-clads, one thing we have to learn yet from history, that our best soldiers are not like Charlemagne's paladins, possessed of enchanted weapons. The weapon which wounds the cause of rebellion, and yet which can transmute the rebel into the patriot, is the enchantment of friendship. He who would destroy a part of his own country, as if it were alien, has no more love for it than Saturn had for the children of his own loins whom he destroyed. Such a creature is not a patriot, even if he wore a man. Patriotism never desires to weaken or disgrace, but always to strengthen and glorify the country.

From these suggestions it will be apparent that something besides force is needed to reconcile States which are insurgent. What that something is, which I may call the philosophy of Union, can be ascertained by understanding what that element is which is the philosophy of dissolution. All disturbances of property, person, liberty, home—whether by emancipation, confiscation, extermination, or other repellant policies—can never beget confidence. No plan that debars nine tenths of a people from political privileges, and outlaws them from their own homes and rights, can renew allegiance. But such confidence and allegiance have been begotten and renewed in other lands rent with civil feuds; why not in this? To answer this, I shall consider, first, the mode by which such results can be attained, and secondly, the illustrations from history showing such results.

1. States or societies are made up of individuals. To reform society or control masses, individuals must be reached. M. Guizot, in his History of Civilization, (page 25), has demonstrated that two elements are comprised in the great fact we call civilization—the progress of society and the progress of individuals. The one is but the external phenomena of which the other is the cause. Society is merely the theater for the immortal man. Society is made for man, not man for society. Society dies, changes, rots, regrows, and decays again; man blooms in immortal youth beyond this limited destiny. When, therefore, you adopt a policy to restore States or rebuild the dismantled social order, you must begin by reaching the character of men, influencing their literature, their tastes, their maxims, their laws and institutions, their industries, their wealth and its distribution and means of attainment, their occupations, their divisions into classes, and all their relations to each other. Whenever you have harmonized these so as to give contentment, you may be assured that no military compression or civil oppression can long keep the individuals interested from a common consent to the common government.

Hence, when the philosophic statesman perceives such a civil convulsion as this which arrays the sections of America in deadly conflict, he must accompany his historic researches with the a priori reasons grounded in human nature. Thus he may construct his science of social statics and ascertain the requisites of stable political union.

One of these requisites is the habitual discipline and regard for government on the part of rulers and ruled. Let all personal impulses and conscientious convictions be subordinated to the supreme control of the proper government; resist all temptation to break through such control; and you have a tremendous element of patriotic union. Mankind naturally do not like government. Brave men are loth to submit to control. Discipline, aided by religion and a common interest, is the power which keeps men from becoming anarchical.

Combined with this civil discipline is the feeling of allegiance. Without this feeling no State can be permanent. When the rulers fail to give that protection which is the consideration and correlative of allegiance, then allegiance fails, and society declines, despotism supervenes, or foreign conquest is imposed. Let statesmen remember that this is the capital defect of our rulers, and the proximate cause of our troubles. Thus remembering, let them study history with a view to the reinstatement of that protection to labor, liberty, property, and life, which assures to the State the allegiance of the people. This feeling is sometimes called "loyalty." The French philosopher, M. Comte, has thus described it:

"This feeling may vary in its objects, and is not confined to any particular form of government; but whether in a democracy or a monarchy, its essence is always the same, viz: that there be in the constitution of the State something which is settled, something permanent, and not to be called in question; something which, by general agreement, has a right to be where it is, and to be secure against disturbance, whatever else may change."

The SACRED SOMETHING in our political system is the written Federal Constitution and the system of State governments, both having their basis on the sovereign will of the people of the States. Not less sacred, because not less above discussion, are the reserved rights of the States, and the still more important reservation of sovereignty in the people. This is the essential permanency of society in the United States. This was the relation which all parties, whether at Charleston or Chicago, agreed should not be disturbed, which the President declared should not be disturbed by him, and the fear of whose disturbance has convulsed a nation of thirty millions. This mystic union of the Federal and State systems was the sacramental essence, the divine appointment, above the storms and eddies of discussion. In this was comprehended our ancient liberties and ordinances. Even the domestic institutions of the State were imbound with it. Indeed, it was the only fundamental law, pervading our society as gravitation pervades the stellar spaces.

Those, whether North or South, who failed to keep this essence sacred and sealed, are responsible for the consequences. Abolitionism, which lived by the disturbance of this system, was like secession, for both sprang from the same direful agitation and the same disturbance of the Constitution.

But is there no light through the clouds of war? Have we no solatium for past wrongs, no immunity for future griefs? Is anger, hatred, scorn, revenge—the brood of wicked passions ranking in the heart—are these to remain? And shall there be no interregnum for the serene dynasty of peace and love, to walk together white-handed through this bleeding and bloody land? Shall no one pour the lethean wave over the scenes of death and the sorrows of mourning? Shall there be no recantation of the oaths of fierceness, vowing revenge for homes wasted, property confiscated, brethren destroyed, and cities ruined? O God! Is there no hope that even time may not be allowed to assuage the hates and griefs of this bloody era? Shall the young men of to-day wear the rancor in their hearts till their hairs are whitened for the tomb and teach their children and children's children to perpetuate the hate of the fathers? If this is to be the fate of our Union, then God has mocked His creatures by fixing them in habitations bound together by the same skies, rivers, mountains, and lakes; mocked them by fixing in their hearts the principle of love, and cruelly mocked them by sending to this star a Prince of Peace as an Exemplar and Saviour!

Who are the men, or the fiends, who talk of utter extermination? If it were possible it were execrable! To exterminate the southern people rather than reach them, as Mr. Lincoln himself proposed, by friendly laws, is a crime more heinous than rebellion. Let the pitiless destruction of the Moors of Andalusia by Philip II, the merciless slaughter of the French in La Vendée, Claverhouse's bloody hunts after the Scottish Covenanters, the stained and cadaverous cheek of Ireland, the bloodshot eye of maddened Poland, the grim submission of revengeful Venetia, teach us by their history that powder cannot cement nor bombs bear messages of love. Superadd to your force conciliation, and then your force may not be mere brute violence. Force has welded by its blows, but they were tempered in the fire of old and loving associations. "I do not fight the South because I hate her," said Mr. Crittenden; "I love her still." Conquest by force is only physical; subjugation implies mental acquiescence on the part of the vanquished in the ideas of the victor. Such a war, therefore, will produce only the status quo ante bellum, leaving an absolute-reciprocal negation; each party denying the claims of the other, and leaving no common ground for a truce to intellectual conflict.

How can we reconcile the hostilities of the people thus physically bound to live in peace and union? It is clear that if the arms of both belligerents should in a moment fall from nerveless hands there would remain to-day the same antagonism of ideas. This antagonism was reconciled on the principles of State sovereignty and local self-government as to all domestic questions, including slavery. Webster, Clay, and even Calhoun, in 1850, saw Union only in this way. Mr. Douglas, Mr. Crittenden, and even Mr. Davis and Mr. Toombs would have preserved it by the same principle in 1861. The compromises of 1861 were drawn from this source—a final adjustment of the character of all the Territory, and a complete non-intervention by Congress with the domestic relations of the Territories and of the States. This principle would have settled the difficulties. It was defeated by the action of intemperate and blood-desiring men. But the rule of right is eternal, for it is born of God. What was kind and just before the South resorted to arms is right to-day.

The fact that war has come and that separation is impossible, makes more urgent the ascendency of a party whose first and only preference is for the Union through compromise, and who shall at least be allowed to try the experiment of reconciling the States by guarantees similar to those proposed in 1861. If it be found impossible to restore the old association of States by such negotiation, then, and not till then, can statesmen begin properly to ponder the other problems connected with subjugation and recognition. I regret that anyone, especially my colleague, [Mr. LOX], should have anticipated these questions, and in his patriotic despair should have expressed his preference between the alternative of a war of subjugation and a recognition of southern independence. I regard each alternative as premature. We may yet change the war from the diabolical purposes of those in power, by changing that power to other hands, and we are not ready to sever our Union while that hope remains. Of the two evils of subjugation or recognition, I make my choice of—neither.

2d. That such restorations have been made in other lands rent by civil conflict, I proceed in the last place to show. But such restorations have never taken place in the case of an empire of independent provinces, governed by local laws, all at once absorbed or compounded into a central despotism. War cannot work such restoration; or if war, under some mighty hand, ever does it, the States disintegrate, and fall an easy prey to military will or foreign subjugation. Violence may preside at the birth of dynasties, but violence is at the death-bed. Cæsar may defy the Senate and cross the Rubicon; but Cæsar had his Brutus. The works of violence are soon changed. No juggling plan can help them to success. Order, intelligence, justice, and Providence do not consist with violence or fraud, or the results of violence and fraud.

Charlemagne with all his conquests, accomplished nothing; all his works perished with him. He was the meteor athwart the gloom of barbarism and feudality. M. Guizot has displayed his glories and triumphs, his laws and reforms. It has been said that he founded nothing. He founded all the States which sprung from the dismemberment of his empire. His empire had great temporary unity; his power and design were grand; but the disorder which sprung from his centralization of power was invincible; and all the unity of force died out with him. Where ever his terrible will did not reach in person, the local authorities ruled; and when he died, his dukes, vassals, counts, vicars, centeniers, and scabina became independent, and resolved themselves into local legislatures. His vast means of government did not give liberty nor permanency. In the letters of the intellectual "giant of those days"—Alcuin—to Charlemagne, we find the secret of Charlemagne's success. That scholar congratulates the emperor on his victories over the Huns, and gives this advice for their reconciliation: 1. "Sending among them gentle-mannered men. 2. Do not require the title of them. It is better to lose the title than to prejudice the people."

Another writer gave to Charlemagne this advice: "Mortal, always be prepared to treat mortals with mildness; the law of nature is the same for them as for thee. One sacred stream flows for them as for thee." This is the philosophy and religion of amnesty. Thus tutored, power reached the individual by its mildness, like the sun which melted the avalanche. Yet this grand empire—bathed in by a whole zone, under a prince with a diadem more brilliant than that of Alexander or Napoleon; where love on the one hand and fear on the other kept obedience; an empire which had Rome for a citadel and the door-keeper of heaven as a founder—on the death of its benignant ruler, was cleft into dismembered and bleeding fragments. What was a kingdom became a Babel of jarring feudalties. The genius of its cohesion died and the cohesion crumbled. When our Constitution—the sacred greatness of which is beyond human name—shall die, then another Guizot may record of our discordant and divergent States, what he recorded of the great empire of Charlemagne: "Power and the nation were dismembered because unity of power and the nation was impossible."

Truly there are fixed laws for the events of history. Society revolves in an orbit. The tenth century is reproduced in another era and on another hemisphere. If the principle of cohesion in our country, the Constitution, expires and the sundered States are attempted to be blotted out—lo! a central despotism for a few jarring months or years, to be followed by thirty-four or less crashing organisms! This is the perpetual cosmos of beauty and power to which America is invited by the destructives in power.

The history of man for six thousand years teaches that it is impossible to control immense regions and large masses of men under the exclusive arbitrium of one man or one central government, however wise.

The Emperor of Russia understood this in granting to Finland a free constitution and a local representative assembly; and although he fails to treat Poland with the same enlightened justice, yet in the end he will be compelled to grant her a local constitution, or bid her depart in peace. Let us con the lesson. What is the relation of Russia to Poland now, after nearly fifty years of "settlement" by the treaty of 1815? A secret government sit viewless at Warsaw. Without a cannon or a soldier visible, its power is terrible. Russian spies in vain seek for the implacable foe. Executions and confiscations are revenged by assassination and fire. Extermination is the only remedy which Russia has contemplated in her dilemma. What advantage has Russia from such a rule? Has it added to her strength, her stability, or her grandeur? The throne before which three hundred languages are spoken is powerless over a desperate people. Brute force only destroys. What revenue does she derive which is not absorbed? What can repay her for the odium of her conduct amidst civilized nations? Wherein does the new gospel of extermination in this country differ from that of the Russian policy toward Poland? At the end of thirty years we may have in the South what Russia has in Poland, only an army which the population of the South will despise and defy. We may gain the Mississippi; but where is its golden commerce? Where is its golden prosperity? Our difficulties have been great thus far in struggling to hold the military occupation and power we have attained; but our difficulties will have but begun when we begin this executive system of amnesty as an instrument to subjugate and exterminate.

The most absolute empires which the world has witnessed have been but an aggregation of provinces with the power intensely centralized. In proportion to the centralization of their power was their career brief and calamitous. Sometimes the success and ability of the ruler has given permanency and strength to the State; but, as in the case of Charlemagne, so in the case of the ancient eastern empires, the death of the ruler dismembers the realm.

The great Mesopotamian monarchy (Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. 1, page 393, et seq.) was an empire which was made up of a congeries of kingdoms. In proportion as these retained their distinct individuality, remaining as they were before their conquest—except the obligations toward the paramount authority—the empire subsisted longest. When the local governments kept their old laws, religion, line of kings, law of succession, their internal organization and machinery, only acknowledging an external suzerainty, they preserved longest their heterogeneous materials in one empire. But even in such an empire there were elements of dissolution.

These elements bear such a similarity to our own history that I shall examine them for our profit. "No sooner," says Rawlinson, "does any untoward event occur, as a disastrous expedition, a foreign attack, a domestic conspiracy, or even an untimely or unexpected death of the reigning prince, than the inherent weakness of this sort of government displays itself. The whole fabric of empire falls asunder; each kingdom reasserts its independence, tribute ceases to be paid, and the mistress of a hundred States finds herself suddenly thrust back into the primitive condition, stripped of the dominion which has been her strength, and thrown entirely on her own resources. Then the whole task of reconstruction has to be commenced anew; one by one the rebel countries are overrun, tribute is reimposed, submission reinforced. Progress is, of course, slow and uncertain where the empire has to be built up again from its foundations, and where at any time a day may undo the work it has taken centuries to accomplish."

Shall this chapter be the record of our history? Already we approach its fulfillment. I will not go to Virginia or Tennessee or Arkansas. Let me take Louisiana, and from one State learn the fate of others. Go to-day into the rich heart of that tropical State, where the orange blooms in the air of winter, or visit it in the summer when the woods and fields are luxuriant with their leafy life. You will find the fields no longer opulent with corn, cane, or the cotton. There is the luxuriance of weeds and decay. The undrained plantation is becoming the swampy pleasure ground of the alligator and moccasin. A few acres of corn, a few bursting pods of cotton mark the spot where Government farms, with disinterested benevolence, by means of freed labor! The sparse crops are choked by the growth of weeds. The speculator, with his haste for "one crop anyhow," is despoiling all. The infusion of new life, the restoration of the past prosperity which we were promised, is sadly evidenced by the ruin of houses and estates and the appearance of a speckled hybrid population, the half breed bastards born of barbarism, whose mothers have ceased to be slaves with the largest liberty to be—worse! The imperial city of New Orleans, which was the fitting entrepot for the resources of the great valley of the Mississippi, still remains, but alas, how changed! The scream of the steam pipe, the song of the boatman, the bustle of the levees, and the busy throng of the marts of commerce are all gone, for order has been established where Butler has revealed!

Military power is the same to-day which it was under the satrapies of the Orient. There is in it no element of allegiance and no resuscitation of nationality, for it is a system of constraint and does not reach the individual except to exasperate and oppress. Our radical reasoners have talked glibly of their military governors for rebellious provinces when subjugated. But Mr. SUMNER has become frightened at the apparition of Cromwell's Irish bashaws, and favors instead the congressional rule of the conquered provinces. The gentleman from Maryland would send a provisional brigadier to the States. Mr. Lincoln sets up one tenth over the nine tenths, and his own will over all. They forget the principle involved. They ignore the history I have given. It is not who shall thus govern, but shall this sort of government be allowed to any one? "Shall Congress assume jurisdiction of the rebel States?" is the question of Mr. SUMNER. He holds that the States are blasted as senseless communities, who have sacrificed their corporate existence which made them living, component members of our Union of States; that the States having abdicated, the right to rule them is transferred to Congress. Mr. Lincoln holds that himself and an oligarchy of one tenth shall perform the same function. Suppose, then, Congress governs them; by what agents will it govern? Men selected by the people of the States? Not at all. That is what is sought to be avoided. Wherein, then, will such congressional government differ from the military satraps or bashaws selected by the President, or even by the tenth of the people selected for their anti-slavery oaths?

If the States are obliterated and the source of power is centralized at the Federal capital, wherein does such a Government differ from the rankiest oriental despotism? What will be our fate with such despotism? History is like Merlin's magic mirror, in which we may read our own future. The seeming strength of such a system as conquered provinces, or oligarchical States, to take the place of the Constitution and local State governments, is its weakness. Such a system is not to be commended for the imitation of Anglo-Saxon people. Be assured, Representatives, that the people of America will never accept such a system in lieu of their old any more than they will accept presidential edicts for legislation, State suicide for State resuscitation, or an abolition tithe suffrage for the sovereignty of the people!

With such a programme of tyranny against the States South, how is it possible to preserve the liberties of the people North? Can such an image, part brass and part clay, stand? Will not a Government, despotic as an oriental empire toward one half of the nation, become intolerable and oppressive to the other half? Let the experience of the people under the war power answer. Let the stifling of free speech and free thought, the censorship of the telegraph and surveillance of the mails, the arbitrary seizure and imprisonment of opposing partisans, and the military control over ballot-boxes, courts, and people answer! Shall the attempt to restore the States, therefore, be given up? Shall our armies be disbanded in the presence of rebellious armies? Not at all.

To restore allegiance and inspire nationality let the individual rebel in arms against us be reached by the arm of our soldier, and when a non-combatant by the moderation and paternal care of the Government. Let the military power of the confederates be broken. Use those and only those severities of war which civilization warrants and which will make the military power of the South feel the power of the nation; but do not place any longer in their hands the armament of despair. They have had that weapon for over two years.

Let our rulers forego their ostracism of the misguided citizen. Let an amnesty be tendered which has hope in its voice. Give forgiveness to the erring, hope to the desponding, protection to the halting, and allay even fancied apprehensions of evil by the measures of moderation. Thus, by confiscating confiscation, abolishing abolition, and canceling proclamations, by respecting private property and State rights, prepare that friendliness which will beget confidence in the individual citizen. Thus will minorities be transferred into majorities South, and the States discarding the rebel authorities betake themselves to their normal and proper sphere under the old order. If this cannot be done by the present rulers, let other rulers be selected. History teaches in vain if it does not contain lessons of moderation in civil wars. How were the feuds of the Grecian federation accommodated? How were the civil wars of Rome ended? How were the intestine troubles of England assuaged? How was La Vendée pacified by the generous Hoche? How is it ever that unity of empire and consentaneity of thought are induced? How, except by the practice of that mildness which cares for and does not curse the people? When Athens undertook to succor Mitylene from the Persian grasp, a confederacy was formed between them. Athens used her power despotically. Mitylene revolted. Athens grasped her. Perfidy began. Destructive malignants—the Jacobins of that day, led by Cleon—instigated Athens to doom the citizens of Mitylene to death, their women to servitude, and their lands to desolation. But another and a better party arose, who strove to assuage grievances, prevent rebellion, and save the honor and unity of the republic. "When all hopes of success have vanished," said one of the wiser orators, "your rebellious subjects will never be persuaded to return to their duty; they will seek death in the field rather than await it from the hand of the executioner. Gathering courage from despair, they will either repel your assaults or fall a useless prey." Wisdom prevailed, and the glory of the Grecian States remained untarnished.

But a more conspicuous analogy to our own Revolution is to be found in the Marsian war of Rome. The Marsians claimed the privileges of Rome, whose empire they had enlarged and supported by their arms. They were the bravest soldiers of the empire, but they were denied equal rights in the State, which had been raised to eminence by their prowess. This war consumed above three hundred thousand of the youth of Italy. Finally, Rome conquered by recruiting her strength from the "border States," to whom she communicated her privileges. The only thing, says the historian, which saved Rome, was the fact that the Latin colonies remained faithful; for immediately after the commencement of the war the Romans made up their minds to reward them with all the rights of Roman citizens. This decree is called the lex Julia. These allies were won by something more than an amnesty of hate. The grandest empire of the past was rescued from internal feuds by the wise moderation of its statesmen.

When again Rome was racked by civil war, the wisest statesman of that turbulent and ambitious era, Cicero, summed up the duty of the patriot in this sentiment, which we might ponder with profit:

"I shall willingly adopt your advice and show every lenity, and use my endeavors to conciliate Pompey. Let us try if, by these means, we can regain the affections of all people, and render our victory lasting. Let this be a new method of conquering, to fortify ourselves with kindness and liberality."

The closest analogy to our condition is to be found in the English civil war beginning in 1640. The English people are our ancestors. They had what we have—a similar code of personal freedom, great municipal independence and a popular Parliament. The causes of the war were complicated by religious controversy; but the questions involved concerning the royal prerogative and the popular privilege are closely allied to our struggle. We know how the first Charles lost his head; how Cromwell's iron hand rescued, for a time, England from anarchy. At his death, eleven military governments, under major generals like Monk, held almost absolute sway. The three nations were represented in one Parliament, which, on Cromwell's death, had been dissolved for indocility. Conspirators had been punished with death. Confiscations were common. Yet a counter revolution began. Terror began it. Cromwell's grasp was relaxed on his death. His son, wiser than most men in power, convoked a Parliament. The army still reigned. It had been corrupted by power. The result of intrigues for the general safety was a union of the royalist and Presbyterian. But before the old authority of the Stuarts could be restored one element was wanting. It was supplied. Party vengeance was rampant then as now, but the people's representatives considered that they had to decide between a new civil war and a restoration. The latter was represented as clement, unexacting, prudent, and determined to adapt itself to the manners and wants of the time. Then came the famous declaration of Charles II from Breda. It removed all hesitation, and the restoration began. The king in that paper declared that he desired to compose the distraction and confusion of his kingdom, to assume his ancient rights, and accord to them their ancient liberties, without further "blood-letting." He therefore granted an amnesty to all who would return to their obedience. He gave his kingly word that "no crime whatsoever committed against us or our royal father shall ever rise in judgment to the least enmity of them, either in their lives, liberties, or estates; we desiring and ordaining that henceforward all notes of discord, separation, and difference of parties be abolished. He conjured them to a perfect union for the resettlement of all rights, under a free Parliament."

When this declaration was read in Parliament—though it was the false word of a designing tyrant—yet the restoration of the second Charles was voted by acclamation! It was alleged that the declaration not only comprehended the motives but the conditions of the recall. Perhaps the people's representatives were precipitate in not first settling conditions by a "free Parliament." But the amnesty and declaration were none the less powerful. Nor would the same sort of declaration from Abraham Lincoln be less powerful to restore the sovereign States to their old allegiance, especially if followed by a national convention and the restoration of a party not unfriendly to the entire union of all the States, with their "just rights." No distrust followed this declaration of the English king. He came to England. His journey to London was one perpetual fête—one continued shout of rejoicing! Faction ceased. History records that Cavaliers were reconciled with Roundheads. Exiles showed no resentment in the joy of their return. A violent reaction against revolution began; war ceased; and the foundation was then laid for the permanent stability which 1688 gave to England.

On the contrary, what a lesson may we learn from the connection of Ireland with England, and the policy of the latter in striving to subjugate the former? From the time of the first and second Charles—under all rules—discontent and warfare have prevailed. The union purchased through perfidy and fraud, by appeals to the mercenary motives of men, has been a mockery. When Strafford ruled Ireland he placed his captains and officers as burgesses in Parliament, who "swayed between the two parties," and thus began the corruption which ended in Irish subjugation. In spite of the eloquence of Grattan and Plunkett, Ireland at length became a dependency of the British Crown. True, she had been despoiled before the union. From the time when the Puritans overran Ireland to exterminate and destroy, sending thousands into tropical slavery and many thousands into that other country where crime breeds no more of its offspring, down to the 1st of January, sixty-two years ago, when the imperial standard floating from Dublin Castle announced to Ireland the depth of her degradation, and from that period to the present, there has been no union, no peace, no justice, no content for Ireland. That union, thus misbegotten of force and fraud, was weakness to England and ruin to Ireland. In one rebellion alone, that of 1798, there were twenty thousand loyal lives lost, and fifty thousand insurgents, and property worth $15,000,000. A conspiracy here, a plot there, a rebellion at the capital, a rising at the extremities, public waste, private impoverishment, general corruption, periodical starvation, political turpitude and national bankruptcy, these are the features of national thralldom which Ireland presents for our warning when we talk of subjugation and confiscation. How much better would it have been for both countries had the sagacious advice of Sydney Smith been followed when he said:

"How easy it is to shed human blood; how easy it is to persuade ourselves that it is our duty to do so, and that the decision has cost us a severe struggle; how much, in all ages, have wounds and shrieks and tears been the cheap and vulgar resources of the rulers of mankind! The vigor I have consists in finding out wherein subjects are aggrieved, in relieving them, in studying the temper and genius of a people, in consulting their prejudices, in selecting proper persons to lead and manage them in the laborious, watchful, and difficult task of increasing public happiness by allaying each particular discontent."

The wiser statesmen of England once learned this lesson. They strove to apply it to America in the Revolution of 1776. Every argument in favor of an unrelenting and exterminating policy by the British ministry was used and acted upon. In vain Chatham, Barré, and Burke appealed. Chatham, though provoked at our contumacy, as we are provoked at the conduct of the South, still felt that provocation could no longer be treated as such when it came from one united province, and when it was supported by eleven provinces more. Accordingly in February, 1775, he introduced a bill whose conclusion was, "So shall true reconciliation avert impending calamity." We know the sequel, but do we heed the teaching? When in 1860 our wiser men strove to avert calamities by true reconciliation, who prevented? Who yet stand in the path of reconciliation, with flaming two-edged sword, barring all ingress to the blessings of peace? Who clamor yet for a dictatorial regime? Who shout for death penalties, outlawries, forfeitures, and all the barbarous schemes of vulgar despotism? Or who, on the other hand, still hope for victory without reprisals; success without the tarnish or breach of the Constitution; equality of rights without irresponsible tyranny; free opinions freely expressed—the only reward which a Union restored can grant, worthy of the great sacrifice which the noble soldiers of the Republic have made?

Let us have done with juggling amnesties and ambitious schemes, with philanthropic ferocity and enforced elections. Under no such policy, pitched in the key-note of the President's proclamation, or chanted in the mellifluous tones of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] can the South ever be held in honorable alliance and harmony. A government inspired thus would be out of all relations to the States of this Union. It would have neither "the nerves of sensation which convey intelligence to the intellect of the body-politic, nor the ligaments and muscle which hold its parts together and move them in harmony." It would be as Russia is to Poland, as England to Ireland, the government of one people by another. It would never succeed with our race. It would never succeed with a territory whose configurations are so peculiar and whose interests are so varied as ours.

No citizenship is worth granting to those who dishonor themselves to receive it. No common bond of allegiance or nationality is possible on such terms. Mean and degrading conditions which unfit the citizen for manly equality are more despicable than rebellion. You cannot expel the poison of sedition by adding to its virulence. You cannot draw men from crime by stimulating the motive which led to it. Not thus, not thus were the early insurrections in our country assuaged. True, these rebellions were pignies to this gigantic outbreak, but the principle of their settlement is eternal. It is the very gospel of God; the very love which saves mankind. Inspired thus, what might be done if a wise and sagacious Executive should extend the same beneficent policy to the factions which are bleeding our beloved land!

Will our rulers heed these lessons in time? While they return to the purpose of the war as declared by General McClellan, for the sole great object of the restoration of the unity of the nation, the preservation of the Constitution, and the supremacy of the laws; and while they conduct it as he declared it should be carried on, in consonance with the principles of humanity and civilization, abjuring all desire of conquest, all projects of revenge, and all schemes of mock philanthropy, let them remember, also, that all our labors to rebuild the old fabric will fail unless out of the "brotherly dissimilitudes" of section and interest we recur to the historic and cardinal principles of State rights and local sovereignty, and evoke the spirit of fraternity, which has its true similitude in the perfect spirit of Christian fellowship!

Pursuing such a course, we may, like the fugitive prophet upon Mount Horeb, approach and interrogate Deity itself in our despondency and for our deliverance. And though, like him, we may hear the roar of the wave and the whirlwind of war, though we may tremble amidst the earthquake of its wrath, and though God may not be in the storm, the wind, or the earthquake, yet we may find Him in the still, small voice, sweet, clear, electric,

"Speaking of peace, speaking of love, Speaking as angels speak above," whose depth and sweetness are not those of tempestuous force or elemental strife, but soft as an angel's lute or a seraph's song, promising redress for wrong and deliverance from calamity. Horeb stands as a monumental lesson to our rulers forever, for it stands amid the shadows of Sinai, speaking the still, small voice of divine conciliation amid the thunders of the law and the forces of physical nature! I wait for that voice to be spoken. My soul waiteth for it "more than they that watch for the morning; I say, more than they that watch for the morning!"

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, before any steps can be safely taken for the organization of local governments either by or for the people inhabiting the territory included within the eleven once existing States, but now rebellious districts of the Union, it is necessary for Congress and the country to come to an understanding of the legal and constitutional relations subsisting between those people and the Government of the United States.

It is my chief purpose, indeed I may say that it is my only purpose, to contribute something, if happily I may, to the attainment of that common understanding. But before I proceed to a discussion of the questions involved in the bill now under consideration, I beg the indulgence of the House while I allude briefly to the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague upon the committee that reported this bill, [Mr. ASHLEY,] in reference to the policy of the President in Louisiana and Arkansas, and to the conduct of General Banks in his administration of the Department of the Gulf.

It ought to attract observation that since this rebellion opened the Thirty-Seventh Congress commenced its existence and ceased to exist; that this Congress is now closing the fifth month of its First Session, and that up to this time no efficient, indeed no legislative steps whatever have been taken by which the Executive is to be guided in the affairs of the people occupying the territory that has been reclaimed from rebel domination. Under these circumstances I think it due to the country that this House, at least, should do nothing which conveys any reflection upon his policy unless that policy be clearly and manifestly in contravention of the Constitution or of the well-ascertained and admitted principles of the Government.

When the Mississippi river was opened to navigation, when the subordinates of the rebel government at Richmond were separated from the capital of the so-called confederacy, and the populous parts of Louisiana were torn from rebel domination, and the State of Arkansas, in various ways, indicated that there was an existing opinion among the people in favor of a return to the allegiance which was due from them to this Government, the Executive had but one of three courses before him: either to be silent, to be inactive, to govern by military authority alone, or else to establish a civil government, or at least to take initiatory steps for the establishment of such a Government. It was unquestionably his right and duty, in the absence of all legislative action, to govern these Territories as fast and as far as they were reclaimed by military power.

I agree with what has been so often uttered upon this floor, that, as far as practicable, we should avoid the exercise of military authority in the civil affairs of the people. I do not know that anything has been done in Arkansas and Louisiana in the reestablishment of civil authority that is in contravention of the known principles of our Government. The President has initiated steps for the organization of civil authority, and in the absence of legislative action here I hold it to have been his duty to take steps in that direction. Whatever may be our opinion of the President on certain points, and I do not stand here or anywhere as his defender, but knowing that he has marked peculiarities, I think I am justified in saying that they are manifest only in the lack of executive control over those intrusted with the performance of administrative duties. I think we ought to have confidence in an Executive who from the year 1858, when he carried on the memorable contest in Illinois with Douglas, until now, has been true to the principles of human liberty and true to the application of those principles under the Constitution to the people of the country, both white and black.

A life of devotion to principle, a life of service—and I make this remark not only with reference to the President but to his subordinate who is charged with the administration of affairs in Louisiana—a life of service and a life indicating capacity should not be set aside even in the presence of errors or of temporary disasters. Therefore, though the President may have made mistakes in reference to affairs in Louisiana and Arkansas it ill becomes any man who believes in the principles of human liberty, and that they are destined to control this continent, to arraign him. He should stand justified when he has acted in good faith, with loyalty to the Constitution and with just regard to the rights and liberties of this great people. These remarks are applicable to my friend who is charged with the conduct of affairs in Louisiana. For twenty years and more I have known General Banks. I have known him to be a man of capacity, struggling against adverse influences and adverse fortune almost from the moment he crossed the threshold of manhood to the present time. He has been often frowned on by fortune; but he has, in all the emergencies of his life, risen superior to the attacks of enemies and even sustained himself against the assaults of fortune. Whatever other men may think, it is my firm belief, even in the presence of what seems to be a temporary disaster in military operations in Louisiana, that General Banks will do his duty to the country and redeem the territory west of the Mississippi river from the thralldom of the rebellion.

Still further, without entering into an examination of particular things done in Louisiana, I assert that from the moment New Orleans was wrested from the grasp of the rebels until now there has been no part of our territory reclaimed from that control in which the rights of the citizens have been as well protected as in Louisiana, or where there has been so little of personal trouble and suffering, especially among the black race. To be sure wages have been fixed for them, but they have been saved from the lash of the taskmaster; they have been free; they have been at liberty to choose their own places of labor; and Louisiana is to-day free from the institution of slavery. And I say more, upon information received from many sources, that Louisiana is not only free from the existence of the institution of slavery through the President's proclamation, but she is becoming free through the fact that her people are being identified day by day and week by week with the institutions and principles of freedom. On many of the plantations schools have been opened under the direction of General Banks for the education of children. Thus freedom is becoming the public policy in Louisiana, not through proclamations, not through legislation, not through the Constitution alone, but through the settled conviction of the people that slavery is wrong and that freedom is right.

And now I come to what I purpose to present in the way of argument in favor of the passage of this bill. It is necessary in the beginning that we understand the legal and constitutional relations subsisting between the people of the rebel districts of the country and the national Government. Nobody denies that we are in the presence of a great war, which taxes our capacity and resources. The question is asked, and it has been often discussed, who is responsible for this war? The time will come when it will be of no consequence who is responsible for this war. I am not sure that the time has not come already. I think the responsibility of the war is in the institution of slavery, in its intrinsic incompatibility with freedom everywhere and always; that it was incompatible in the beginning, that it was accepted as an existing fact in the States of the country merely because our fathers saw no way of escaping from its malign influence, and also because they labored under the hope, which has proved thus far a delusion, that slavery was temporary and would gradually disappear; that freedom was permanent, and would become universal.

Slavery has increased and strengthened in this country under the influence of two considerations, chiefly: first, the apparent pecuniary advantages to be derived from it. Those advantages were not real. The slaveholder and the slaveholding communities were deceived. The result is seen in the great fact that the slave States, with a more inviting climate, with a more fertile soil, have less accumulated wealth than is possessed by the free States as the products of the labor of one or two hundred years. There are no two slave States in this Union that Massachusetts could not have purchased in the open market when this rebellion commenced. In this remark I exclude the idea of property in human beings. That fact is due to the circumstance that slavery, instead of being a profitable, was an impoverishing institution. But men rested in the belief that it was profitable, and therefore they sought to maintain and extend it.

The other reason for fostering and extending slavery in this country is found in the circumstance that the politicians South and North gained power by it. Chiefly, indeed exclusively as far as the North is concerned, are they who sit on the other side of the House, and their political predecessors, responsible for this unholy alliance.

The spur of this revolution was in the census of 1860. It is a memorable fact, which has been noted often, that in 1820, when the census disclosed the truth as to the relative growing power of the North as compared with the South, and again in 1830, and again in 1850, we were on the brink of a revolution. At these several epochs this great fact appeared with full force, and southern leaders were aroused for the moment in the hope that they could strike down in some way or other the power of freedom upon this continent. In 1860 they saw it was impossible for them to continue in the ascendant, and therefore they sought a separation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the South has been guided by men of sense and capacity. They did not enter upon this revolution without counting its cost. They estimated the cost upon the basis of facts which were in their possession, and the evidence which was in their possession tended to this result: that there would be no war; that separation could be effected without a contest of blood on their soil. In the peace congress it was the constant cry of the secessionists, "Give us the assurance, radical men of the North, that there shall be no war." And it was there and at that moment that northern men failed to assert the great truth which was in the hearts of the people, that if these men persisted in the attempt to secure secession there would be war. I believe if northern men and men from the border States had been faithful to truth and duty the calamity of secession would have been averted. Mr. Seddons, the present secretary of war for the rebellious States, occupied fifteen minutes of the time of the convention, after a motion was made to adjourn sine die, in imploring the members of that Congress to give them the assurance that there would be no war. They believed that there would be no war. How came they to entertain that belief? They knew that we had two and a half men for every one at the South. They knew that we were vastly their superiors in all the material resources of war. How came they to believe that we would not exercise the powers which we had? I can explain it only upon one ground, the ground disclosed in the letter of Franklin Pierce, the ground disclosed in the message of James Buchanan in December, 1860, that if there was war it would be in the North.

I will take the responsibility of reading an extract from a speech made by a northern man, Mr. Stockton, of New Jersey, in the peace congress. I have copied it from the notes prepared by Mr. Chittenden, and they correspond with my own minutes made at the time and with my recollection of the remarks made by Mr. Stockton. He said:

"I know that this Union cannot be dissolved without a struggle. Will you hasten the time when we shall begin to shed each other's blood? Force fifteen States! Why, you cannot force New Jersey alone. Force the South! Why, they won't stop to count forces. Neither side can be frightened. Don't think of it. You cannot frighten the North any more than you can a Roman soldier. You cannot frighten the South. You cannot frighten either any easier than the chieftain which the Roman poet has immortalized.

"When men meet to save their country they must be prepared to offer up everything, to sacrifice their lives, if necessary. How can men stop for platforms which will destroy their country?"

"I appeal to the brotherhood, the fraternity of the North. My friends, peace or war is in your hands. You hold the keys of peace or ruin. You tell us not to hasten this matter. Well, you don't realize the facts, the consequences. No one does. Do you talk here about regiments for invasion, for coercion? You, gentlemen of the North, you know better. I know better. For every regiment raised there for coercion there will be another regiment raised for resistance to coercion. If no other State will raise them, remember New Jersey."

"Pause, gentlemen. Stop where you are. You will bring strife to your own doors, to your very hearthstones, bloody, desperate strife. The war will be in your own homes, among your own families. Under ordinary circumstances you would hesitate. If the question was about the tariff you would hesitate and look at the awful consequences."

It was, as I verily believe, such declarations as this which led the South to engage in this mad crusade for the destruction of the Government. They naturally supposed that after a very short period of commotion the North would accept what they demanded, a separation of the Union. They failed. The North could not afford to see this Union dissolved. It had not the power to submit to its dissolution. Gentlemen upon this floor and elsewhere, I apprehend, make a great mistake when they suppose that the Union depends on the Constitution. The Constitution in its preamble declares that the object for which it was framed was "to form a more perfect Union," implying a previous existence as a Union; and we know that the Articles of Confederation implied also the existence of a Union. The Declaration of Independence, in its first sentence, puts forth the doctrine of the unity of the colonies: "When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station, to which by the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them," &c., thus assuming in 1776 the doctrine of the unity of the colonies, of the unity of the continent. That unity cannot be broken. It is now interrupted; it cannot be broken.

The only question, then, which we have any voice in settling is whether we shall pursue a policy by which the Union may be restored on the basis of freedom, or whether like cowards we are to lie down and suffer the ruthless hand of despotism to triumph over us. Either a republican Government under the Constitution of the United States, or a despotism guided by Jeff. Davis and his successors, is to be the rule of public life on this continent. Sir, whatever differences of opinion we may have as to the policy which has governed the Administration in the conduct of the war, it cannot be doubted that, as in the beginning of this controversy, the chief hope of the rebels is drawn from the assurances given by men belonging to the Democratic party. The confidence of the South to-day is not so much in the armies which they control as in the ascendancy of a party in the North by whose success agreements, conditions, and arrangements may be made and their independence recognized.

Gentlemen upon the other side of the House indicate that they do not accept this as true. I make here a qualification. The gentleman from New York, from the fifth district, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] whom I do not now see in his seat, says that there can be no such thing as a war Democrat. I do not agree with him. There are war Democrats in this House, and thousands of them in the country. What I do say is, that there can be no such party as a Democratic party in favor of the prosecution of the war. It is illogical that there should be a Democratic party in favor of the war. The Administration, the Union party, is in favor of its prosecution. Whenever a logical issue is made against that party it must be made upon the ground that the war is not to be prosecuted. How can a man, in this crisis of the country's life, who regards the salvation of the Union as of more consequence than anything else, differ with those who support the Administration in the prosecution of the war? They only have a logical ground of difference who believe that the war is wrong and that it ought at once to cease. Therefore it follows that gentlemen on the other side of the House who believe that the war ought to be prosecuted, can, in the nature of things, find no efficient means for carrying out their views except in allying themselves with those who also believe that the war should be prosecuted. The men in any party who have logic can control that party; and therefore, without going into any inquiry whether the gentlemen who are for peace upon that side of the House have more capacity than the gentlemen who are for war, I still predict that the gentlemen who are for peace will control. They have a logical foundation on which to stand, and they will guide the Democratic party. There may be war Democrats; but a Democratic party in favor of the prosecution of the war cannot be maintained permanently.

It is necessary, as it seems to me, that we should understand the relations subsisting between the States and the national Government. But I cannot discuss this subject at length. It is apparent from an examination of the Constitution that the States are supreme in certain things, the General Government supreme in certain other things, and finally that there are two tests in the Constitution which establish the supremacy and sovereignty of the nation over the States. One of these tests is in that provision of the Constitution by which the General Government guarantees to every State a republican form of government. There is no corresponding guaranty by the States to the Union. The States have not undertaken to guaranty to the General Government a republican form of government, showing that the national Government is supreme, and assumed to be able to maintain its own institutions and authority. There is also another provision in the Constitution requiring every officer of each State to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; and the Constitution of the United States is made the supreme law of the land, anything in any State constitution or any law to the contrary notwithstanding. In these two particulars, as in many others, the Constitution of the United States is supreme. The States are sovereign in their spheres, but they are not supreme; and the power which the General Government has is defined in the Constitution itself.

I could not but be amused at the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who examined the meaning of the words "compact" and "federal" for the purpose of giving the House information as to what the Constitution of the United States means. It so happens that neither of these words is used in the Constitution of the United States, and therefore, whatever may be their meaning; they throw no light on the Constitution itself. But in order to ascertain what the powers conferred on this Government are, we must go to the Constitution. Calling it a compact does not make it any more or less strong than if you call it a constitution, or a league, or an agreement. Thomas Hobbes has said, "Words are wise men's counters, they do but reckon with them; but they are the money of fools."

Now, what is the condition of the rebellious States with reference to the General Government? Gentlemen on the other side of the House assert that the States still exist; that all that is necessary is that officers shall be elected to fill the offices, and then these States are at once in the Union.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STREVELS] maintains, as I understand, that these States are out of the Union; that their territory is alien territory, and that we are making war against alien enemies. I do not admit either of these positions to be true. I feel quite sure that these eleven once-existing States are no longer States of the Union. The evidence on which I rely in support of this position is found first in the declaration made by the authorities of those States that they no longer exist as States of the American Union. Next, we find that for three years and more they have been resisting the authority of the Government and have been carrying on a war against it. It is absurd to say that States or people are a part of the Government under the Constitution, and entitled to constitutional rights and privileges, when they have been carrying on war against the Government.

Next apply the tests of the Constitution. The Constitution provides that no State shall raise armies. These eleven States—if they are States in the American Union—have been for three years engaged in raising armies. The Constitution declares that the States shall not enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation with each other. These eleven States are, as is notorious, in alliance and confederation with each other against this Government, and have been so confederated together for three years. The Constitution requires that in every State in the Union officers shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, while it is notorious that every officer exercising authority or jurisdiction there has taken an oath absolving himself, as far as he can do so by an oath, from all allegiance to this Government. Therefore, applying these constitutional tests to the eleven once-existing States, we find that there is no response tending to show that they are States in the American Union.

Nor do I admit that the people in the rebellious States are aliens. They are not of any other country, they are not of any other legal jurisdiction, they are within the jurisdiction of the Union. Three years ago they were a portion of this Union, and although they have been carrying on a war, that war has not thus far been successful, their independence has not been acknowledged by us, nor has it been recognized by any other nation. They, therefore, are not aliens. They are, to be sure, public enemies, but they are not alien enemies.

Then what is the condition of the people occupying the territory once included in these eleven States? As I believe, and as I attempted to set forth in certain resolutions which I submitted to the House a few weeks ago, these States as political organizations have by their own will ceased to exist. I then submitted the views which I entertain upon that point, to the effect that the existence of a State is a fact within the control of the people themselves, and cannot be influenced by any extraneous power whatever, and that therefore these States have by the will of the people thereof as political organizations ceased to exist.

What, then, remains? That the Government of the United States has legal jurisdiction over this territory and over the people who occupy it; but admitting that fact, it is an absurdity to say that these States still exist and that the people there may, without our consent, elect officers and send Representatives to this body and Senators to the other branch of Congress. I desire to call the attention of the House in this connection to a remark quoted in the Federalist from Montesquieu:

"Greece was undone as soon as the King of Macedon obtained a seat among the Amphictyons."

Gentlemen upon the other side of the House propose that our enemies may come into this Hall and into that of the other branch of Congress and take their seats. What happened to Greece when the King of Macedon obtained a seat in the Amphictyonic council will surely happen to us as a nation when we concede any portion of this Government to our enemies. Yet that is the proposition of gentlemen on the other side of the House, if their position has any force whatever.

I suppose it will not be denied that we have the right to fix rules and regulations for the admission of new States. It certainly cannot be denied on this side of the House. It would be a monstrous proposition that the people of a Territory—I speak now of Territories acknowledging their allegiance to this Government, as Nevada or Nebraska—can frame a constitution such as pleases them and secure as an absolute right their admission into the Union as a State without any judgment being passed upon that question by Congress. The fact that no State was ever admitted into the Union except by a vote of Congress, implies that for any reason that may be satisfactory to Congress such admission could be refused.

If, then, the application of a Territory to be admitted into the Union as a State may be refused, it may be refused for any reason which, in the judgment of Congress, may be deemed sufficient. The reason rests in the mind of Congress. Congress will properly consider the constitution, the institutions of the proposed State, its extent of territory, and any other circumstances which may properly come within their view, and then decide whether the Territory shall be received as a State into the Union.

If this be true in reference to a Territory, and if it be also true, as I believe it is, that these States as States have ceased to exist, they can only be restored to this Union as States upon the happening of two events: first, that the people of the State, a majority of them, as the chairman of the committee proposes to amend this bill, shall apply for admission into the Union as a State, having declared their loyalty to the Union and to the Constitution of the United States. When a State shall so apply for admission, with a proposed constitution for a State government that shall conform to the Constitution of the United States, it will then be competent for Congress to say whether it shall be admitted or not. Congress exercises this discretion according to its best judgment, and from its decision there can be no appeal.

This bill fixes three unalterable conditions precedent to such application, without a compliance with which no one of these once-existing States can reappear in the Union. *

It is asserted on the other side of the House that we have no right to make conditions precedent to the organization of a State government, there being a provision in the Constitution that the national Government shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government; and State governments having existed and been recognized as republican in form by Congress, in which the institution of slavery existed, we have no right to change our opinion as to what a republican form of government is. It is at that point exactly where we differ. I say that the question as to what constitutes a republican form of government is under the Constitution always open to the judgment of Congress. I do not mean to say that Congress can appoint a committee of inspection or scrutiny in reference to the constitution of Kentucky, for example. Kentucky having been admitted to the Union, the question for the time being was decided and her constitution and form of government is recognized as republican. But suppose a controversy should arise in Kentucky, as in Rhode Island two and twenty years ago, and a party by a majority should establish another government, frame another constitution, and exercise authority under that constitution, and there should be a conflict, then the question would be brought before Congress to investigate the matter whether either or both were republican in form. Certainly not whether the old constitution or new is republican in form according to the judgment of our ancestors, nor whether it is republican according to the opinion of any commentator; but if in the opinion of Congress it should appear that one of these is republican and the other is not, then Congress would set up the republican government, even though the old government should be destroyed thereby.

While I do not claim for Congress the right of scrutiny of the governments of existing States, yet if the question is forced upon Congress in such a manner that it cannot be avoided, then Congress is to decide. From that decision there is no appeal. The Supreme Court in the Rhode Island case held that when Congress decided the question of the character of the government, whether it was republican in form or not, that decision could not be investigated, could not be examined, could not be controlled by any other department or tribunal.

We mean by this bill to give notice to the people occupying the territory in the eleven once-existing States that if they shall frame new constitutions they must come here with governments republican in form according to our ideas.

Gentlemen on the other side have taunted us with the charge that we have changed our policy in reference to the object of this war; that it is no longer for the preservation of the Union, but for the emancipation of the slave. I deny that; but if the policy of the war has been changed it is not the first time in the history of human affairs that similar changes have taken place. I remember that it is the undeviating testimony of history that from the opening of the colonial controversy in 1764 to the month of September, 1774, less than eight months prior to the massacre of Lexington, there was not a paper, there was not a public man, there was not a representative assembly that did not declare that it was the settled purpose of the people of these colonies to maintain the union with Great Britain. Our ancestors denied again and again the charge made that they contemplated independence. But on the 4th of July, 1776, they declared their independence of the mother country. Events had changed opinions, and opinions had changed the public policy. While we have not changed our policy in regard to prosecuting the war for the purpose of restoring the Union, we do mean that when it is restored it shall be restored on republican principles, and that there shall be no new State admitted into the Union from the unoccupied territory west, from Mexico, or from the reestablishment of regular governments in the eleven rebellious States that are not republican in form according to our ideas. The Federalist says:

"There are two methods of curing the mischief of faction: the one by removing its causes; the other by controlling its effects.

"There are, again, two methods of removing the causes of faction: the one by destroying the liberty which is essential to its existence; the other by giving to every citizen the same opinions, the same passions, and the same interests."

We purpose to cure the evil of this faction by removing its cause, slavery, and to give to every citizen of the Republic "the same opinions, the same passions, and the same interests," in reference to human freedom.

And we are to maintain the doctrine on this continent, I trust, that wherever slavery exists there republicanism is not; that wherever slavery exists there a republican form of government, under the Constitution, cannot be. Hence we give notice in this bill to all the inhabitants of those revolted districts that they may form State governments and be admitted into this Union upon certain conditions, the chief of which is that involuntary servitude shall cease to exist.

The argument upon this bill, as far as it depends upon me, is now concluded, and we approach the moment when the judgment of this House is to be expressed. The discussion in which we have been engaged has not elicited marked attention in this Hall, nor has it attracted in an unusual degree the interest of the country. Yet in this measure lie the germs of a new civilization for one half of a continent. The area of the eleven rebellious States, for whose guidance we now establish a fundamental law, is twice as great as the area of the thirteen colonies, and it is nearly equal to that of England, France, Spain, and the Empire of Austria combined.

If our arms shall be successful—and of this I cannot doubt, unless Divine Providence should reverse the order of things for purposes inscrutable to mortal eyes—this vast territory is by this great act dedicated to freedom forever. With freedom there will come a new civilization. This new civilization will be marked by an interpretation and preaching of the Holy Scriptures uninfluenced by the lusts and ambitions and designs of a slaveholding aristocracy; and it will be illustrated by a system of free schools for the education of the children of all the people, whether black or white. Under the new civilization labor will be honored and rewarded; the immense landed estates will be broken up, and the children of poverty hitherto, whether white or black, will be endowed by the law and by the fruits of their own industry with a portion of the soil, and thus they will become the supporters and defenders of the country, contributing to its enrichment and power.

There is one feature of the bill which does not receive my approval, and to which I assent only in deference to what I suppose is the present judgment of this House and of the country. I speak of the limitation of the elective franchise to white male citizens. The right of suffrage is not a natural right, but it is the highest among political rights. No community which denies the right of suffrage to any considerable number of its adult male inhabitants can ever be safe from intestine commotion, for wherever this right is so denied the people cannot be safe or even free from oppression. And even if a community in which the right of suffrage is thus limited should be free from actual oppression, still the Government could not escape the suspicions and charges which result from an unjust distribution of political power. In free countries the rights of the people are frequently acquired and they are generally preserved by the ballot. When the ballot fails the resort is to the sword. When you deny the ballot to one third or one half of the people of the vast territory covered by the provisions of this bill what do you leave for them or offer to them but a resort to the sword as the means of removing or redressing the grievances of which they are already the foredoomed victims?

I had indulged the hope until recently that this House would recognize the political rights of the colored race by securing the elective franchise to certain classes, or at least to a single class of those who hereafter should enjoy the protection of the Constitution. The vote upon the amendment of the Senate to the bill establishing the Territory of Montana dissipated at once and for the present this hope. The country will speedily revise our proceedings in this particular. Mark the progress of events! It is not yet two years since you were willing to contribute to the cause of the Union by the emancipation of the negro. I do not now speak of gentlemen on the other side of the House. I address myself to the friends of the Administration.

But now the President's proclamation of emancipation is accepted with signal unanimity by the people of the country. It has already received the considerate judgment of mankind; and may we not also reverently believe that it receives the constant favor of Almighty God? I am aware that gentlemen on the other side of the House still utter their accustomed denunciations of the measure; but their words are like the wonderful missile of the South Sea Islander, which cuts the air fiercely and then falls harmlessly at the feet of him from whose hand the weapon sped.

The people accept the freedom of the negro; having recognized his right to freedom, they bid him do service for the country. When he has served the country in the field the justice of the nation will guaranty to him the power to maintain his rights in civil life. At first you remanded the fugitive negro back to his rebel master. Then, and reluctantly, you accepted the services of the negro upon the condition that he should dig in the trenches and thus relieve the white soldier of the most arduous portion of his labors. Then, if he could still be classed as a laborer, you would allow him to perform the duty of a soldier in garrison and in pestilential regions; but at last you have recognized his manhood and given expression to a public sense of justice by allowing him the position, pay, and emoluments of a soldier of the Republic.

Thus are events our masters; and thus does the country hesitate even in the presence of these events to do those acts of justice which are due to one race and necessary for the salvation of the other. When, and by what means, and for what period of time do you expect to set up and maintain loyal governments in the rebellious districts of the Union unless you confer the elective franchise upon the negro? The military power must at some moment not remote be withdrawn. The remnant of the dominant class will be powerful for a generation. There is a large number of poor whites, unaccustomed to independent thought or to independent action. The colored people are loyal, and in many States they are almost the only people who are trustworthy supporters of the Union. Will you reject them? I ask whether you will reject the civil and political power of the colored people in the State of South Carolina, for example? If I could direct the force of public sentiment and the policy of this Government, South Carolina, as a State and with a name, should never reappear in this Union. Georgia deserves a like fate. When the Constitution was formed she united herself with South Carolina and forced the recognition of the institution of slavery in our Constitution. They are the two States that are responsible for the continuance of this institution. I appeal to gentlemen who have examined our colonial record for the proof of the assertion I make, that in North Carolina, in Virginia, Maryland, and in every one of the now free States, then existing, declaration after declaration was made against the institution of slavery. It was condemned in Maryland, in Virginia, and in North Carolina. South Carolina and Georgia breathed into it the breath of life, and if I had the power neither of those States should reappear in the Union. Florida does not deserve a name in this Union. What then? Let these three States be set apart as the home of the negro. Invite him there by giving to him local political power. Give him the right of suffrage in those States, and the colored population, as rapidly as it can be spared from the industrial pursuits of the North, will aggregate upon the shores of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. Give them local self-government and let them defend themselves as a portion of this Republic.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask that by unanimous consent the gentleman's time shall be extended for ten minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not in my place here ask that in Kentucky or Maryland, or in any one of the northern loyal States where a negro population exists, the right of suffrage shall be given to them, but in these three districts, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, I would provide for the right of suffrage to colored persons. They have earned it by their services in the field, and there is a degree of injustice in asking a man to peril his life in the cause of the country and in defense of institutions in the creation and conduct of which he has no voice whatever. There is an injustice in this. It cannot stand the test of time nor the scrutiny of civilization.

Sir, great misrepresentations have been made, not only with reference to the negroes in this country but with reference to the experiment of emancipation in the British West Indies. I will read a few statistics which, in their results, show what has been accomplished by the black population of the West Indies emancipated by the British Government less than thirty years ago. I venture to anticipate what I have to say by expressing my belief that, with the exception of Greece, there are no people on the face of the earth who have made more progress than the emancipated slaves in some of the British West Indies. What have they done? Take, for example, Barbadoes. They have opened schools, and with a population of 140,000 have some 7,000 children in the schools, and they have over 3,000 landholders. In Antigua, with a population of 35,000, they have more than 10,000 children in the day and Sunday schools, and 5,000 landholders among those who were formerly slaves. In Tobago there are 2,500 landholders, with a population of 15,000. In St. Lucia, with 25,000 inhabitants, there are more than 2,000 landowners. And even in Jamaica, which is an exception to the West India islands in the matter of prosperity since emancipation, in a population of 400,000 they have 50,000 freeholders. These returns are for 1860.

So, then, if you test that people who came from slavery and barbarism in 1834 by the two tests of primary civilization, cultivation of the soil, and education of the children, they have made great progress. But it is worth while to remember that Barbadoes is one of the most populous portions of the globe. Of the one hundred and six thousand acres of land, one hundred thousand are under cultivation, and the price of the cultivated land is from four to five hundred dollars an acre.

If it is shown in a single instance that emancipated slaves have been able to take care of themselves and make progress, though there may be twenty instances of failure, still the one instance of success demonstrates their capacity, and their failures are to be attributed to misfortune and the influence of circumstances.

The dependencies of Guiana, Trinidad, Barbadoes, and Antigua, previous to emancipation produced 187,000,000 pounds of sugar, and in 1856-57 they produced annually 265,000,000, showing a gain of nearly 78,000,000 pounds a year; and their imports went up from $8,840,000 to $14,600,000 a year.

Mr. Hincks, the late Governor General of the Windward islands, states from his own knowledge and observation, that on an estate in Barbadoes, ninety blacks perform the work formerly done by two hundred and thirty slaves; and that the produce of each laborer during slavery was 1,043 pounds of sugar, and the produce of each laborer since emancipation is 3,660 pounds. He also states that the cost per hoghead under slavery was £10 sterling, while in 1858 it was produced at a cost of £4 sterling. In Antigua, with a population of 35,000, they contribute equal to £1 sterling each by taxation, for the support of religious, charitable, and educational institutions. I say, then, that the experience of the British West Indies has demonstrated the capacity of this race.

I ask for this people justice, in the presence of these great events, in this exigency when the life of the nation is in peril and when every reflecting person must see that the cause of that peril is in the injustice we have done to the negro race. I ask that we shall now do justice to that race. They are four millions. They will remain on this continent. They cannot be expatriated. They await the order of Providence. Their home is here. It is our duty to elevate them, to provide for their civilization, for their enlightenment, that they may enjoy the fruits of their labor and their capacity. The nation which is not just shall finally

"Stand
Childless and crownless in her voiceless woe,
An empty urn within her withered hand."

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the indulgence granted me by the House to enforce quite at length the views which I deem pertinent to this debate. The details of this bill require examination as well as its general policy. It provides that in all the States whose governments are usurped or overthrown by persons in rebellion the President shall appoint a military governor, whose pay and emoluments shall be those of a brigadier general; that so soon as this governor is satisfied that the people of the State shall have "sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States," he shall cause an enrollment to be made of all the white male citizens resident in their respective counties by the marshal and his deputies, who shall tender to each one the oath to support the Constitution. If one tenth part of the persons enrolled in each county shall take this oath, he shall by proclamation "invite the loyal people of the State to elect delegates to a convention." He shall then divide the State into election districts, assign to each its number of delegates, designate the day and the place for holding the election, appoint commissioners to superintend the voting, and provide an adequate force to keep the peace. The bill prescribes the qualifications of electors. They must be loyal white male citizens of the United States resident in the county, enrolled as aforesaid, and must have taken the oath prescribed by the act of 1862; and no person who has held any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or who has voluntarily borne arms against the United States, shall be entitled to vote for or to be elected as delegate. The oath shall be taken by every person before he shall be allowed to vote, and his vote shall be excluded if the commissioners, notwithstanding his oath, shall believe that he has held any such office or voluntarily borne arms. The returns of election shall be made to the governor, who shall canvass them, declare the result, convene the delegates, administer to each of them the said oath, and preside over their deliberations. The bill then provides that the convention shall declare:

First. That no person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the usurping power shall vote for or be a member of the Legislature or Governor.

Second. That involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and the freedom of all parties is guaranteed in said State.

Third. No debt, State or confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power shall be recognized or paid by the State.

And having done so it shall proceed to establish a State constitution which shall embody these provisions, and which shall be submitted for ratification to the electors who chose the delegates. If the constitution shall be ratified by them it shall be certified to the President, who shall, with the assent of Congress, by proclamation recognize the State government and constitution as the constitutional government of such State, and from and after such recognition Representatives, Senators, and electors for President and Vice President may be elected in such State according to the laws of the State and of the United States.

If the convention refuse to make the required declaration the governor shall dissolve it, but a new convention may at any time afterwards be ordered by him under the advice of the President.

The governor shall see that the laws of the United States, and the laws of the State in force when the State government was overthrown, shall be faithfully executed; he shall assess and collect the same amount of taxes as was provided for by the State in the year preceding its secession; and shall apply the money so collected to the expenses of his administration, and shall pay over the balance to the Treasury of the United States. The President shall appoint such officers as were provided for in the State constitution, but neither they nor the governor shall recognize or regard any law or custom whereby any person was held to involuntary servitude in the State.

The bill then provides that involuntary servitude is forever abolished in all the States in rebellion, that persons held in bondage are set free, that they shall be discharged by habeas corpus, and that to restrain them of their liberty shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment; and by the last section it is enacted that any person who, after its passage, shall hold any office, civil or military, State or confederate, in the rebel service shall not be a citizen of the United States.

These are the provisions of this bill. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] facetiously entitles it "a bill to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government."

At last the mask has been thrown off. At last the pretenses have all been laid aside. Three years of war have done their work, and the purposes and objects of the Republican party have been at last acknowledged. This bill is the consummation of its statesmanship; the fruit of its experience, the demonstration of its purposes. The gentleman from Maryland introduced it; it is understood to be distasteful to some of his party friends; but it is a party measure; it will be voted for by every member of the Republican organization; it marks their policy of restoration; it defines their ideas of Union; it interprets their construction of the Constitution. As such I accept it. We have had double-dealing, hypocrisy, and fraud for the last three years. We have had false professions, false names, and double-faced measures. We have had armies raised, taxes collected, battles fought, under the pretense that the war was for the Union, the old Union, the Union of the Constitution. These were the catch-words for the patriotic people. In the secret council-chambers of the party they were sneered at as devices with which to ensnare the innocent, to deceive the ignorant, to coax the obstinate. They were to be discarded as soon as, in the heat of war, in the exasperation of passion, in the exultation of victory, or in the bitterness of defeat and disaster and oppression, it would be safe to divulge the great conspiracy against the Union, the constitutional confederation, the principles of free government.

That time has come. The veil is drawn aside. We see clearly. The party in possession of the powers of the Government is revolutionary. It seeks to use those powers to destroy the Government, to change its form, to change its spirit. It seeks under the forms of law to make a new Government, a new Union, to ingraft upon it new principles, new theories, and to use the powers of the law against all who will not be persuaded. It is in rebellion against the Constitution; it is in treasonable conspiracy against the Government. It differs in nothing from the armed enemies except in the weapons of its warfare. They fight to overthrow its authority over them, while it seeks to overthrow that authority at home. They would curtail the limits of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; it would extend those limits, but change the basis and principles upon which it rests. If revolt against constituted authority be a crime, if patriotism consist in upholding in form and spirit the Government our fathers made, those in power here to-day are as guilty as those who in the seceded States marshal armed men for the contest.

"Revolutions move onward." That is true. But call things by their true names. Admit you are in revolution; admit you are revolutionists; admit that you do not desire to restore the old order; admit that you do not fight to restore the Union. Take the responsibility of that position. Avow that you exercise the powers of the Government because you control them; that you are not bound by the Constitution, but by your own sense of right. Avow that resistance to your schemes is not treason, but war. Dissolve the spell which you have woven around the hearts of our people by the cunning use of the words conservatism, patriotism, Union. And we will cease all criminations, we will hush all reproaches for oaths violated, pledges falsified, faith betrayed.

We will meet you on your own ground, we will fight you with your weapons; and by the issue of that contest, whether of argument or of arms, we will abide.

Am I to be told that I misrepresent the Republican party? The gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] an able and honored member of that party, has said in your hearing, "If I could direct the force of public sentiment and the policy of this Government, South Carolina as a State and with a name should never reappear in this Union. Georgia deserves a like fate. Florida does not deserve a name in this Union."

The gentleman from Maryland felt that this charge could be truthfully made. He sought to answer it in advance. He denied that the provisions of the bill contravened any clause of the Constitution. Where is the authority for it? Where is the authority to declare State governments overthrown? Where is the authority to reconstruct them? Where the authority to appoint a governor; to call a convention to remodel their constitutions; to fix the qualifications of its members; to prescribe the conditions of their organic law; and until a new constitution shall be made, to administer by Federal officers such parts of the old constitution and laws as the governor, or the President, or the Congress may select? Where is the authority to prescribe the qualification of electors or State officers; to dictate what debts the State shall or shall not pay; or whether there shall or shall not be slavery or involuntary servitude within its limits?

The gentleman from Maryland quotes the language of the Constitution, "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." The language is shall, not may; it is mandatory, not permissive; it enjoins a duty; it does not grant a privilege merely. And the duty is clearly defined. Mr. Madison, in discussing this clause, said:

"In a confederacy founded on republican principles and composed of republican members, the superintending Government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a union may be the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other, and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into should be substantially maintained."
